THE CHURCH ORGANIST. A Collection of Pieces for use during Divine Service.

The contents of this work, by the Organist of the Cathedral of St.-Brieuc, Britanny, are especially suitable for use during Divine Service, the shorter pieces being available at the commencement of Service, and those of greater length as Voluntaries at its conclusion. As in M. Lefébure-Wely's works for the Organ, the various pieces present no unusual difficulty to the performer, and are very melodious and effective in their character. The adaptation to English Organs is by W. T. Best.

THE MUSICAL TIMES—Published on the 1st of every month. Price 3d., Postage-free, 4d. Annual Subscription, including postage, 4s.

This Journal is now enlarged to 48 pages, and in addition to the critical notices and musical articles contains Reviews on New Music, including the more important foreign publications. The price is now raised to 3d., but the music published in each number, when purchased separately, will be, as before, 1½d. Its extensive and increasing circulation renders it a most desirable medium for advertisers.

SECULAR MUSIC (PRICE THREE-HALFPENCE EACH).

THE OCARINA.

CAN BE LEARNED IN HALF AN HOUR.

PRIZE MEDAL. Played at Drury Lane Theatre, Westminster and Brighton Aquariums, at the Crystal and Alexandra Palaces, &c. PRIZE MEDAL.

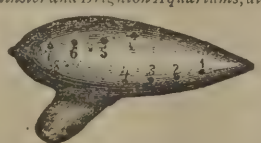
CAUTION.

Mr. BARR finds it necessary to caution the public and trade against worthless imitations of the original Prize Medal Chromatic Ocarina, for which he is the Sole Agent, these imitations being utterly useless as Musical Instruments.



"Mr. M. Barr, of Queen Victoria Street, has brought out a new instrument called the 'Ocarina.'"—Figaro.

"The tone bears a striking resemblance to the vox humana stop of a large organ."—Musical Times.

Can be seen and heard daily at M. Barr's Music Repository, 80, Queen Victoria Street, E.C.

THIS original Musical Instrument is unequalled for the beauty and voice-like quality of its tone, and the ease with which it can be acquired—a very little practice enabling the performer to play operatic or other melodies. It has a complete chromatic scale, from the lower B to the upper E, and is thus not confined to any particular key, but can be used with other instruments, notably the Pianoforte. Prices: No. 1, 2s.; No. 2, 3s.; No. 3, 4s.; No. 4, 5s.; No. 5, 6s.; No. 6, 7s.; No. 7, 8s. Nos. 5 and 7 specially tuned to go with the Pianoforte.

Instruction Book, 6d. Book of Airs, 1s. 6d. Packed and forwarded on receipt of P.O.O. or Stamps. Orders executed in rotation.

GOLD MEDAL PIANOS.

18, WIGMORE STREET, LONDON, W.

ON THE THREE YEARS' SYSTEM.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' GOLD MEDAL PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

SIR JULIUS BENEDICT. { "This most ingenious and valuable invention cannot fail to meet with success."
SYDNEY SMITH. "The touch is absolute perfection."
BRINLEY RICHARDS. { "A very clever and useful invention, and likely to be extensively adopted."

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' SHORT IRON GRAND PIANOS. Six feet six inches in length, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action. Price, 105 to 115 Guineas.

"The tone of the Grand now referred to possessed all the qualities that a good piano ought to have, and in touch and action was perfect. The sweet and silvery quality of the upper octaves was worthy of special admiration."—The Era.

"Sir Julius Benedict played his well-known composition, 'Where the Bee sucks,' on one of Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons' Grand Pianos, with the recently patented improvements, which enabled him to produce the sustained tones with great variety of effect in the light and shade of tones, especially so when extreme delicacy of touch is required."—Court Journal.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' SHORT IRON GRAND PIANOS. Six feet six inches in length, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action. Price, 105 to 115 Guineas.

"Admirable repetition, perfect sostenuto, and luscious tone of the instrument fully justified the performer's choice."—Sunday Times.

"Magnificent, grand, the air telling out with almost vocal clearness and sweetness to the bell-like treble arpeggio accompaniment, which contrasted excellently with the extraordinary power produced in the forte passages."—Illustrated Sporting and Dramatic News.

"An immense improvement in arpeggios. The rapid passages in the upper register, the beautiful flute-like tone, and quick and perfect repetition, were very effective."—Figaro.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' CONCERT IRON GRAND PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

"Sir Julius Benedict, now seldom heard as a soloist, delighted the public once more by his arrangement of 'Where the Bee sucks.' He played upon a new Patent Grand by Brinsmead, possessing a remarkably loud and clear tone."—Echo.

"The upright Iron Grand Piano, with sostenente sounding-board, the mechanism produces the obvious result of a fuller and richer tone."—Morning Advertiser.

"Every means are adopted to insure the production of perfect instruments."—The Orchestra.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' SHORT IRON GRAND PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action

"Where all the pianos go to seems somewhat of a mystery, for a really good instrument will last a lifetime: and yet every year thousands are made by each of the great London manufacturers, while the numbers made by the 200 or more smaller firms must represent an enormous number in the course of each year. The improvements made in English pianos have caused this trade rapidly to increase, until one pianoforte manufactory after another has been built to supply the growing demand. One of the largest of these, lately erected by Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons, of Wigmore Street, covers nearly an acre of ground in the Grafton Road, Kentish Town, and is intended to accommodate 300 workmen. These works alone can supply 3,000 pianos annually, and there are at least three manufactories in London capable of making an equal number."—Illustrated London News.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' GOLD MEDAL PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

"A metal bridge of a peculiar form is used to produce the treble, and a much finer tone is produced than if a wooden bridge were used."—Morning Post.

"A perfect check, great power, and quick repetition."—Times of India.

"Produces a better quality of tone, greater durability, the new patent perfect repetition, with a check (never before attained), with the certainty of the instrument never blocking."—Land and Water.

"Beautiful, light, and elastic touch, and an instant repetition."—Globe.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' GOLD MEDAL PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

"The softest touch is sufficient to secure a reply, the touch and facility of repetition are really perfect."—Belgravia.

"The advantages fully justify the term 'Perfect' Check Repeater Action."—John Bull.

"The touch is very sure, light, and elastic."—Musical Times.

"This invention is simplicity itself."—The Queen.

"The latest and greatest improvements in the pianoforte."—City Press.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' GOLD MEDAL PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action. On the Three Years' System.

"Receive the greatest approbation everywhere of musicians and manufacturers."—Standard.

CHALLEN & SON'S GOLD MEDAL PIANETTE,
WITH CHECK ACTION, IN ELEGANT WALNUT OR ROSEWOOD CASE.

FROM 25 GUINEAS.

"The Pianettes manufactured by CHALLEN & SON are most satisfactory instruments."—Anton Rubinstein.

"I can testify in the strongest manner to the qualities of the Pianette as manufactured by CHALLEN & SON. In every point, as to tone and touch, they are excellent; and I can also certify from experience as to their durability under hard wear."—William Henry Monk, Professor of Music in King's College, London.

CHALLEN & SON'S GOLD MEDAL SEMI-COTTAGE,
WITH CHECK REPEATER ACTION.

FROM 32 GUINEAS.

"The Pianos I have selected from Messrs. CHALLEN & SON have invariably given complete satisfaction, some of them having had to bear the severe test of an Indian climate."—William H. Cummings.

"As a customer of some years' standing, I speak with confidence of the quality of the instruments supplied by Messrs. CHALLEN & SON. The two I have for my own use have had a great deal of wear, and in this respect have entirely satisfied me as to their durability; and the tone and touch of all those selected by me for myself or pupils have been much commended."—Alfred Gilbert, R.A.M.

CHALLEN & SON'S GOLD MEDAL COTTAGE;
TRICHORD THROUGHOUT; BRASS BRIDGE; CHECK REPEATER ACTION.

FROM 60 GUINEAS.

"I hold a very high opinion of Messrs. CHALLEN & SON'S Pianos. Their qualities of tone and touch can be at once estimated; but I can furthermore bear testimony to their great durability."—Lindsay Sloper.

"CHALLEN & SON is a name synonymous with wonderful durability, great beauty of tone, and moderation in price. We know of not one single maker whose Pianos excel theirs in the qualities most desirable in a good and lasting Piano."—Cape Argus, May 7.

ALTO, Mr. SIDNEY BARNBY; TENOR, Mr. PARKIN; TENOR and PIANIST, Mr. FRANK BROUGH; BASS, Mr. PRENTON; SOPRANO provided when required.—Secretary, H. PRENTON, 1, Albion Square, Dalston, London.

BISHENDEN (Mr. CH. J.), the celebrated Bass, Author of "How to Sing," &c., will sing "Norman," composed for Mr. Bishenden, at his engagements. Extract from report of Parish Church Choir Concert: "Monday last the Chesham Town Hall was filled by the élite of the neighbourhood. A very powerful attraction was offered to the public in the appearance of Mr. Ch. J. Bishenden, and he was, of course, the star of the evening. The four songs selected by Mr. Bishenden were standard representative songs of the English school, not simply the ballad of the present time, which is too often written to order. Every note of 'The Village Blacksmith,' 'Heart of Oak,' 'The Friar,' and 'Blow high, blow low,' as sung by Mr. Bishenden, showed traces of his careful study, each song in succession receiving a most vociferous encore, to which Mr. Bishenden generously responded with other songs. Mr. Bishenden used to be a choir-boy at the Chesham Parish Church, and we are proud of him."—The Bucks Advertiser, May 4, 1878. See also Hemel Hempstead Gazette, Bucks Herald, &c., for same date.—20, Duke Street, Portland Place, London, W.

WARD'S

ROYAL PIANOFORTE AND HARMONIUM LAMP,

FOR PROVIDING A CENTRAL & DIRECT LIGHT FOR THE PERFORMER.

The inconvenience of the present mode of lighting a performer at a pianoforte or harmonium by means of sconces fitted at the extremities of the instrument has long been a subject of complaint. The requirement is a central light to fall direct upon the music-book. This can be obtained by using Thomas Ward's Royal Pianoforte Lamp, which can be fitted to any form of instrument without defacing the same. Vocalists also will thus find a convenience which does not exist in other modes of lighting.

MUSIC WITHOUT A MASTER.

By HENRY C. LUNN.

WE have never been able to understand whether the works published for teaching languages "without a master" are founded upon the idea that with such help no person would require a master; or that, presuming a pupil had previously made up his mind not to employ an experienced guide, these books are to act as correct finger-posts to point out the road he is to travel. Supposing that they are simply to serve as poor substitutes for the legitimate method of acquiring a language, they will doubtless be found useful in their way; but if they are meant to establish the fact that by self-tuition a sound knowledge of the subject can be gained, we must unreservedly dissent from such a conclusion. "French without a master" sounds extremely well, but one of the first requisites of a language is a perfect pronunciation, and the intonation of the French is not to be acquired by the eye, but by the ear. When we see, for example, that bouillon is to be pronounced boolon, according to the English alphabet, we do not get very near to the truth, although it is said that the oo sounds as in the word wood, and that the n is "nasal;" neither can the correct pronunciation of surveillance be caught by attempting to follow the English letters in survelans, even when we are directed to recollect that the u is "short," the l "sounds as gl in seraglio," and that the "nasal" sound of n is to be carefully observed; and yet these are fair specimens of the method by which French is taught "without a master."

If then the difficulties in the way of becoming a good linguist are really insurmountable, save by the aid of an able instructor, what shall be said of the possibility of acquiring Music "without a master"? Surely if this is, as we believe, one of the most eloquent of languages, no symbols can convey anything but the baldest idea of the beauty of a tone-poem. True it is that those who study French by the help of books alone may learn sufficient to enable them to read the literature of the country; but let them attempt to speak, and the pronunciation at once betrays the manner in which they have studied. In Music, too, it is possible that a diligent and earnest student may, with great care, skim through compositions with much amusement, and even profit, to himself; yet the moment he tries to expound the meaning of a work to artistic ears, the want of what may be termed the "intonation" of the language is at once painfully apparent. To those who feel the importance of seeking an efficient tutor for Music, whether vocal or instrumental, it is of course unnecessary to enlarge upon the subject; but we see a growing tendency in the present day to issue compositions for the pianoforte in which, without positively asserting the fact, it seems assumed that every information necessary for a student is to be found. In past times pieces only contained the notes, with the requisite marks for the varieties of tone and time; but now we have full and explicit fingering throughout, directions for the minutest shades of expression, Italian words (many of which are positively untranslatable) to guide our minds into the right channel for the interpretation of the most important passages, and we have even an edition of classical works where every movement is elaborately analysed, the margin being positively covered with letter-press so thickly as completely to dazzle the eye of the young performer for whom such information is evidently designed. Songs, too, are published with all the places for taking breath marked; and it is probable, if this system should continue to develop, that directions for the proper management of the voice and the pronunciation of the syllables may be added. Now it is obvious that when a work is thus placed before the public, the editor gives a lesson to every purchaser of a copy; and if this could possibly be an efficient one, there could be no artistic reason, at least, for saying a word against it; but as we have already indicated, no printed rules, however carefully they may have been considered, can form either a player or a singer—the influence of an experienced teacher alone can mould the pupil's mind; and as Music should come from the mind, and merely be uttered through the voice or fingers, even the best "paper musician" must necessarily be a mere ingenious automaton.

But, in addition to the pieces we have mentioned, expressly designed, as we suppose, for self-tuition, we have books entitled "Music without a master," and in these publications laws are laid down for the student which are no doubt founded upon sound principles, but are utterly useless unless explained and illustrated by a teacher. "Do not put your thumb upon a black key," for instance, and "Never place one finger over another," are very good maxims; but a pianist would be somewhat puzzled were he to attempt to play classical works with a blind observance of such directions. The truth is that the exceptions prove the rule; and although these exceptions, when met with in printed fingering, rather perplex an untaught player, when recommended under the guidance of an intelligent master, they become interesting examples for reflection as illustrating the great principle of "fingering as you phrase." The mental analysis of a pianoforte composition is a process which, aided by the teacher, grows so much into a habit with a student, that notes in music, like words in a book, become merely regarded as a means of eloquently expressing phases of thought; and the fingers are therefore instinct with the minutest shades of feeling. To give forth the correct notes of a theme, or coldly to execute passages without a flaw will satisfy none whose musical powers have been developed by constant communion with an artistic and experienced mind; and few will be found who can endure mechanical playing if they have for years been taught to believe that those who have, by hard labour only, vanquished executive difficulties have acquired the means, but not the end, of art. A Sonata of Beethoven's, for example, is a poem only to those who are themselves musical poets; but the notes are the same to all: music is certainly an universal language and requires no translation for executants not born in the country of the author; the indications for every variation of time, for phrasing, and even for fingering, appear legibly upon the paper, but it is the magic of the teacher which, almost imperceptibly, urges the young player to mould this succession of sounds into an harmonious whole. No composer can do more than faintly shadow forth his meaning by the aid of the engraver; no editor can induce eloquence in the performer by the most careful directions for phrasing: the influence of the master must be personal, and teacher and pupil must be united by that bond of sympathy which even absence should not weaken.

If we were to accept the fact of multitudes of books professing to teach the vocal art existing around us as a proof, we might imagine that "Singing without a master" is an exceedingly easy matter. To say nothing of the many anatomical treatises with coloured illustrations—by no means agreeable to look at—which tell us how the voice should be produced according to Nature's laws, we have pleasant and well-written works which treat so ably of the method of singing vowels and consonants, of the manner in which words should and should not be pronounced, of the appearance of the face when singing, and even of the true attitude to be assumed before an audience, that little more seems necessary for qualifying a student to become an accomplished vocalist. Most of us have heard of the singer who, having been kept solely to a set series of vocal exercises for about seven years, was then told that he had nothing more to learn. The story is a good one, and gains respect by age; but who, knowing anything of the matter, will believe it? "Either," they will say, "he was not the great singer that he is reported to have been, or he gained his high artistic qualities by other means than singing over a number of dry technical studies for seven years." It is true that he worked under the guidance of a master; but we hear nothing of the influence exercised by this master when school-hours were over. No organised daily routine, however well it may have been laid out upon paper, will ever form a vocalist worthy of the name; for not only must the utmost care be exercised to form the musical intelligence as well as the voice, but it is as impossible for a teacher to pursue precisely the same system with two pupils as for a doctor to practise the same course of treatment with two patients. The constitution must be studied in both instances, and this can only be done by one who has experience as well as knowledge, and whose whole heart is in the work to which he devotes himself.

We recollect once being told by a lady that, although her daughter had taken lessons on the pianoforte for many years, she always played frightfully out of tune. How this feat was accomplished we know not; but now that the female members of a family so often forsake our household instrument for the Violin, we trust that mothers with such sensitive ears will take care that a proper instructor is provided in the rudimentary stages of their daughters' progress. Self-tuition, as we have endeavoured to prove, is bad enough wherever solid advancement is desired, but the "Violin without a master" is something too horrible to dwell upon. To be compelled to listen to the constant practice of the scales is wearisome indeed; but who can bear the excruciating torture of hearing each note gradually squeezed into tune—or rather what the player thinks is in tune—as a portion of a "pupil's daily exercise"? Truly the violin, although in every respect a perfect instrument, capable of conveying the most eloquent and impassioned poetry to a cultivated audience, is one which thoroughly tests the musical faculty. On the pianoforte anybody, with a little practice, can at least sound a succession of notes which shall be satisfactory to the ear, provided the tuner has properly performed his duty; yet place a violin and bow in the hands of a tyro and he can produce but a discordant noise. Much therefore as we may desire that this instrument should be more popular in the domestic circle than it has hitherto been, by introducing it into ladies' schools, and by encouraging our daughters as well as our sons at home to develop its numerous beauties, we cannot insist too strongly upon the necessity of practising from the first under the supervision of an able teacher; for "instruction books" must speak alike to all, and never can probe those individual failings which can be detected, and perhaps remedied, by an experienced and conscientious master.

Although, following out our theory to the utmost, we thoroughly disagree with attempting to acquire "Harmony without a master," we especially warn the pupil against studying "Harmony with too many masters;"—for although it is undoubtedly true that in a multitude of counsellors there must be wisdom, it is not always that even the most learned doctors arrive at the same conclusion. A definite method of classifying chords which has formed the foundation for the structure of some of the finest artistic works may be proved faulty as thought on the subject advances, and mature minds may safely analyse the numerous systems around them; but young students should firmly adhere to the one in which they have been taught to put faith, for there can be no question that all musicians arrive at the same end, although by different means; and a beautiful chord in the work of a great composer is no less beautiful because another composer would note it differently. So much is done by establishing a feeling of confidence between master and pupil that we cannot too earnestly advocate the desirability of mutual trust, and whenever therefore one who has been taught that a certain combination of sounds has a certain root suddenly discovers that there are theorists who say that it has another root, let him not disbelieve in his tutor, for assuredly he will find that there are theorists of equal position who deny the truth of either. And if the help of a teacher is so positively essential in learning the principles of what may be termed "musical grammar," how much more is it so in attempting to compose. The master who would inculcate a feeling for symmetry of construction, and show the laws by which the grand works which have placed music amongst the noblest of the arts have been regulated, must do something more than merely map out upon paper the cold forms of the several movements of a classical composition. Books may help, but not take the place of, oral instruction; for in examining the models which have been bequeathed to us, we should endeavour not only to study the plan, but to comprehend the inner meaning of an author; and a good master can reveal to us in a short time what the most earnest student might not discover in years of study.

Opposed then as we are to the system of teaching even dry matters of fact in a matter-of-fact style, and with a fixed conviction that "imitation" is of all things to be avoided, it may perhaps be asked what we consider the real office of a master. To this we reply that he is ever to remember how grave is the responsibility of the task with which he is entrusted; for the talent of his pupil is the capital which he undertakes to employ to the greatest advantage. He must administer his teaching, therefore, not only with skill, but with judgment. His mission is to build up the musical mind of his pupil from the foundation, and to instil in early life such sound principles of art, that the older he grows the more solid his taste will become. Above all things, he is to make his influence felt when no longer at his pupil's side, for it should be understood that the object of studying with a master is to be able in the future to do without him. Assuming that these truths are admitted as the basis of legitimate teaching, it will be at once seen that no directions upon paper, as we have already said, can produce anything beyond mechanical correctness, and that self-tuition in music is no more to be advocated than self-tuition in language. The due interpretation of a composition requires something more than mere accuracy, and that something can only be gained by communion with artists. Whenever therefore the result of "Music without a master" is exhibited in any form, let us hope that the audience may be "without a master" to listen to it.

"GOD SAVE THE KING."

By WILLIAM H. CUMMINGS.

BEFORE we pass on to consider the claims of other reputed authors of the music of "God save the King," it may be well to correct an error which occurs in the last number of THE MUSICAL TIMES. Kitchener died in 1827, not in 1840; and his Flemish MS. book of Bull's compositions remained, I believe, in the hands of his son, from whom Clark purchased it in 1840.* After Clark's death the volume was offered to Her Majesty the Queen, the British Museum, and Miss Dolby, perhaps also to others; terms for purchase could not be arranged, consequently it remained in the possession of Mr. Clark's widow. It was never my good fortune to see the book, but in June, 1876, I visited Mrs. Clark in the hope that I might not only acquire some information from her, but also be permitted to examine the manuscript. Failing in my object, I wrote to Mrs. Clark in the following September, offering to purchase the volume, and asking for help in collecting memoranda respecting "God save the King," the only result being the following note:—

Dear Sir,—At your interview with me I told you the book in question was disposed of, and as regards your other request I cannot assist you; my great age prevents it. Yours respectfully,
Sept. 14, 1876. H. CLARK.

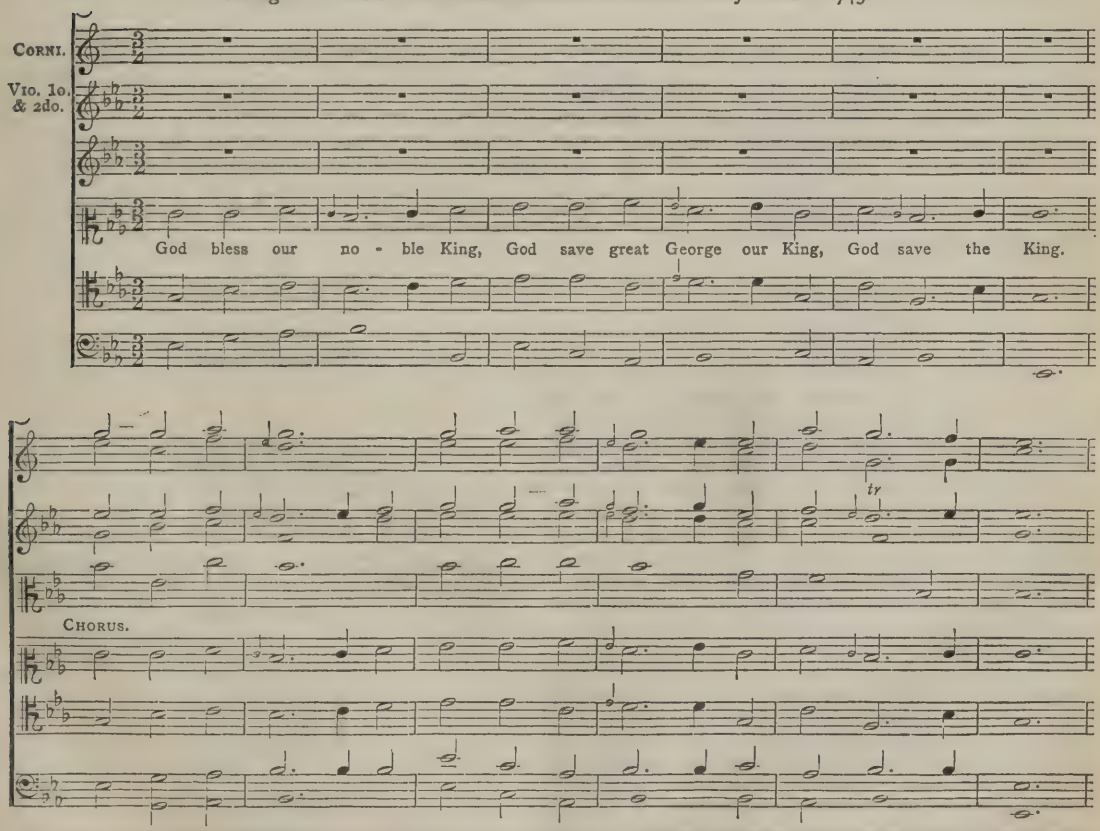
The earliest printed notice we find recording the association of the words "God save the King" with the tune appears in the Daily Advertiser of Monday, September 30, 1745: "On Saturday night last, the audience at the Theatre Royal, Drury Lane, were agreeably surprized by the Gentlemen belonging to that House performing the Anthem of God save our noble King. The universal Applause it met with, being encored with repeated Huzzas, sufficiently denoted in how just an Abhorrence they hold the arbitrary Schemes of our insidious Enemies, and detest the despotick Attempts of Papal power." The immense popularity the words and music immediately obtained induced the managers of other theatres to follow the example set by Drury Lane, and we find an advertisement in the General Advertiser, October 2, 1745: "At the Theatre in Goodman's Fields, by desire, God save the King, as it was performed at the Theatre Royal, Drury Lane, with great applause." At this house the Anthem seems to have been performed nightly up to November 14. The Theatre Royal, Covent Garden, followed suit, for we read in the General Advertiser, December 24, 25, and 26, 1745, an advertisement of the performances at that house, which concludes with the following words: "And at the play God save the King."

The arrangement and harmonies of the National Anthem sung at Drury Lane was made by Dr. Arne, and that for Covent Garden, it is said, by his pupil, Dr. Burney. The work of the former exists in his autograph, and is so interesting and admirable that it is worthy of reproduction here:—

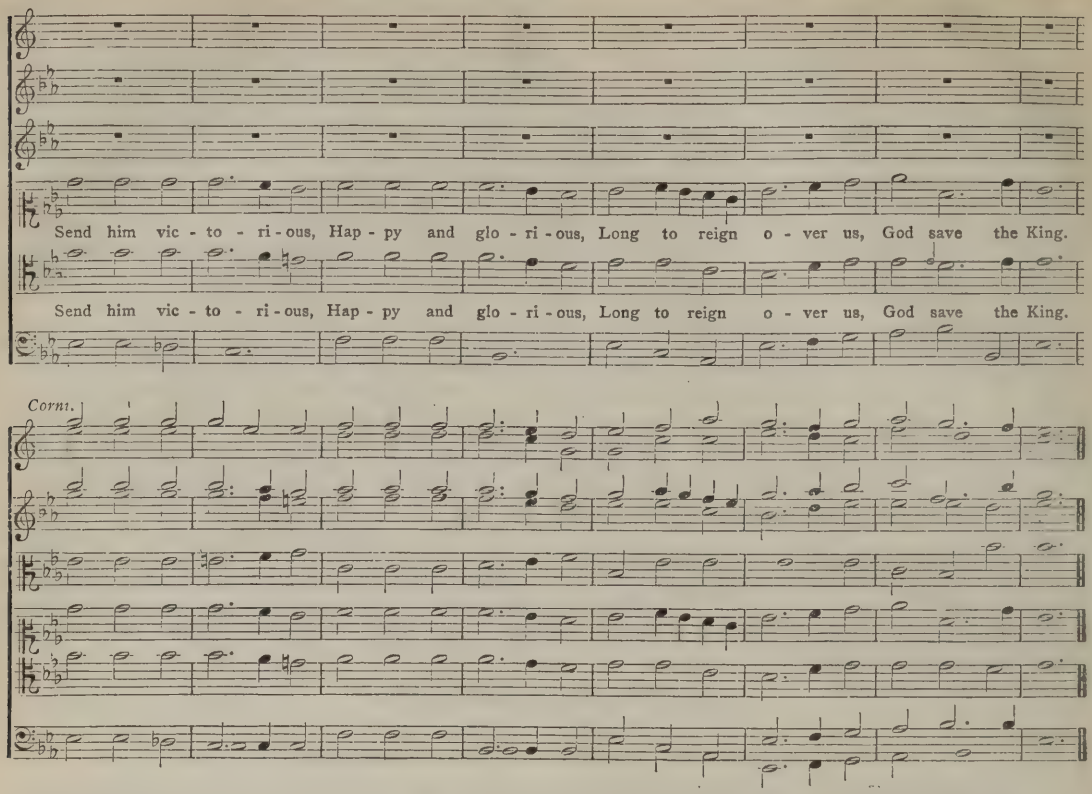
GOD BLESS OUR NOBLE KING.

AUTOGRAPH OF DR. ARNE.

Being his Score of the National Anthem made for Drury Lane. 1745.



* I have never seen any statement of the manner in which Kitchener acquired the Bull volume, but I find one of the lots in the library of Joseph Ames, sold in 1760, was described as "A Book of Musique of Dr. John Bull, Organist and Gentleman of Her Majesty's most Honourable Chappell, with two letters from Dr. Ward, relating to this curious book." Could this have been the Kitchener volume?



Send him vic - to - ri - ous, Hap - py and glo - ri - ous, Long to reign o - ver us, God save the King.
Send him vic - to - ri - ous, Hap - py and glo - ri - ous, Long to reign o - ver us, God save the King.
Corni.

Of the enthusiasm of the public at these performances we have a graphic account in the published letters of Benjamin Victor, in one of which, addressed to David Garrick, October, 1745, he says: "The stage, at both houses, is the most pious, as well as the most loyal place in the three kingdoms. Twenty men appear at the end of every play; and one, stepping forward from the rest, with uplifted hands and eyes, begins singing, to an old anthem tune, the following words:—

O Lord our God, arise!
Confound the enemies
Of George, our King!
Send him victorious,
Happy and glorious,
Long to reign over us,
God save the King!

which are the very words, and music, of an old Anthem that was sung at St. James's Chapel, for King James the Second, when the Prince of Orange landed to deliver us from popery and slavery; which God Almighty in His goodness was pleased not to grant."

Victor's account of the origin of the Anthem is amusing. How could the words, "Confound the enemies of George our King," be the very ones sung for James the Second?—and again, What authority had Victor, living and writing in 1745, to vouch for occurrences supposed to have taken place in 1688—before he was born? Certainly the early life of Victor could not have brought him into contact with people likely to have any traditions on the matter, for he began his career as a barber in Norwich.

It is to be noted here that neither Dr. Burney nor Dr. Arne were able to say who was the composer of the Air, for Burney tells us that when Arne was interrogated on the subject he answered, "He had not the least knowledge, nor could he guess at all, who was either the author or composer, but that it was a received opinion that it was written for the Catholic Chapel of James II.;" and Burney gives his own opinion in these words: "We believe that it was written for King James II., while the Prince of Orange was hovering over the coast; and when he became King, who durst own or sing it?"

In the year 1744 (?) Travers, the composer and organist, gave a vocal and instrumental concert, and I fortunately possess a copy of the book of the words, probably unique, published for the occasion. The title page runs thus:—

ACT I.

Overture of "Esther."
Canzonet for two voices
Compos'd by Mr. Travers.
Concerto Hautboy.
Song compos'd by Mr. Travers.
Concerto Violoncello.
Fourth Concerto of Corelli.

ACT II.

Ode on the Birth-day
Of Her Royal Highness
The Princess of Wales,
Compos'd by Mr. Travers;
To conclude with A LATIN CHORUS.

LATIN CHORUS.

I.

O Deus Optime!
Salvum nunc facito
Regem nostrum;
Sit læta victoria,
Comes et gloria,
Salvum jam facito,
Tu Dominum.

II.

Exurgat Dominus;
Rebelles dissipet,
Et reprimat;
Dolos confundito;
Fraudes depellito;
In te sit sita spes;
O! Salva Nos.

Englished—

O good God, preserve our King in safety;
Let joyful victory and glory be his constant companions.
O God! save our King.

O God arise! disperse the rebellious, and suppress them; confound their devices, and frustrate their schemes, for in Thee we place our hopes.
O save us all!

The date of Travers's concert is not quite certain: it must have been subsequent to 1743, that year being specially mentioned in the book in connection with the "birth-day ode"—but no other date is attached. It is not, however, likely to have been later than 1744, because in the following year, 1745, the English words, of "God save the King," as we now know them, came into general use and favour.

The words of the Latin Chorus are so evidently intended for the tune of our National Anthem, that they seem to some extent to support the notion that the Anthem might have been sung during the reign of James the Second.

That the tune of "God save the King" continued to increase in popularity is quite certain. An advertisement of the year 1748 runs as follows:—

Extempore Catch for the Westminster fish-market—to the tune of "God save our noble King."

O may this market thrive
Whilst there's a fish alive
Nature's best treat
Each knavish art decrease,
Monopolising cease,
That men of all degrees
May turbot eat.

The earliest printed copy of the words and music of "God save the King" is to be found in a volume of music entitled "Harmonia Anglicana; a collection of two, three, and four-part songs; several of them never before printed. To which are added some Choice Dialogues, set to music by the most eminent masters, viz., Dr. Blow, H. Purcell, Handel, Dr. Green, Dr. Purcell, Eccles, Weldon, Leveridge, Lampe, Carey, &c. The whole revised, carefully corrected, and figur'd by a judicious master. London: Printed for, and sold by John Simpson, at the Bass Viol and Flute in Sweeting's Alley, opposite the east door of the Royal Exchange." This publication was undated, but from internal evidence it was doubtless issued from the press in 1742. This work was a few years subsequently enlarged, revised, and republished under the title "Thesaurus Musicus." The "Gentleman's Magazine" for October, 1745, also printed both the music and words, adding a third verse to the latter.

In 1754, John Sadler, the inventor of printing on earthenware, published at Liverpool a book called "The Muses' Delight," containing the words and music of "God save great George the King," with a slight alteration of the second verse.

None of these publications had a composer's name appended to the air, and it was not until the year 1795 that George Saville Carey claimed the authorship for his father, Henry Carey; nor is it probable the claim would have been made at all, but for the hope he entertained that the King would grant a pension to him for his father's presumed loyal service on behalf of the Crown. A yearly pension of £200 had just been granted to Charles Dibdin on account of the services he had rendered to the nation by the composition of his famous naval and patriotic songs; and if Carey could have proved his father's claim to the authorship of "God save the King," he might clearly have anticipated some consideration at the hands of the King and the government.

George Saville Carey shall tell his own story, as given in "The Balnea" (1799), page 110, where, speaking of a fashionable seaside resort, he says:—

When the Royal family make their first entrance into Weymouth, every summer season, the inhabitants, out of compliment, cover the pavement with small pebbles from the sea-shore, which has generally the effect of endangering your eyes, or breaking the parlour-windows of all the houses in the street; for as the party is numerous, and the horses driven along at a furious pace, their hoofs, tipping the pebbles before them, make them fly as thick as hail, and as sharp almost as a small bullet shot from a pistol.

Yet, notwithstanding all the apparent zeal of the natives of Weymouth, one would think they in reality did not care a straw for the Royal visitors; otherwise these Gothamites, if they truly wished to make their Sovereign's entrance easy, would have bestowed a bundle or two of the above commodity for the sake of his family, their friends' eyes, their neighbours' windows, and the general safety of His Majesty's subjects. Being thrown into this situation once myself, with my head uncovered like an obedient subject, I was under the necessity of turning my back upon my betters, for the sake of saving my face; it was at a time when I had an idea of addressing his Majesty in respect to my father being the author of "God save great George our King." I had no evil in my mind, like Macbeth, yet "the very stones seem'd to prate at my whereabout," for they rose from the pavement in such vollies, and pelted me hip and thigh at such a rate, that I could not help bringing to mind that passage in the Scriptures where it is said, "I asked for bread, and he gave me a stone!" As it has been whispered abroad, nay, even in print, that an annuity of two hundred pounds per annum had been bestowed on me in consequence of my father being the author of "God save great George our King," I think it a duty incumbent on me to acquaint the world that no such consideration has ever yet transpired; yet I must beg that my readers will give me leave to introduce a few lines on this subject. In spite of all literary cavil and conjectural assertions, there has not yet appeared one identity to invalidate the truth of my father's being the author of the important song; some have given the music to Handel, others to Purcell; some have signified that it was produced in the time of Charles I., others in James I.; and some in their slumbers have dreamed that it made its appearance in the reign of Henry VIII. It might as well have been carried still further back, to the wicked reign of Saul, or the wiser one of song-singing Solomon, the son of the psalm-singing David. I have heard the late Mr. Pearce Galliard, an able counsellor in the law, and a colleague of my father's, who died some years ago at Southampton, assert, time after time, that my father was the author of "God save the King," that it was produced in the year forty-five and six; another friend presented it to me in its original state, bound up with a collection of songs for two and three voices, set to music by Mr. Handel, Dr. Blow, Mr. Leveridge, Dr. Greene, Mr. Eccles, Mr. Lampe, Daniel Purcell, Mr. Corfe, and Henry Carey, printed in the year 1750 for John Johnson, opposite Bow Church, in Cheapside; it precedes another song of my father's, beginning with—

"He comes, he comes, the Hero comes,
Sound, sound your trumpets, beat your drums," &c.

But for the satisfaction of my readers, I will insert the song or "God save great George our King," as it is printed in the original text, where it is called a song for two voices, and runs thus:—

[Here follow four verses of words. The first three are those at present in use; the fourth is as follows]:—

Long grant that Marshal Wade
May, by Thy mighty aid, Victory bring;
May he sedition hush,
And like a torrent rush,
Rebellious Scots to crush,
God save the King.

Every one who has read the history of the Scotch rebellion in 1745 will remember that Marshal Wade was a commander of great and eminent ability, employed by our Government to repel the factious spirit of the Caledonians, who were hostile to this country at that time, and invaded many of the northern parts of this island.

The following letter of the ingenious Dr. Harington, of Bath, strongly corroborates the authenticity of my father's being the author of the song in question. Hearing that he was in possession of this piece of information, I entreated him to make it known to me, which he politely and readily acquiesced in, saying:—

"SIR,—The anecdote you mention, respecting your father being the author and composer of the words and melody of 'God save great George our King' is certainly true; that most respectable gentleman, Mr. Smith, my worthy friend and patient, has often told me what follows, viz., 'That your father came to him with the words and music, desiring him to correct the bass, which Mr. Smith told him was not proper; and at your father's request he wrote down another in correct harmony.' Mr. Smith, to whom I read your letter this day, the 13th of June, repeated the same again. His advanced age and present infirmity render him incapable of writing, or desiring to be written to; but, on his authority, I pledge myself for the truth. Should this information be in the least advantageous to yourself, it will afford the most sincere satisfaction and pleasure to

"Sir,
"Your most obedient servant,
"Bath, June 13, 1795. "W. HARINGTON.

"P.S.—My curiosity was often raised to enquire after the author before Mr. Smith related the above, and I was often misinformed. Mr. Smith says he understood your father intended this air as part of a birth-day ode, or somewhat of that kind; however this might be, no Laureate nor composer has furnished the world with any production more complimentary or more popular, which must be the consequence of concise elegance and natural simplicity."

Surely the foregoing letter wears the complexion of truth, and yet, either from envy or rigid scepticism, it has been held out by many as a matter of doubt, without one feasible authority of circumstantial argument that could render it so. Convinced of the infallibility of Dr. Harington's letter, I concluded on giving it a place here, referring the reader to the material and provident aid the song had often yielded to the King and State in every critical situation; when lurking sedition had caused loud and dangerous murmurs to be daily heard in every house and street, threatening defiance to the sword of justice and her wise established laws, spurning at Majesty on his road to meet his mob-insulted senate, or annoying him in his public pleasures, yet has the wavering subject been often called back to his original duty to his King, and the harsh and clamorous voice of anarchy lulled into a calm, by this divine, this popular, and national hymn. Reflecting on its utility, and convinced of its having been written by my father, I thought there could be no harm in endeavouring, through some medium or other, to make myself known at Windsor as son of the author of "God save great George our King," and as great families create great wants, it is natural to wish for some little relief; accordingly I was advised to beg the interference of a gentleman residing in the purlieus of the castle, and who is for ever seen bowing and scraping in the King's walks, that he would be kind enough to explain this matter rightly to the Sovereign, thinking it was not improbable but that some consideration might have taken place, and some little compliment bestowed on the offspring of one "who had done the State some service;" but alas! no sooner did I move the business with the greatest humility to the demi-canon, but he opened his copious mouth as wide as a four-and-twenty pounder, bursting as loudly upon me as the largest piece of ordnance, with his chin cocked up like the little centre figure, with his cauliflower wig, in Bunbury's Country Club, exclaiming: "Sir, I do not see, because your father wrote the song of God save the King, that the King is under any obligation to his son." I could have said, had he not been in his own house, that private as well as public obligations were hereditary, and ought never to be forgotten; and, where there is a propinquity of blood, it should not be suffered to rest lingering in the veins for want of that physical assistance, gratitude. Surely no one will say there is anything unchristianlike in this mode of arguing; I am convinced there is justice in it, and there is much justice in religion; they are engrafted and grow from the same stock.

MUSIC IN CONNECTION WITH DANCING.

By Charles K. Salaman.

My readers and I parted company in Asia. We meet again in Europe, after a month's separation, to view the native dances and dance music of many countries.

The Sarabandes, Pavans, and Chaconnes of Moorish Spain have been already noticed. Other dances, of more or less antiquity, peculiar to the several provinces of the Spanish peninsula, all possessing local interest and characteristic features, have now to be mentioned. They include the Bolero, the Seguidillas, the Malagueña, the Jota, the Cachucha, the Zorongos, and the Guaracha. The castanets and guitar, both of Arab origin, are the instruments by which these dances are ordinarily accompanied. The verb "volar" (to fly), or the noun "volero," gives birth to the title of the dance whose grace and lightness is thereby indicated. The Bolero is executed by two persons, and is divided into five parts, or movements, viz., the Paseo (Promenade), the Traversias (Crossing), the Differencias, the Finales, and the Bien Parado. It is more noble than the far-famed Fandango, and is classed among the most graceful of the Andalusian native dances. The music is in triple time, and of a bold and emphatic rhythm; it is moreover invested with a distinguishable, special character. The Bolero may be danced effectively with the rhythmic music of castanets, the peculiar crispness of which, with or without the additional twang of the guitar, imparts a well-defined accent to the steps of the dancers. There are, besides the before-named dances, the Seguidillas-Boleros, the Seguidillas-Manchegas, and the Seguidillas-Taleadas, and also the Seguidillas, pure and simple, which, signifying a continuation, succeeds to the Bolero, as the older Galliardo was wont to follow the Pavan, and the Gavotte the Minuetto. The Seguidillas-Boleros, requires, as its accompaniment, the voice and guitar. The Seguidillas-Manchegas is associated with the province of La Mancha, of Don Quixote celebrity. Taleadas signifies noise. The Seguidillas-Taleadas is therefore a kind of boisterous mongrel dance, partaking of both the Bolero and Cachucha.

The Chevalier de Bourgagianne, writing of Spanish manners and customs in 1789, says of the Seguidillas: "When danced by a beautiful Spanish woman with castanets, and marking the time with her heel with singular precision, it is certainly one of the most seducing objects which love can employ to extend his empire." Malaga is famed for La Malagueña, which may be thus described: The cavalier seeks to steal a glimpse of his fair partner. With her fan, which to a Spanish woman is an expressive silent language, she coquettishly conceals her beauty. She shuts it, she opens it—every movement of the fan having an intelligible meaning; she advances, she retires, so opportunely that her gallant is baffled. He rattles the castanets under his cloak; she listens, she smiles; and the tip of her satin shoe exhibits her impatience, while, at the same time, it well marks the dance measure. At length, patience being exhausted, the lady throws aside her mantilla and her fan; the gentleman divests himself of his cloak, and they burst into a pas de deux of extreme elegance. The Cachucha may be designated a pretty, graceful, seductive dance, in triple time. Auber, and many other operatic composers have successfully borrowed the measure both for vocal and instrumental music. The word Cachucha, which has many meanings, although it is not to be found in the Spanish dictionary, is occasionally used as a term of endearment, as well as to describe small and pretty objects relating to female attire and ornament:—

Mi cachucha, por la mar,
A todos vientos camina,
Pero nunca va mejor
Que cuando va di bolinar.

Which has been imitated as follows:—

Haste, my darling, o'er the seas,
When gentle gales are blowing;
But when the winds of winter roar,
Ah! do not think of going.

The respectable classes in Spain no longer condescend to dance their native dances; they have been relegated long since to peasants, servants, and gipsies, —gitanos—who also revel in a dance peculiarly their own, entitled Zorongos, accompanied by rhythmic music only. The women of Andalusia, who are proud of their small and well-formed feet, cruelly indulge in Andaluzados, or Andalusian jokes, on the larger feet of ladies of other countries. They speak of a ball-shoe of a German beauty which once served as a boat for six rowers!

Marino, an old Italian poet, in his famous poem "Adonis," graphically and poetically describes the Terpsichorean art. In the following brief extract is recorded the manner of dancing the Fandango:—

Due castagnette di sonoro bosso,
Tien nelle man la Giovinetta ardita;
Che accompagnando il piè con grazia mosso,
Fan forte ad or ad or scroccar le dita.
Regge un timpano l' altro il qual percosso
Con sonaglietti ad altegiar l' invita;
Ed alternando un bel concerto doppio
Al suono a tempo accordono lo scoppio, &c.

This dance, executed by two persons, is full of action and spirit. The Court of Rome was once much scandalised by the reported indecorum of this ancient national dance, and a consistory was ordered to assemble to inquire into the charges brought against it. The judges who were appointed to try the question met in a large saloon at Seville. A verdict prohibiting the continued performance of the dance was about to be pronounced, when it was suggested that the judges should themselves witness its performance. This was assented to, and a pair of the most skilful dancers of Seville were summoned to execute the Fandango before the court. The judges were evidently not proof against the fascinations of the dance, which appear to have been irresistible, as a verdict was delivered in its favour. A Fandango in Mozart's "Figaro" is worked out in his own masterly manner —a most charming movement. The Guaracha, derived from a negro exclamation indicating joy and exultation, is another of Spain's national dances whose measure is more or less familiar to Europeans. Its music is also in triple measure, and generally melodious. The Zapateado—from "zapato," shoe—is a dance in which considerable noise is made upon the ground with the feet. El Tripili Trapola partakes of the gipsy dance, Zorongo. Spanish dance music is generally melodious, and usually in triple time, with a well-marked rhythm; but it is often very monotonous, and with no variety in modulation. To the fascinations of the native dances of Spain may be added the elegant forms of the dancers: costumes unrivalled for picturesqueness and grace, the powerful attraction of female beauty, and a certain dignity and nobility of deportment in the dancers characteristic of national pride.

D' ogni bell arte, non sei madre, O Italia?*

Among the most conspicuous may be named Dancing and Music. Every state and province of Italy has given her name to a special dance to which a particular music is attached. Venice has given the Furlana, Florence the Trescone, Sicily the Siciliana, Monferato (Piedmont) the Monferina, Rome the Saltarello, and Naples the Tarantella.

The modern Romans, except during the Carnival week, are, as a nation, too inactive to dance; they are therefore not to be classed amongst the dancing people of Europe. The Romans who live on the other side of the Tevere, or Tiber—called the Trasteverini—are of a different metal. These descendants of the Ancient Romans, as they choose to consider themselves, are a fine manly race, exclusive, proud, jealous, active, and excitable. They, no less than the peasants of the Roman Campagna, are passionately fond of dancing, and of their native dance, Il Saltarello—a term derived from the verb "saltare," to dance or leap, and partly from the ancient Latin "saltatio." In the music of the Saltarello there is a kind of leap that distinguishes it from the music of the Tarantella. The latter consists chiefly of continuous triplets in duple or quadruple time. The usual accompaniment of the Saltarello is rhythmic music performed upon the tambourine, but it is frequently accompanied by the voice and mandolin. It is hardly possible to conceive a more charming and refreshing entertainment than to be seated, at the close of a hot summer day, upon one of the numerous hills which encircle Rome, shaded by olive trees, while witnessing the merry pastimes of the gaily dressed peasants of the Roman Campagna in some picturesque classical town or village—such as Frascati, Tivoli, Albano, or Genzano—when a Festa is, as the Romans say, "al colmo del suo splendor;" to watch the exciting Saltarello performed by innumerable pairs amid boundless mirth and jollity. The Saltarello, the Tarantella, Monferina, and other Italian dances, tell a love story. The dancers, who become wild from the excitement of the dance, endeavour to exhaust each other. The fair one is more frequently triumphant, and exhibits her victory by tapping her tambourine upon the head of her partner, who then gallantly submits to be vanquished. The measure of the Saltarello has been adopted by many composers for vocal music, as well as for the orchestra, pianoforte and other solo instruments. Among many Saltarelli which have become famous may be named Mendelssohn's Finale to his "Italian Symphony;" Gounod's Saltarello in E minor, composed for the London Philharmonic Society; and Salaman's Saltarello in A flat, for pianoforte solo. Many movements have been published under this title that are nevertheless wanting in the essential characteristics of the dance measure. Writing of the Saltarello music, Macfarlane ("Customs of Southern Italy") says: "Sometimes the partners sing together, at other times they sing in alternate strophes, or verses, and occasionally the woman only plays the castanets, leaving the singing and all the rest of the music, or noise, to the man. But very commonly the bystanders and spectators of the dance join in the music, forming a loud screaming orchestra and choir that must be heard to be understood. When all this is mingled and softened by distance it is pleasant enough, but the distance ought to be as great as that which allows the uninitiated to relish the scream of the Highland bagpipe, or the old national pipe of the Turks." I have never seen the Saltarello danced to other instruments than the tambourine. Whatever may have been its origin, the far-famed national dance of Naples, La Tarantella, is, without any exception, the wildest, most uproarious and animated dance in the world, when skilfully performed under favourable conditions; viz., in the open air, with plenty of space, in the hottest weather, on a smoothly paved road, under a canopy of cloudless dark blue sky by day, or, by night, with a heaven illuminated by a moon which, for brightness, might shame a northern sun; or under a sky studded with millions of bright stars. The Tarantella danced by the peasantry of Naples and its environs, con amore, or by those of a higher class who can enter into the native spirit of the exciting dance, is indeed fascinating to witness. In his youthful days there was not a more vigorous and skilful dancer of the Tarantella than that human evergreen, known as Charles Mathews. His quicksilver temperament (if the expression may be permitted), his extraordinary sprightliness and agility, which he has marvellously preserved, especially fitted him, nell tempo passato, for such violent exercise. It has been said that he excelled in his youth the most excellent Tarantellari of Naples. To dance the Tarantella on a hot summer's night, without shoes or stockings, from Vesuvius to Naples, was, in former years, a feat often executed. Auber's Tarantella ("Masaniello") is one of the most perfect specimens of the brilliant dance measure. Rossini's vocal Tarantella, which the elder Lablache, with his glorious voice and native spirit, used in days of yore to render so effective, is another. Many of my readers will perhaps recognise the following lines as sung by "Papa" Lablache in their younger days:—

La luna sta in miezza lo mare,
Mamma mia maritime tu!
Figgià mia che t' aggio à dare?
Mamma mia pensai tu.
E la luna sta in miezza lo mare!

This Neapolitan patois has been thus Anglicised:—

The moon is in the middle of the sea;
Mamma mine, get me a husband!
Daughter mine, whom am I to give to thee?
Mamma mine, think of that yourself.
And the moon remains in the middle of the sea!

Thalberg's Tarantella for the Pianoforte, in G minor, Döhler's Tarantella for the same instrument, and Vieuxtemps' for the Violin, are genuine specimens of this famous dance. As in the case of Saltarelli, there are many Tarantelle bearing the title which have no just claim to it.

The Trescone indicates a large country dance of Tuscany, which was once very popular in that country. The women dance it without shoes, in order to move with greater freedom and lightness. The Monferina, originally invented in the dukedom of Monferato, is the people's dance of Piedmont. Its musical measure is charming, and always melodious. It has been much used by the operatic composers of Italy, more particularly for their choruses. If I mistake not, the opening chorus of "La Sonnambula" is founded on the measure of a Monferina. It is very elegant, buoyant, and tuneful. The dance, though sufficiently animated, is far less so than either Il Saltarello or La Tarantella.

The old Venetian Furlana was first danced in the Frioul. It is said to be full of life, partaking, in some respects, of the Tarantella, but less diversified in its movements. The music is in $\frac{6}{8}$ time. The dance, in its pantomimic action, referred to the peculiar position of Venice, and to the gondolas of that island-city. During its performance the dancers were wont to imitate the gondolieri in the performance of their duties.

The scenery of the Tyrolese mountains, the picturesque costumes of the peasantry, their singing, their jodling, with accompaniment of zitter and mandolin, combine to invest with many local charms the dances of the Tyrol. Rossini's great opera, "Guillaume Tell," was first represented in this country in an English dress, under the title of "Hofer, the Tell of the Tyrol." The Tyrolienne in that opera, so characteristic, melodious, and graceful, made famous by La Taglioni's exquisite dancing, may be accepted as a perfect model of the dance and its music. But there are others, by native composers, more specially national in character, action, and tune, for voice, solo instruments, and orchestra, not less charming as music, and not less fascinating.

The student of ecclesiastical history may possibly remember that, in 1378, a sect of Christians called "Dancers," originating in Aix-la-Chapelle, spread through the Belgian provinces. Mosheim ("Ecclesiastical History") mentions that persons of both sexes, alike in public and in private, suddenly commenced dancing with much wild violence, and frequently dropped down suffocated from excitement, and exhaustion. This leads to the mention of the Dancing Dervishes (Darweeshes, according to the Arabic) of Turkey. They are clad in long petticoats with innumerable folds which reach to their heels. They commence their performance with bowing and kissing the ground. At length music —so called—strikes up. The dancing fanatics, who are all, to some extent, drugged with opium, dance, stamp, scream, howl, move their heads forwards and backwards, and whirl round and round until they fall to the ground as wild maniacs, apparently lifeless, utterly exhausted from their physical exertions. Beethoven's "Dervish Dance and Chorus," in his "Ruins of Athens," is acknowledged to be a wonderful composition, less pleasing, perhaps, than intensely characteristic, but, at the same time, highly descriptive of the continuous whirling movements of the dancers. Weber, with fine and masterly genius, has introduced into his "Oberon" a genuine specimen of wild Turkish music, besides largely infusing its spirit into his own original music.

Hungary claims among her national dances the Czardos, the Slovanka, the Polka, and Mazur. When a number of Hungarian noblemen, attired in their superb military uniforms, assemble to perform their national dances, accompanied, as they usually are, by their national dance music performed by military bands, a spectacle is presented to the eye not alone animated, but elevating in its effects upon the mind. Their dances are noisy in consequence of the iron heels of their boots being struck together as they move. Hungarian music is wild and uneven, and must be played with characteristic local expression, otherwise its native spirit is lost. The late introduction into England of Hungarian national dance music by Liszt, Rubinstein, Joachim, Brahms, and other foreign composers, has made its style familiar to musical ears in this country.

The Lavolta, so often mentioned in his plays by Massinger, one of Shakespeare's contemporaries, as a dance imported from Italy in the sixteenth century, is supposed by some to have been the parent of the Waltz. Sir John Davis (Attorney-General in Ireland to King James I.), in his "Orchestra: a Poem, expressing the Antiquity and Excellence of Dancing," has the following :—

> Yet there is one, the most delightful kind,
> A lofty jumping, or a leaping round,
> Where, arm in arm, two dancers are entwined,
> And whirl themselves, in strict embracements bound.

Massinger, in his "Parliament of Love," says of this dance: "If you have travelled in Italy and brought home some remnant of the language, and can set your faces in some strange and ne'er-seen fortune, dance a Lavolta, and be rude and saucy." This author's editor and critic adds: "Our countrymen, who seem to be lineally descended from Sisyphus, and who, at the end of every century, usually have their work to do over again, after proudly importing from Germany the long exploded trash of their own nurseries, have just brought back from the same country, and with an equal degree of exultation, the well-known Lavolta of their grandfathers under the mellifluous name of the Waltz." Many readers will remember Lord Byron's famous lines on this popular dance, which has also been said to have originated in Bohemia, and was, in its inception, a kind of quick Minuet, first danced by the workers in the Bohemian salt mines. The measure was adopted by Haydn, the father of orchestral symphony, and afterwards by Mozart, Beethoven, and other classical composers for the middle movement of their symphonies and sonatas. The golden age of the Waltz was reached when, about forty years ago, the elder Strauss and his famed rival, Labitzky, reigned triumphantly in Vienna as original Waltz composers and conductors of well-selected orchestras whose performances were the admiration of Europe. It was in the Austrian capital in 1838 that I first heard dance music played to perfection. The Waltz was then too rapid in its action to be graceful. Yielding apparently to a greater sense of propriety, it has since become more moderate in time, and has thereby gained, in elegance.

The native dances of Poland are the Cracovienne, thus named from Cracow, the ancient metropolis of that unfortunate kingdom, the Mazurka, and the Polacca or Polonoise. The Cracovienne is in duple time, and is remarkable for its elegance and grace. The native melodies to this charming dance are very tuneful. The other national Polish dances are, for the most part, in triple time. Chopin has immortalised the Mazurka by the many charming pianoforte compositions he has written to that measure. While, as a Pole, he has retained the colour and characteristics of the dance of his native country, he has imparted to the Mazurka a style alike poetical and classical. The Polonoise, as danced at the court balls of Austria, Russia, and Germany, is truly an imperial dance. Led by an emperor and empress, followed by archdukes and archduchesses, and by the high nobility of the court, in pairs, it is one of the most gorgeous spectacles that can be conceived. With a magnificent orchestral accompaniment, the music of the Polonoise is superb in character and effect.

The Russians have borrowed their national dances, to some extent, from neighbouring nations. They are not remarkable for any special peculiarity. They are, however, very numerous, and each province of the empire claims one or more dances of its own. The melodies, the majority of which are composed in the minor mode, are alternately pathetic and vigorous, and are often uneven in their rhythm. A fine collection, published at Moscow about twenty years since, includes some of the best examples of Russian song and dance tunes.

The Norwegian peasants have a dance called the Halling, very characteristic and remarkable. It commences with the Toug, a slow and stately dance in which even aged persons join. They retire, however, as the movements of the younger performers gain more rapidity. The dance becomes gradually quicker, and the dancers more excited. The men leap in the air, and attempt to stick their knives into the roof of the wooden barn in which they assemble. When one succeeds, another endeavours to recover the knife, and to secure this, the most stupendous physical efforts of strength are exhibited, the performers only succumbing to sheer exhaustion. The music of the Halling, like all Scandinavian music, is composed mostly in the minor mode, and is of a melancholy cast. The instrument upon which the music of the Halling is played is called the hardanger. It is a kind of viol d'amore, inasmuch as it has vibratory strings, six in number, in addition to four strings above the bridge, which are played upon by the bow. The most famous player of this Norwegian instrument, rather more than twenty or thirty years ago, was a peasant of Norway named Thorger Andunsen. He was so highly gifted with musical talent that his friend, Ole Bull, recommended him to travel, in order to make his performances publicly known. Once only was he persuaded to overcome his modesty and nervousness and to leave his native village. He realised on that occasion from his playing a sufficient sum to render him moderately independent.

We shall now return home viâ France, about whose national dances there is not much more to write. The great aim of our great-grandparents was to dance, with dignity and grace, the Minuet and Gavotte. It would be well if these courtly dances could be revived. Their measures have served as musical subjects for great and enduring works, and are to be met with in the orchestral compositions of Handel, Mozart, Meyerbeer, and other illustrious masters. The world is indebted to France for the contre-danses, known as Quadrilles, and for the Galop. The influence of dancing is perhaps more perceptible in the dramatic music of France than in that of any other country. The charming, melodious Ballet music of Auber, Rossini, and Meyerbeer is so well known and appreciated as to require no comments in its praise.

That dancing, as a healthful exercise, is of special use to sailors is an axiom long recognised by naval commanders. Captain Cook is said to have preserved the health of his seamen during their many long voyages in unhealthy climates by encouraging the regular practice of dancing the Hornpipe. There is, or was, an ancient wind instrument, known in Wales as the pipgorn, or hornpipe, from which probably the dance derived its name. This dance, more than one hundred years ago, became very popular in some foreign countries. At the Opera at Venice, about that period, the native singers and dancers had ceased to attract large audiences. An Italian dancer, who had visited England and had studied with care and ability the Sailor's Hornpipe, presented himself to the Impresario for an engagement, and offered, as a great novelty, to dance the Hornpipe in the true English style for the first time before an Italian audience. His efforts were so successful, and the dance and dancer became so attractive, that the theatre was crowded every night, and the manager not only recovered from his losses but became a considerable gainer. One of the best dancers of the Hornpipe was the late T. P. Cooke. About twenty years ago—on the occasion of a dramatic performance given as a compliment to the family of the popular dramatist, Douglas Jerrold—T. P. Cooke, then a septuagenarian, consented generously to play his famous part of William, in "Black-Eyed Susan," in which he danced the hornpipe with as much agility and spirit as in his younger days. I met him the day after the performance, when he assured me, in reply to my inquiries, that the active exercise he had undergone had done him much good, and made him feel again young. His execution of the dance was, at his age, marvellous.

Stafford Smith observes of English dance music: "It is remarkable that all our earliest dance and song tunes, whether the grave, rough, or bold British, the tender, wiry, and airy Scotch, or the mixed Irish, are characterised by their affinity to those modes believed analogous to the Greek. Notwithstanding this, they are now so little known and practised, though uniformly admired and supported by very learned writers and the ablest practitioners of this and former centuries, viz., Handel, Geminiani, Aldrich, Tallis, Tye, Palestrina, &c., that many think them strange and novel."

I have yet to name a few more of the ancient dances to the invention of which England lays claim. The Trenchmore and Cushion Dance have been often mentioned by the English dramatists of old and by other writers. Selden, in his "Table Talk," amuses us with the following: "The court of England is much altered. At a solemn dancing, first you had the grave measures, then the Corantos and the Galiardes, and this kept up with ceremony; and at length the Trenchmore and the Cushion Dance. Then all the company dance—lord and groom, lady and kitchenmaid; no distinction! So in our court, in Queen Elizabeth's time, gravity and state were kept up. In King James's time things were pretty well; but in King Charles's time there has been nothing but Trenchmore and the Cushion Dance, Omnium gatherum, Tolly, Polly, Hoite cum Toite." Taylor, the "water poet," designates the Cushion Dance "a pretty little provocatory dance," because the gentleman was required to salute the lady whose turn it was to place before him the cushion. To those engaged in the pastime it must certainly, under certain conditions, have proved extremely provoking. Specimens of this dance are to be found in Playford's "Dancing Master," attached to which are explanatory directions as to the manner the dance is to be performed.

Although very far from being exhausted, it may be desirable to bring to a close, for the present, the subject of "Music in Connection with Dancing." Many dances of ancient and modern times have been, for want of space, left unnoticed, and, from a similar cause, much music in relation to dancing has been passed by without mention. The large subject of stage dancing, the grand Ballets d'action of France and Italy, are postponed for future consideration. It must not be forgotten, in the meantime, that the Ballet of "Prometheus," whose Overture has long been familiar to musical ears, was composed by Beethoven; that Steibelt composed Ballet music, as well as Hummel, and many other classical musicians. In a former paper Henry Purcell was also named as a composer of dance music.

This large subject has extended over a very considerable period; it has embraced a great quantity and variety of matter. To treat so large a subject completely, and to render it thoroughly intelligible, it would be necessary to illustrate the literary matter with music and drawings. It is obvious that this could not be done in a series of papers extending over many months. Much which, for various reasons, has been now omitted may be written at a future time, when points requiring, possibly, more elaborate exposition and clearer elucidation will receive the attention they merit.

THE GREAT COMPOSERS, SKETCHED BY THEMSELVES.

By Joseph Bennett.

No. IV.—BEETHOVEN (continued).

Once more the reader is asked to go over the letters of Beethoven written prior to the year 1815; but not now in search of that which indicates the distress brought upon him by bodily affliction, or insufficient means of living. This time my object is to bring into view, as far as the correspondence permits, our master's relations with the opposite sex. When searching out the character of a man as sketched by himself in moments of confidence with his fellows, special attention should be paid to words addressed to the ear of woman. We may always depend upon them for the clearest and truest indication of thought and feeling. In the varying relations he bears to his own sex, a hundred considerations suggest or necessitate caution, politic behaviour, it may be even some measure of dissimulation. But in presence of a woman, always assuming that his aims be honest, a man puts off the armour in which he fights the battle of life, relaxes his attitude of suspicion and reserve, and is really himself. With regard to Beethoven, it will, perhaps, be said that little could arise in this respect from a nature so harsh and rugged—from one who was during many years a complete example of the "crusty old bachelor," and who never married. But the assumption is incorrect as a matter of fact, and also false in philosophy. Harsh and rugged natures are often most capable of the deepest feeling, and subject to the most powerful passions. In South America there are mountains whose tops are adamantine rock and eternal snow, but within whose recesses burn fierce and everlasting fires. So it often is with natures like that of Beethoven. Outwardly they appear to have no capacity for warm and tender emotions, whereas, inwardly, they experience those emotions in a degree unknown to the man whose sentimentalism lies on the surface for all to observe at a glance. Not without confidence, therefore, that much will be found to repay his trouble is the reader asked to look at Beethoven's letters to women.

The first of these in Nohl's collection is addressed to Eleanore von Breuning, wife of the master's friend Stephen, and was written when Beethoven had been a year in the Austrian capital. Mdme. von Breuning then lived with her husband at Bonn, and it appears that the young musician, previous to leaving his native place, had done something which led to an estrangement between himself and her. What that something was the correspondence does not show, but Beethoven writes in a tone of deep penitence and makes a most manly confession of his error. Listen to what he says: "I have often conversed in thought with you and your dear family, though not always in the happy mood I could have wished, for that fatal misunderstanding still hovered before me, and my conduct at that time is now hateful in my sight. But so it was, and how much would I give to have the power wholly to obliterate from my life a mode of acting so degrading to myself and so contrary to the usual tenor of my character. . . Your good and noble disposition, my dear friend, is sufficient security that you have long since forgiven me. We are told that the best proof of sincere contrition is to acknowledge our faults, and this is what I wish to do. Let us now draw a veil over the whole affair, learning one lesson from it—that when friends are at variance it is always better to employ no mediator, but to communicate directly with each other." These expressions do credit to the frankness and manliness of the writer's character. He had offended, and he found in himself the grace to admit his error and to ask for pardon—a course which is always infinitely better and nobler than that of trying to stifle a conviction of wrong-doing beneath false pride. If it be suspected that, while Beethoven could thus humble himself to a woman, he would have taken very different ground with a man, reference need only be made to a letter written somewhat later to Dr. Wegeler of Vienna, in which the master exclaims: "In what an odious light have you exhibited me to myself! Oh! I acknowledge it: I do not deserve your friendship. It was no intentional or deliberate malice that induced me to act toward you as I did—but inexcusable thoughtlessness alone. I say no more. I am coming to throw myself into your arms, and to entreat you to restore me my lost friend, and you will give him back to me—to your penitent, loving, and ever grateful Beethoven." Returning to the Von Breuning letter, we find that Beethoven proposes to seal the compact of peace with a mutual present. On his part he sent the Variations on "Se vuol ballare," with a dedication, and asked, in return, a knitted angola waistcoat. "I am anxious to be so fortunate as again to possess an angola waistcoat knitted by your own hand, my dear friend. Forgive my indiscreet request, it proceeds from my great love for all that comes from you; and I may privately admit that a little vanity is connected with it, namely, that I may say I possess something from the best and most admired young lady in Bonn. I still have the one you were so good as to give me in Bonn, but change of fashion has made it look so antiquated that I can only treasure it in my wardrobe as your gift, and thus still very dear to me." Beethoven was not then the great man of later days, or it is easy to believe that Germany would have echoed with the click of knitting-needles had it become known that he wanted an angola waistcoat; just as, according to Burke, had the age of chivalry not passed, a million swords would have leaped from their scabbards to avenge the wrongs of Marie-Antoinette. But it does not appear that Madame von Breuning complied with the master's request. Perhaps he had not sent his measure and the lady would not risk a guess at his rotundity. We learn, however, from a second epistle, that she forwarded something else. Beethoven writes: "The beautiful neckcloth, embroidered by your own hand, was the greatest possible surprise to me; yet, welcome as the gift was, it awakened within me feelings of sadness. Its effect was to recall former days, and to put me to shame by your noble conduct. I, indeed, little thought that you still considered me worthy of remembrance. Oh, if you could have witnessed my emotions yesterday when this incident occurred, you would not think I exaggerate in saying that such a token of recollection brought tears to my eyes and made me feel very sad." Not to be outdone in generosity, Beethoven sent with this letter a Rondo for pianoforte accompanied by violin, and begged Madame von Breuning to think sometimes of her "affectionate friend."

Next in order come the three famous love-letters found in the composer's desk after his death, and respecting which so much controversy has arisen and still continues. I have no intention to enter into the discussion here, nor will any conclusion be ventured upon either as to their true date or the person to whom they were addressed. Two things may be assumed—that Beethoven did not anticipate Mr. Toots in writing letters to imaginary correspondents, and that these are a genuine confession of love, made without reserve, and in the confidence of intimate communion. Where there is mutual affection, the power of interpreting its manifestations is usually found, otherwise Beethoven's inamorata would have had some difficulty in comprehending his exact meaning. A lover, of course, has a right to be rhapsodical, and he who does not, as such, indulge now and then in gushing incoherence, runs the risk of throwing doubt upon his passion. Beethoven, it must be confessed, used the right and avoided the risk. He begins the first letter with the invocation, "My angel! my all! my second self!"—expressions which, read in an action for breach of promise, would go far towards making up the mind of the jury. But no jury would understand this: "Why this deep grief when necessity compels?—Can our love exist without sacrifices, and by refraining from desiring all things? Can you alter the fact that you are not wholly mine, nor I wholly yours? Ah! contemplate the beauties of Nature, and reconcile your spirit to the inevitable. Love demands all, and has a right to do so; and thus it is that I feel towards you and you towards me; but you do not sufficiently remember that I must live both for you and myself. Were we wholly united you would feel this sorrow as little as I should." The letter then describes the troubles of a "terrible journey," and ends thus: "We shall, I trust, soon meet again; to-day I cannot impart to you all the reflections I have made, during the last few days, on my life: were our hearts closely united for ever, none of these would occur to me. My heart is overflowing with all I have to say to you. Ah! there are moments when I find that speech is actually nothing. Take courage! Continue to be ever my true and only love, my all, as I am yours. The gods must ordain what is further to be and shall be." It is no fault of Beethoven's that the allusions in this letter are obscure to a third party. They were intelligible enough to the second, we may safely presume; but it would seem that the lady had expressed impatience, after the manner of her sex, at her lover's absence, or, perhaps, at his want of decision. Beethoven's method of treating this impatience was certainly peculiar. The reminder that he had to live for himself as well as her was legitimate enough. There is, however, a tinge of harshness in the remark that, while she was not wholly his, neither was he wholly hers. But perhaps the most curious phrase of a letter which ends with a declaration that the "gods" are supreme, is that wherein, with a half-pagan philosophy, the master advises his beloved one to contemplate the beauties of nature, and thus reconcile herself to the inevitable. Few young ladies, we take it, would see the force of this. When in pouting mood they can understand soothing words and protestations of endearment; but a recommendation to take a walk in the fields and learn contentment from the serenity of nature would hardly have a calming influence. But Beethoven was fond of mixing up his love with philosophical reflections. In the second letter—written on the evening of the day when the first was penned—he speaks of being persecuted by the kindness of those around him, which kindness, he remarks, "I neither deserve nor try to deserve." The master continues: "The servility of man towards his fellow-man pains me, and when I regard myself as a component part of the universe, what am I? What is he who is called the greatest? And yet herein are displayed the godlike feelings of humanity. I weep in thinking that you will receive no intelligence from me till probably Saturday." Beethoven's heart here appears stronger than his head. As a component part of the universe—and such a little part!—he gathered from his philosophy that it mattered not much as to what chance befell another component part of the universe still smaller. But, as a man with something of the god in him, he actually wept at the thought that his loved one must wait five days for a letter. This is only a specimen of the contradictions which the practice of some forms of philosophy involves. Beethoven appears to more advantage when he writes of love alone: "Ah! where I am there you are ever with me. How earnestly shall I strive to pass my life with you, and what a life will it be! . . . However dearly you may love me, I love you more fondly still. Never conceal your feelings from me. Good-night. . . . Oh, heavens! so near and yet so far. Is not our love a truly celestial mansion, firm as the vault of heaven itself?" There is the ring of true ardour about these words, but they are cold compared to the expressions used in a letter written the very next day. Beethoven, who was at this time much concerned about his increasing deafness, had thoughts of distracting his mind and escaping the remarks of Viennese society by taking a long journey with his friend Pastor Amenda, and it is this intention he reveals in the third epistle, accompanied, as it were, by a very agony of love. Addressing the lady by the now famous term, "immortal beloved," he says: "I must live either wholly with you or not at all. Indeed I have resolved to wander far from you till the moment arrives when I can fly into your arms and feel that they are my home, and send forth my soul in unison with yours into the realm of spirits. Alas! it must be so. You will take courage, for you know my fidelity. Never can another possess my heart—never, never! Oh, heavens! why must I fly from her I so fondly love? . . . Be calm, for we can only attain our object of living together by the calm contemplation of our existence. Continue to love me. Yesterday, to-day, what longings for you! what tears for you! for you! for you! my life! my all! Farewell! Oh, love me for ever, and never doubt the faithful heart of your lover. Ever thine! Ever mine! Ever each other's!" It is worth observing that in his letter to Pastor Amenda Beethoven says not a word about the reason here assigned for his proposed journey. The "immortal beloved" was led to believe that her swain could not live "so near and yet so far." Amenda, on the other hand, heard of nothing save the troubles of deafness and the necessity of obtaining distraction from them. But Beethoven was just the man to be secretive in an affair of the heart, and it must be said for him that he made up for concealment by the outpouring of his passion towards the woman who had inspired it. One might suppose that the expressions just quoted came from a youth in the exaltation of his first love, instead of from a man more than forty years old; and, remembering this, it is easy to understand the protest made in Beethoven's celebrated letters to his brothers: "Oh, ye who think or declare me to be hostile, morose, and misanthropical, how unjust you are! . . . My heart and mind were ever from childhood prone to the tenderest feelings of affection." That Beethoven and the object of his ardent devotion were never united it is unnecessary to state, and nothing more dramatic can be found in the entire career of the master than the episode revealed by these three letters. So far as we know none went before them, and none came after them—the trio standing by themselves in one small group, as though to show of what passion the strange nature of the great tone-poet was capable.

The next letter is of a different character to the preceding, and has nothing to do with love, being, so to speak, a "society letter," addressed to one of the noble ladies—Baroness von Drossdick—who lavished upon Beethoven so many attentions in Vienna, regardless of the rebuffs to which they were exposed by the wayward disposition of their hero. As showing the nature of the intercourse existing between the master and his "well-born" female admirers, the letter is one of interest and value sufficient to make it noticeable here. We shall see from it that the musician stood upon an easy footing with them, and exercised a freedom which women permit only in the case of men whom they have exalted to a really heroic place. Addressing the Baroness as "My esteemed Therese," the writer goes on: "I hope, and do not doubt, that you are agreeably occupied and enjoying society (his fair friend had left Vienna for the country), but not too much, I trust, to prevent you thinking of us. It would show too much confidence in you, or too high an estimation of my own merits, were I to attribute the sentiment to you that people are not together only when present, but that the absent and the dead also live with us. Who could ascribe such a thought to the volatile Therese, who takes the world so lightly?" Beethoven then advises the Baroness not to neglect her music: "You who have so much feeling for the good and beautiful, should strive to recognise the perfections of so charming an art, which, in return, always casts so bright a reflection on us." He next enlarges upon enjoyment of the country: "How happy you are to get away so soon to the country. I cannot enjoy this luxury till the 8th. I look forward to it with the delight of a child. What happiness I shall feel in wandering among groves and woods, and among trees and plants and rocks! No man on earth can love the country as I do. Thickets, trees, and rocks supply the echo man longs for." Upon this, he invites himself, with the confidence of one who is always welcome, to look in some morning on his friend, and concludes: "Farewell, my esteemed Therese; I wish you all the good and charm that life can offer. Think of me kindly and forget my follies. Rest assured that no one would more rejoice to hear of your happiness, even were you to feel no interest in your devoted servant and friend." This is a very gracious and graceful letter, such as would do no discredit to the most accomplished man of the world; and it enables us to judge how far Beethoven, when in a good temper, could make himself agreeable to fair adorers. The delicate flattery of the composition is remarkable for a man who scarcely made flattery a study, and quite of a piece with his conduct when, on reaching the country house of the noble lady, and not finding her at home, he tore some paper out of a book, wrote music upon it to a verse of Matthisson's, and, having inscribed "To my dear Therese" on the other side, went away, leaving it on the table.

We now come to the letters addressed to Bettina Brentano, afterwards Bettina von Arnim, a lady well known from the position she occupied in the literary and artistic world of Germany, and through her friendship with Goethe. Bettina had made the acquaintance of the great master in Vienna—according to her own account through calling at his apartments, though Beethoven himself was under the impression that he had first met her in the Observatory during a May shower. One thing is certain—the two did meet and were mutually attracted. Beethoven at this time was forty years old, and less disposed than ever to come out of his reserve. But Bettina soon threw down the barriers that stood in her way, and made an illustrious captive. The first letter celebrates his enslavement quite poetically—for a man of forty: "Never was there a lovelier spring than this year; I say so and feel it too, because it was then I first knew you. You have yourself seen that in society I am like a fish on the sand, which writhes and writhes, but cannot get away till some benevolent Galatea casts it back into the mighty ocean. I was, indeed, fairly stranded by you at a moment in which moroseness had entirely mastered me; but how quickly it vanished at your aspect! I was at once conscious that you came from another sphere than this absurd world where, with the best inclinations, I cannot open my ears." How had the clever woman tamed the master thus? By, it is clear, her piquant talk upon art; for Beethoven goes on to say: "My dear friend! Dearest girl! Art! who comprehends it? with whom can I discuss this mighty goddess? How precious to me were the few days when we talked together, or, I should rather say, corresponded! I have carefully preserved the little notes with your clever, charming, most charming answers, so I have to thank my defective hearing for the greater part of our fugitive intercourse being written down." Like a young lover he then proceeds to lament that no angel met him in his lonely walks, and that he would gladly bury his head in a sack, since outside the sack there was no longer a prospect of beholding her. Finally he adds: "I send you 'Kennst Du das Land,' written with my own hand, as a remembrance of the hour when I first knew you; I send you also another that I composed since I bade you farewell, my dearest, fairest sweetheart." A second letter followed, in which the composer began by saying: "Though I do not frequently write to you, and you never see me, still I write you letters by thousands in my thoughts." Beethoven by this time knew that his fair correspondent was about to change her name for that of Von Arnim, and he was bound to congratulate her upon the fact: "You are going to be married, my dear friend, or are already so, and I have had no chance of seeing you even once previously. May all the felicity that marriage ever bestowed on husband and wife attend you both." The next words show us the current of his thoughts setting towards himself with a forlornness quite touching: "What can I say of myself? I can only exclaim with Johanna: 'Compassionate my fate.' If I am spared for some years to come, I will thank the Omniscient, the Omnipotent, for the boon, as I do for all other weal and woe." The depression here evinced—its cause is easy to surmise—runs through the letter. "I only came home this morning at four o'clock from an orgie, where I laughed heartily, but to-day I feel as if I could weep as sadly. Turbulent pleasures always recoil on the spirits." And again: "Now farewell, my dear, dear friend. I imprint a sorrowful kiss on your forehead, thus impressing my thoughts on it as with a seal." Bettina, possessed of a woman's instinct, could not have mistaken the purport of all this, and she must have been filled with compassion for the lonely master, whose great and warm affections, shut up in himself, were helping to burn his life away. The third and last letter, addressed now to Frau von Arnim, not Fräulein Brentano, is partly taken up with the well-known anecdote in which Beethoven contrasts Goethe's servility before the Imperial family of Austria with his own independence. The writer then goes on, still referring to Goethe: "Heavens! if I could have lived with you as he did, believe me I should have produced far greater things. A musician is also a poet; he, too, can feel himself transported into a brighter world by a pair of fine eyes, where loftier spirits sport with him and impose a heavy task upon him. What thoughts rushed into my mind when I first saw you in the Observatory during a refreshing May shower, so fertilising to me also. The most beautiful themes stole from your eyes into my heart, which shall yet enchant the world when Beethoven no longer directs. . . . Spirits may love one another, and I shall ever woo yours." The master concludes thus: "Adieu, adieu, dear one; your letter lay all night near my heart and cheered me. Musicians permit themselves great licence. Heavens, how I love you! Your most faithful friend and deaf brother, BEETHOVEN." This is the last of the letters to women written within the time to which attention is now limited. Are they not enough, both in number and character, to justify the confidence expressed at the outset? Unquestionably they are. We see through them right into the heart of the master, and observe with surprise what an amount of tenderness, sensitiveness, and capacity for loving existed beneath his grim and gnarled exterior. We observe it, too, with sadness, for nothing is more pathetic in the history of Beethoven than the contrast of what might have been, in the region of his affections, with what actually was. No wonder that he exclaimed against his lot; that he said hard words of life, the world, and fate; or that, when in the agony of death, he grimly muttered: "Applaud, friends, the comedy is finished!"

CINCINNATI used to be regarded as in the far west of the American Union, and no subsequent advance of civilisation towards the setting sun has transferred it exactly to the east. It is a young city still, and we are happy to know that in music, as in other things, it exhibits all the abounding life and enterprise of youth. We have before us the official programme of the Musical Festival which was to be held in Cincinnati on the 14th and three following days of the just-passed month of May, and a most satisfactory document it is. The Festival—third of a triennial series—took place, to begin with, in a new music hall, 192 feet long, 112 broad, and 70 high, capable of seating 4,400 persons, "with a generous provision for those who prefer to stand." This hall contains an orchestra sufficiently large to accommodate 1,000 performers, and an organ, by Messrs. Hook and Hastings, having in it 6,237 pipes. As regards a "local habitation," therefore, the Cincinnati Festivals are very well off indeed. As to the executive resources brought into play on the late occasion, it appears that the band numbered 106 instruments and the chorus 700 voices, chosen from the choral societies of the town and adjacent places, the whole being directed by Mr. Theodore Thomas, of New York celebrity, with Herr Otto Singer as assistant. Among the soloists announced were several ladies and gentlemen well known here, either personally or by repute, as, for example, Madame Pappenheim, whom Mr. Mapleson has engaged for his opera; Mrs. Osgood; Miss Carey, remembered as a contralto at Drury Lane in 1870; Mr. Charles Adams, a tenor familiar to Covent Garden in the days of the English Opera Company; and Mr. Whitney, who was not long ago amongst us. But the programme of the Festival is of greater interest than its personnel, and respecting it we read in the committee's preface: "The programme of the Festival of 1878 does not follow the precedents set forth by similar celebrations in Germany and England. It is not loaded down with compositions which, however excellent, when too numerous weary and satiate the listener." Let us see whether this was so. At the first concert were to be performed a new "Festival Ode" by Herr Singer, Beethoven's "Eroica," and some extracts from Gluck's "Alceste." At the second, Handel's "Messiah." At the third, Selections from Wagner, with Beethoven's Ninth Symphony and "Coriolanus" Overture. At the fourth, Liszt's "Missa Solennis" and Berlioz's dramatic Symphony, "Roméo et Juliette." In addition there were three Matinées, with very miscellaneous selections for the behoof of those whose musical digestion refused more solid food. The English reader will at once observe that the general character of the programme differs from that in vogue here on festival occasions. We prefer the great masterpieces of sacred art, and thereby gratify a decided national taste. But it must be admitted that the Cincinnati "scheme" was most valuable and interesting, not merely because of its wide scope, but on account of a happy mixture of unfamiliar works with those which have taken classical honours. How the festival prospered we do not know at the moment of writing, but we do know that it deserved to prosper, and that Cincinnati has a fair claim to the approval and admiration of all who desire the universal spread of a great and refining art.

IT may readily be imagined that at some future period those who turn to the newspaper records of the present day will be puzzled to discover what can possibly be meant by the party termed the "Jingoes." We who live in these exciting times, when the "Eastern question" absorbs the principal attention of our political leaders, know perfectly well that by this elegant designation the clamourers for war are distinguished from their more peaceful neighbours; and we cannot, I think, but feel humiliated at the reflection that it is from the rubbish sung at the Music Halls that this word has been coined. He must have been a wise man who perceived that the doggrel nonsense expressive of the woes of a jilted lover has had its day, and that to rouse the martial spirit of a lower-class audience, already excited by "refreshments," is now a really safe speculation. Patriotism is sure to pay when the political passions are stirred up by passing events; for it is surprising how those people will shout for war who have no intention of fighting themselves. As, according to the popular song which we have already alluded to, "we've got the men and we've got the money too," we are released from all anxiety as to any difficulty in furnishing the necessary material for instant hostile action, and have nothing to do, therefore, but to despatch our forces at a moment's warning and wish them all possible success. That this war feeling which has been got up at our Music Halls is likely to be stimulated as long as it will prove lucrative to its promoters is proved by the addition of yet another of these national effusions by a man who styles himself the "Champion Extempore Artist of the World," a copy of whose verses has been sent to, and, we hear, approved by, the Queen. In these it is said, that in consequence of the laming of the "plucky little bird" (meaning Turkey) the British Lion "stands erect to say a word." If such trash as this is to be taken as expressive of the voice of the people of England, it may truly be affirmed—reversing the oft-quoted saying—that if our most prominent public men have the making of the nation's laws, we care not who makes her songs.

IT is a fact almost universally admitted that, as a rule, musicians are not men of business; but the reverse axiom, that men of business are not usually musicians, does not appear so generally acknowledged. Persons, for example, who take shares in an undertaking, the working of which ordinary commercial people are presumed to be able to understand, have a perfect right to advance their opinions at the periodical meetings of the board as to how the expenditure can be kept within reasonable limits; but when the exhibition of musical art is to be relied upon as the means of obtaining a satisfactory return for the invested capital, we cannot but think that it is infinitely better to defer to the judgment of one who, in addition to being himself an artist, has been uniformly successful, by his able management of concerts, in securing excellent pecuniary results. Now Mr. Julian Adams—of whom we know nothing save that he has for many years directed the band at the Pavilion Gardens at Buxton, with honour to himself and profit to his employers—at this moment finds himself in the unpleasant position of being the one musician amongst a number of men of business; and if these men would only put trust in the experience of one who has so long served them faithfully, all would be well. But, having built a magnificent Concert Hall, they believe that they are justified in saving money by cutting down the numbers of the band engaged to perform during the season, or at least contenting themselves with inferior players. Mr. Adams, it appears, only asks for a band of twenty competent artists, and, considering that in the heart of the season the Gardens are likely to be filled by a tolerably critical audience, this is certainly not a very exorbitant demand. But the shareholders evidently think that the business can be performed cheaper; and as—the matter still remaining in abeyance—we hope and believe that the artistic press can help to strengthen Mr. Adams's cause, we willingly aid in giving publicity to the subject, and sincerely trust that he may be enabled to bring the Directors to a lively sense of their own interests.

THERE is evidently a very large amount of satisfaction in having a legal privilege to act differently from those around us whenever we feel inclined. We have seen many persons especially delighted at having the power to claim exemption from being placed on the jury list, because householders living within a few doors of them have been compelled to serve; and we all know the case of a certain nobleman who, by right, wears his hat in the presence of the reigning sovereign, whilst everybody else is uncovered. Now a piece of news comes to us from Belfast which should gladden the hearts of those who perform on wind instruments, for it proves that they have only to get into a "military band" and they may march through the streets and play as long as they please, whilst those who presume to do so as mere civilians can be at once indicted as disturbers of the peace. "There have been a good many musical amateurs fined lately," we are told in an Irish paper, "for marching along the thoroughfares," but the matter having been duly brought into court, the Bench refused to grant a summons against the member of a military band on the ground of his being privileged. If the "musical amateurs" who were fined belonged to a military band, we cannot but regard them as martyrs in the cause, and really think that the amount of their fines should be returned to them; but if they were civilians, the sooner they enter into the service of Her Majesty the better, for the pleasure of blowing their loudest before the houses of the very persons who summoned them, under the protection of the law (which may be managed by simply joining a volunteer band), will amply compensate them for any little sum they were compelled to disburse before the magistrate pointed out to them how easily they could take part in a "Promenade Concert" with impunity.

IN an Occasional Note in our last issue we quoted and made some remarks upon a contribution by Professor Howard to Church's Musical Visitor, in which he said many things not altogether in harmony with prevalent notions as to the state of musical culture among the German people. Both the Professor's paper and our own comments have excited the ire of Herr F. Sellon, who describes himself as a traveller, and dates from Hastings. Herr Sellon begins by declaring that there is no town called Koelsa, and that consequently there could not be in it the dreadful state of musical things described by Mr. Howard. This ought to suffice, just as the Cornish mayor's first reason for not ringing the bells—there being no bells to ring—made good Queen Bess careless as to the remainder. But Herr Sellon further asserts that no minister in Koelsa, if it existed, would ever attempt to play a waltz; that to expect "a number of great pianists or singers" in such a place would be unreasonable; and that German schoolmasters study the organ for three or four years at the Seminar. All this we leave Herr Sellon to discuss with Professor Howard, whom he would like to meet face to face for a talk over the "shameful critique." But our correspondent has a slap at England in return for our own remarks, and cries, "Oh, mein Gott!" as he calls to mind a concert at Hastings where, instead of the wind instruments of an orchestra, he found an ugly thing called an American organ. This, he says, would not have been possible in Germany, because, without a complete orchestra, the Germans would give no such concert at all. We suspect that is just it; and if the English in small towns are satisfied to perform great works with such resources as they can muster, there is nothing surprising in the fact that they are more musically cultured than the dwellers in similar places in Germany.

WE scarcely believe that our American friends will agree with us, but in our opinion the success of "Gilmore's Band" in this country cannot be in the slightest degree influenced by the issue of a pamphlet, as an avant courier, detailing the minutest particulars of the career of Mr. Gilmore, even from his birth "near the city of Dublin, Ireland, on Christmas Day in the year 1829." The qualifications of the Conductor of a band are determined by the manner in which he conducts; and we are too independent in our judgment to be swayed by the "Opinions of the Press" so extensively quoted in the pamphlet, already mentioned, which has been forwarded to us. It must be remembered, too, that the monster meetings in America over which Mr. Gilmore presided, although grand successes there, have not been so considered by several of the European visitors; and when we read, in a speech made to the great Conductor, after one of these musical gatherings, the following passage—"Europe has had her great and distinguished leaders and masters who have been famous and celebrated in your profession; but who beside our Gilmore has ever conceived the deep and awful bass of the booming cannon as the fundamental note to a national anthem with which to startle and astonish the world?"—many of us will smile at the idea of the laws of acoustics being so set aside that it becomes necessary to bring in gunpowder to aid the admitted feebleness of the music. Mr. Gilmore need not doubt that his talents will be appreciated at their true worth in England; but we should have preferred to receive him without his printed letter of introduction.

IN a notice, last month, of Franz's accompaniments to "L'Allegro ed il Penseroso," we said that, to the best of our knowledge, they had not been performed in this country. Mr. A. Manns writes to inform us that the first two parts of Handel's work, with Franz's additions, were produced at the Crystal Palace,

November 28, 1874. We are indebted to him for the correction, and take the opportunity of expressing a hope that the directors of the Crystal Palace Concerts will persevere in the course on which, four years ago, they set out. A propos to this, Mr. Manns intimates that other of Franz's "masterly additions" would have been introduced to this country but for the fact that some gentlemen of the press were, at that time at least, "highly prejudiced" against additional accompaniments, and it was thought such a course would only "invite abuse" of the eminent German's masterly filling up. We cannot see the sufficiency of the reason; because if hostile criticism is to be shirked in this manner, nothing new can be heard at all. Moreover, we would point out to Mr. Manns that persons who may differ from him on any given subject are not necessarily "prejudiced," nor does it follow that criticism with which he cannot agree is necessarily "abuse."

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

THE first appearance of Mdlle. Minnie Hauk as the heroine in the sickly sentimental Opera, "La Traviata," was a decided success; but her acting had much to do with the cordiality of her reception, for in spite of her excellent voice, a defect in her delivery of many of the impassioned phrases was observable throughout the evening. Her Rosina, in "Il Barbiere," was certainly better. Much of the brilliant music of the part was indeed finely sung, and the introduced song in the Lesson Scene—Eckert's "Echo Song"—was so perfectly rendered as to elicit a well-deserved storm of applause and a demand for its repetition not to be resisted. Mdlle. Hauk has gradually advanced in public estimation since the opening night, her Margherita, in "Faust," being one of her best performances; but we cannot understand why Mr. Mapleson should desire the public to regard her assumption of this part as a novelty, seeing it was one of her favourite characters when she appeared in this country about nine years ago. Madame Etelka Gerster returns to us with an increase of power, both as a vocalist and an actress; and her singing as Amina, in "La Sonnambula," and the heroine in "Lucia," especially, has placed her in the first rank of operatic artists. There can be little doubt that she will be the real attraction of the season; for although Mdlle. Mathilde Wilde—who made her début as Valentine, in "Les Huguenots"—was fairly well received, she has by no means the requisite qualifications to hold the position she aspires to. A good word must be said for the English contralto, Miss Cummings, who made her first appearance as the Page in "Les Huguenots," and displayed an excellent and carefully trained voice, although she has everything to learn as an actress. The only new-comer amongst the male artists who created any effect was Signor Dondi, whose début as Marcello, in "Les Huguenots," produced a favourable impression which was more than confirmed by his performance of Giorgio, in "I Puritani," a part in which he had to contend against the reminiscences of a formidable rival. Signor Fancelli is singing as finely as ever in some of the principal tenor parts; and Signor Campanini's return has unfortunately brought with it an infliction which, in spite of its announcement in the prospectus, we had hoped to have been spared—the reproduction of Marchetti's "Ruy Blas." We can scarcely expect that this work will be kept in the bills; but after its comparative failure during the last autumn season, why it is again forced upon the subscribers is a mystery only understood by the lessee and Signor Campanini.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

THE warm welcome given to Mdlle. Albani on her first appearance this season as Lucia in Donizetti's popular Opera, proved how thoroughly her return to the company is now looked forward to as one of the events of the session; and her subsequent performances as the heroines in "Faust," "Lohengrin," "Tannhäuser," "I Puritani," and "Rigoletto" have been a series of triumphs. Madame Adelina Patti, too, is still as great a favourite as ever, the attraction of her Caterina in "L'Etoile du Nord"—one of her very best parts—filling the house to overflowing on the first night of her performance this season. The assumption of the exacting character of Elvira in "Ernani" by Mdlle. Thalberg was, we think, an injudicious step, not only because it provoked comparisons with so many greater vocalists in the same part, but on account of its too seriously taxing those physical powers which, in this early stage of her career, should be allowed more gradually to develop. Her vocalisation was good, however, throughout the opera; and the applause with which her exertions were rewarded will no doubt effectually conceal the truth both from herself and her friends. M. Jamet, of whom we spoke in our last notice of this establishment, has not confirmed the favourable impression he produced on his début by his subsequent performance of Mefistofele, in "Faust," but he may be useful in the company if he do not persevere in soaring beyond his legitimate position. M. Maurel has proved a tower of strength in many operas—his Don Carlos, in "Ernani," especially demanding the highest praise—and Signor Gayarre alternates the principal tenor parts with Signor Nicolini. No novelty has yet been produced, but Victor Massé's "Paul et Virginie" is announced for the 1st inst., too late for notice in our present number.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

MENDELSSOHN'S Music to the "Midsummer Night's Dream" furnished the special attraction of the Saturday Concert on April 27. With the exception of the comparatively unimportant portions accompanying spoken dialogue, the work was given in its entirety. It is needless to dwell upon music so familiar to every musician as that of the "Midsummer Night's Dream," while many of our readers will be well aware how exquisitely its many beauties are brought out by the excellent orchestra over which Mr. Manns presides. Such a rendering of the Overture and Scherzo, more especially, it would be difficult to obtain anywhere else in England. The incidental solo music was sung by the Misses Allitsen, who also gave subsequently the charming Bolero from the second act of Auber's "Crown Diamonds" with much effect. Rubinstein's Ballet Music from his Opera "Der Dämon," which was performed for the first time in England at the same Concert, is, like most of this composer's later music, clever, but unequal and at times eccentric. Madame Arabella Goddard was the pianist on this afternoon, giving a very fine reading of Bennett's Concerto in C minor, and Mr. Edward Lloyd sang "Fra poco," from "Lucia," and a song by Blumenthal in his usual artistic manner.

At the following Concert M. Massenet, the French composer, was invited to Sydenham to conduct some of his own works. Those selected were the Overture, a Divertissement des Esclaves Persannes, and the Cortége Indien, from his Opera "Le Roi de Lahore;" and the Prelude, Invocation, and Danse des Saturnales from his music to "Les Erinnyes." There can be no question as to the great talent of the composer, but, to judge from the excerpts from his works given on this occasion, he seems to have a particular partiality for noisy instrumentation. Wagner's Overture to "Rienzi" (another specially noisy piece, by the way) was the opening number of the programme, which concluded with the Pastoral Symphony, the quiet instrumentation of which was all the more refreshing after the preceding pieces. Miss Agnes Zimmermann was announced to play Schumann's "Introduction and Allegro Appassionato" (Op. 92), but, in consequence of a domestic affliction, the talented pianist was unable to appear, and the number was omitted. The vocalists were Miss Anna Williams, who sang exceedingly well Liszt's fine Scena, "Jeanne d'Arc au Bûcher," and a song by Gounod; and M. Henrik Westberg, first tenor from the Opera at Stockholm, who made his first appearance in England, and by his performance of a song from Gluck's "Iphigénie en Tauride" and of Beethoven's "Adelaide," proved his possession of a very pleasing and well-trained voice.

The concluding Concert of the season was given on the 11th ult., when the greater part of the afternoon was occupied with a performance of Beethoven's Choral Symphony. Never, probably, have the instrumental portions of this grand work been more splendidly played than on this occasion. The solo parts were sustained by Mdlles. Thekla Friedländer and Redeker, Mr. Shakespeare, and Mr. Lucas Williams, and while it can hardly be said that either they or the chorus reached the same high standard of excellence as the orchestra (which, indeed, considering the extreme difficulty of the vocal portion of the music, was not to be expected), the rendering of the finale was very creditable. The Symphony was preceded by a short selection, the most important feature of which was the magnificent rendering, by Señor Sarasate, of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto.

Mr. Manns's annual Benefit Concert took place on the 18th ult., when a programme was provided of a more miscellaneous character than is customary at Sydenham. In saying this, we refer to the introduction of fragments instead of entire works. Thus, M. de Beriot played the first movement only from Grieg's Pianoforte Concerto, while the variations from Beethoven's "Kreutzer Sonata" were given by the same gentleman and Señor Sarasate. No doubt the reason for this was the extreme length of the programme, which, as it was, occupied very nearly three hours, and the desire to give as much variety and bring forward as many performers as possible. A benefit concert must not be judged from the same high artistic standpoint as that from which one would regard the Saturday Concerts in general. We do not mean to imply that anything unworthy of the reputation either of Mr. Manns or of the Crystal Palace was introduced; because, as a matter of fact, such was not the case. We simply say that from its fragmentary nature the Concert was musically less interesting than many of the series, besides being far too long. The most important items, in addition to those already mentioned, were Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony —placed at the end of the programme—a very clever Serenade for stringed orchestra, composed and conducted by Herr Henschel; the Overture to "Oberon;" and a Fantasia for violin and orchestra on themes from "Faust," composed and played by Señor Sarasate. The vocalists who appeared at this Concert were Miss Robertson, Miss Catherine Penna, Mdlle. Fides Keller, Mr. Barton McGuckin, and Herr Henschel.

THE BACH CHOIR.

THE second Concert of this Society, which took place in St. James's Hall on April 29, almost equalled in interest its predecessor, so fully discussed in our columns last month. Indeed, the programme was to some extent the same, for, owing to the manner in which Schumann's "New Year's Song" was received, and the general success of its performance, the directors thought a repetition of that fine work desirable. It was accordingly given a second time with, if anything, increased favour, and may now be expected to keep a permanent place in the repertory of English concert-rooms. For this we have to thank the Bach Choir, and especially that distinctive feature in its constitution which renders it independent of everything save regard for art. Let us hope that the obligation may be increased in future years. True amateurs, we venture to say, are prepared to sustain any amount of it. With the "New Year's Song" was given Bach's Magnificat—one of the old master's noblest contributions to the music of the Church. Here also the Choir has done good service by ensuring attention for a work often talked about by connoisseurs, but kept as a sealed book from the general public. The Magnificat has many elements of popularity apart from the respect which the name of its composer always ensures. Its airs and choruses are broader, simpler, and more Handelian in character than usual with Bach, while nowhere lacking in the wonderful invention which will make the master's art-work a study for all time. Its performance was a decided success, and established the fact that the "Magnificat" needs only to be heard a few times in order to find a good and permanent place in the estimation of music-lovers. Mendelssohn's ever-welcome "Walpurgis Night" closed the Concert with brilliant effect, affording, as it did, a splendid contrast to what had gone before. All the picturesqueness of this most descriptive work was well brought out by the orchestra and chorus, whose performance might have satisfied Mendelssohn himself, much as he thought of the scenes so vividly set forth. The Concert, as a whole, undoubtedly ranked among the successes of the musical season, and reflected the utmost credit not only upon Herr Otto Goldschmidt, but upon the solo vocalists, Madame Sherrington, Mdlle. Redeker, Mr. Shakespeare, Mr. Lammers, and Herr Henschel, the orchestra, and the admirable chorus, whose efforts we cannot too highly praise.

The third and last Concert of the season was given at St. James's Hall, on the afternoon of the 11th ult., when Bach's Mass in B minor—for the rendering of which this excellent Choir was instituted—was presented for the fourth time. Further acquaintance with this elaborate work has enabled the singers more perfectly to render, and the audience more thoroughly to appreciate, the many intricate contrapuntal effects with which the composition abounds; and its last performance was therefore not only the best, but the most successful with the listeners. The "Gloria," "Et resurrexit," and "Sanctus," were finely sung; and special praise must be awarded for the effective playing of the important obbligati passages by Mr. Svendsen (flute), Mr. Horton (oboe), Mr. Stennebruggen (horn), Messrs. Trout and Chisholm (bassoons), and Herr Straus (violin). The principal vocalists were Mesdames Lemmens-Sherrington and Patey, Mr. Cummings and Herr Henschel, all of whom gave the many exacting solos with their accustomed success. Herr Otto Goldschmidt conducted, and Mr. T. Pettit presided at the organ.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

THE vitality of Rossini's "Mosè in Egitto"—in spite of the necessity of the libretto assuming various shapes to suit the time and place—is a proof that good music can never die. Originally produced at the San Carlo Theatre, Naples, in the Lent of 1818, it was some years afterwards remodelled by the composer, given at the Grand-Opéra in Paris, where it met with but moderate success; the "Plague of Darkness" and the "Passage of the Red Sea" being scarcely suitable to the taste of an audience even ready to accept that strangely incongruous composition — a "Biblical Opera." In this country it was performed as an Oratorio, under the direction of Bochsa; afterwards at the King's Theatre, as an Opera with a libretto, under the title of "Pietro l'Eremita;" and we can well remember Henry Phillips as Moses at Covent Garden Theatre, where, during what were termed the "Oratorio performances" on the Wednesdays and Fridays in Lent, it was given with scenery and dresses, with some of the music of Handel's "Israel in Egypt" patched upon that of Rossini, according to the fashion of the time; a desecration of the works of both masters which was fortunately interdicted—not on artistic grounds, by the good sense of the public—but on religious grounds, by the Bishop of London. As "Zora" it was tried at the Royal Italian Opera, but the music could not save it; and to the energy and zeal of Sir Michael Costa, who on the 24th ult. produced it as an Oratorio at the Sacred Harmonic Society, we are indebted for a revival of the composition in a form perhaps of all others the most appropriate. The English version, prepared by Mr. Arthur Matthison expressly for the occasion, is excellent, not only because it varies but little from the original text, but in its adaptability to the music, every note of which has evidently been in the mind of the author during the performance of his task. The preparation of the Oratorio reflects the utmost credit upon all concerned; for to ensure so perfect a rendering of music which, excepting the well-known Prayer—an addition of the composer after its first performance in Naples—was no doubt almost unknown to most of the members of the choir. The grand and massive choruses with which the work abounds were given with a precision of attack and beauty of tone impossible to be overpraised: finer choral singing has rarely, if ever, been heard at the Sacred Harmonic Society; the pathetic Prayer which opens the Oratorio and the finale to the second part proving that deep expression as well as power were thoroughly under the control of the Conductor, and that, on this occasion at least, he ruled his forces with a wise discretion. The solo vocalists were Madame Sherrington, Madame Enequist, Miss Julia Elton, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. W. H. Cummings, Herr Henschel, Mr. Bridson, Mr. Wallace Wells, and Mr. Hilton; Miss Anna Williams and Mr. Santley (whose places were supplied by Madame Enequist and Mr. Bridson respectively) being unable, from indisposition, to sing. It would be unnecessary to dwell on the excellent manner in which the many exacting solo portions of the Oratorio were rendered by the artists named, but we may say that a great effect—indeed the great effect—of the evening was created by Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Bridson in the Duet, "Oh, Fate! how tell," the really superb singing of Mr. Lloyd exciting the audience to such a pitch of enthusiasm that it was with difficulty the ringing applause with which the composition was greeted could be restrained until its conclusion; Mr. Bridson also coming in for a fair share of these almost overwhelming marks of approval. Other numbers which should be specified are the Quintett, "Oh Thou who grief consolest" (Madame Enequist, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Cummings, Herr Henschel, and Mr. Bridson), the Quartett and Chorus, "My heart sinks within me" (Madame Sherrington, Madame Enequist, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Cummings), and the Duet, "Whither would'st thou lead?" (Madame Sherrington and Mr. Lloyd), some of which, but for the length of the work, would doubtless have been encored. The rich instrumentation, especially observable in some of the quieter portions, came out with admirable effect; but we confess that in many of the choruses we should have preferred to hear the score as Rossini wrote it. The obbligati passages—particularly those for oboe and clarionet—were admirably played, and the harp, in several important accompaniments, was skilfully handled by Mr. Cheshire. We have said that as an Oratorio the composition is likely to find more favour in this country than in any other form, but this is only because the nature of the subject prevents its reception with stage accessories; for assuredly the music is throughout as secular as that in any serious Opera of its composer. Whatever may be its ultimate fate, however, we owe a deep debt of gratitude to Sir Michael Costa for placing before us a work so thoroughly reflective of the brightest portion of Rossini's career; and the directors of the Sacred Harmonic Society may be assured that in so liberally seconding the intentions of their Conductor they have materially added to the reputation of an Association which has already done so much for sacred art in England.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

AT the fifth Concert, on the 1st ult., the performance of Mendelssohn's pianoforte Concerto, in D minor, by M. Planté, was the prominent feature. In these days of "higher development" it is positively refreshing to listen to such artistic and legitimate playing as that of the French pianist, whose special aim seems to be that of exhibiting his own high powers by clearly revealing the beauties of his author. His expressive and refined touch were heard to much advantage in the Adagio; and the Finale was given at a speed which would have been dangerous to one less perfect in technical accuracy. His success was most decisive with the audience, and in the second part of the programme his rendering of Mendelssohn's Caprice, Op. 16, his own arrangement of Boccherini's "Menuet," and Liszt's "Mélodie Hongroise," elicited a storm of applause. The marvellous execution of Senor Sarasate, in Raff's three movements from his Suite in G minor for violin and orchestra, fairly astonished his hearers, the "Moto perpetuo," especially, being played with an ease which effectually concealed its extreme difficulty. As an encore he performed a Spanish Dance, which was equally well received. The orchestral pieces were Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, Mozart's "Jupiter Symphony," and Auber's Overture to "Masaniello." Mdlle. Riego made but little effect in Handel's showy Air, "Sweet Bird"—the flute obbligato, however, being excellently played by Mr. Svendsen—but the expressive little song by Giordani, "Caro, mio ben," was effectively sung by Mdlle. Redeker. The sixth Concert, on the 22nd ult., included the fine violin playing of Signor Papini, who performed Spohr's Dramatic Concerto with much success. Miss E. C. Thursby, from America, made her début on the occasion, and elicited well-deserved applause by her singing, both voice and method justifying us in predicting for her a high place amongst concert-singers. The Symphony was Schubert's in C, and the Overtures Sterndale Bennett's "Naiads," Beethoven's "Leonora," No. 3 (encored), and Weber's "Oberon." Mr. W. G. Cusins was, as usual, the Conductor at both Concerts.

OPERA-COMIQUE.

THE production of the new comic Opera, on the 25th ult., called "H.M.S. Pinafore, or The Lass that loved a Sailor," the libretto by Mr. W. S. Gilbert, and the music by Mr. Arthur Sullivan, confirms us in the opinion we expressed in noticing "The Sorcerer," that this firmly cemented union between author and composer is detrimental to the art-progress of either; however, they may succeed in satisfying the temporary taste of an Opéra-Comique audience. Offenbach has shown us how merely lively and pleasing tunes can attract the general public; but Auber has proved that something higher is demanded for what is understood as "comic opera;" and that Mr. Sullivan has in him the true elements of an artist, which would be successfully developed were a carefully framed libretto presented to him for composition, can scarcely be doubted. Having thus conscientiously discharged our duty as art-critics, let us at once proceed to say that "H.M.S. Pinafore" is an amusing piece of extravagance, and that the music floats it on merrily to the end. The story—which turns on the love of a young sailor for his Captain's daughter, a happy dénoûment being brought about by the declaration of a bumboat-woman that, having two children to nurse, she "mixed them up," and that the Captain should be the common sailor, and the common sailor the Captain—lends itself very well to the musical treatment it has received; and the serious manner assumed by the Captain (excellently played by Mr. Barrington), and the imperturbable official bearing of Mr. Grossmith, jun., as Sir Joseph Porter (First Lord of the Admiralty), materially enhance the effect of the concerted pieces in which they are concerned. Amongst the best of these we may name the opening solo, with chorus, of the Captain, in which the responses of the crew are cleverly managed; the finale to the first act, ending with a tuneful dance; a trio for Sir Joseph, the Captain, and his daughter, Josephine, where each character is supposed to be ringing the wedding-bells; and a portion of the ensemble, in which the young lover, Ralph Rackstraw, is warmly congratulated by his companions on the fact of his being an Englishman—all these pieces being enthusiastically encored. A duet, too, in which the morose member of the crew, Dick Deadeye, informs the Captain of the intended elopement of his daughter, is full of character, and was also redemanded. As a rule, the acting was better than the singing; but Miss Emma Howson, who made her first appearance in London as the Captain's Daughter, created a highly favourable impression, the whole of her music, especially the ballad, "Sorry her lot who loves so well," being given with much purity of style. A printed apology was circulated in the house for Mr. Barrington, who was evidently suffering from a severe cold, but he manfully sang the whole of his music. Mr. Power as Ralph Rackstraw, Mr. R. Temple as Dick Deadeye, and Miss Everard as the bumboat-woman, thoroughly entered into the humour of their parts, and the Chorus seemed to have been well drilled. The first song of Sir Joseph, detailing the manner in which he had gradually risen to his exalted station, was redemanded; but the unaccompanied glee, for Ralph, Boatswain, and Boatswain's Mate, was too imperfectly sung to warrant us in speaking of its merits. The Opera was carefully placed upon the stage, and Mr. Sullivan, who conducted, was called for at the conclusion, and appeared, accompanied by Mr. Gilbert.

MADAME VIARD-LOUIS'S CONCERTS.

THE third of this series of Concerts was given at St. James's Hall on the afternoon of the 30th April. A novelty in the programme was a "Suite" by M. Massenet, especially written for the occasion, and conducted by the composer. The "scènes dramatiques," of which this work consists, are illustrative of certain portions of Shakespeare's plays. No. 1, "Ariel and the Spirits" ("Tempest") contains much fanciful writing, reminding us occasionally of Mendelssohn; but the best of the three movements is No. 2, "The Sleep of Desdemona" ("Othello"), which is an exceedingly graceful and imaginative piece, and highly suggestive of the subject. The Finale, "The Witches," "The Apparition," "The Banquet," and "The Coronation" ("Macbeth"), vividly colours these incidents of the play, one of the points worthy of special mention being the subject representing the banquet scene, which creeps in after the interruption of the feast by the ghost of "Banquo," as if desirous of continuing the revelry in defiance of the apparition. The bright effect of the March, too, in the last division of the movement, happily illustrates the Coronation, and concludes a composition which we trust may often obtain a hearing when so excellent an orchestra can be assembled to do justice to its merits. Another example of French "programme music" was the characteristic "Danse des Sylphs," from "Le Damnation de Faust" of Berlioz, which created such an impression as to cause a demand for its repetition not to be resisted. Madame Viard-Louis displayed good executive power in Hummel's pianoforte Concerto in B minor, but was scarcely so successful in Beethoven's Sonata in D major, known as the "Pastoral." The exceptionally fine qualities of the band (under Mr. Weist Hill) were amply evidenced in Beethoven's "Leonora" Overture (No. 3), Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony," and Sterndale Bennett's Overture, "The Wood Nymphs." Madame Lemmens-Sherrington was the vocalist.

BOROUGH OF HACKNEY CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

THE last Concert of the season was given on the 6th ult. at the Shoreditch Town Hall, before a large audience. The gradual advance of this Society, not only with respect to the art progress among its members, but in the estimation of the general public, has within a comparatively short period so attracted the attention of the musical press to its performances that both the Choir and its excellent Conductor, Mr. Ebenezer Prout, may fairly congratulate themselves upon the success of their labours and nerve themselves to increased exertion in the future. The rendering of Niels W. Gade's Cantata, the "Crusaders," at the final Concert was in every respect thoroughly worthy of the reputation of the Association, the Choruses being given with the utmost precision, with due attention to gradations of tone, and with a dramatic colouring positively essential to the due effect of the work; the picturesque instrumentation, too, receiving the utmost justice from a small but most efficient band. The principal vocalists were Miss Marian Williams, Mr. Barton McGuckin, and Mr. Thurley Beale, all of whom sang well; Miss Williams, although the music was unquestionably too low for her, giving with much intelligence the long and exacting solo for Armida, "They softly sleep in cool and peaceful night!" Mr. McGuckin displaying a good voice and style in the "Crusaders' Song," and Mr. Beale singing the impressive music of Peter the Hermit with a thorough appreciation of the composer's intention. The excellent qualities of the Choir were again most successfully tested in the rendering of Handel's Chorus, "Crown with festal pomp," from "Hercules," in the second part, and in Horsley's Part-song, "See the chariot at hand." A good word must also be given for Miss Marian Williams's unaffected and artistic interpretation of Mozart's "Vedrai carino." Sterndale Bennett's descriptive and highly poetical Fantasia-Overture, "Paradise and the Peri," Gounod's "Funeral March of a Marionette" (the demand for the repetition of which was happily resisted, and Auber's Overture, "Le Cheval de Bronze," were the purely orchestral pieces, and all were finely played. Mr. Ebenezer Prout conducted with his accustomed skill and earnestness, and received from the audience an ovation which he has legitimately earned. Amongst the works promised for next season are Schumann's music to "Faust," Handel's Chandos Anthem, "O praise the Lord with one consent," Dr. Bridge's Oratorio, "Mount Moriah," Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night," Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen," and Brahms's "Song of Destiny."

THE Two Hundred and Twenty-fourth Anniversary Festival Service of the Sons of the Clergy took place in St. Paul's Cathedral on Wednesday, the 15th ult., the arrangements being similar to those of former years. Dr. Stainer had an excellent band of fifty under his command, and the opening part of Spohr's fine Overture to the "Fall of Babylon," which preceded the Service, was quite enough to satisfy the most critical as to the efficiency of that part of the band which is perhaps most difficult to obtain in anything like perfection—the wind instruments. In the Overture the snare drum, which we think was used for the first time in St. Paul's, must have slightly shocked those who are not yet convinced that the church is quite a suitable place for this kind of instrumental music; but, to our thinking, the effect was by no means secular, and it certainly would have been a great pity if Dr. Stainer had omitted this instrument, which gives special character to what we suppose must be called the Persian part of the Overture. The usual proper Psalms were sung by the Cathedral Choir to single chants, but both the auxiliary choir and band joined in the Glorias, making a most befitting close to each Psalm. The Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis were sung to music specially composed for the occasion by Mr. Eaton Faning, a young composer of much promise. The composition must be acknowledged to be most successful, and Mr. Faning has given us a very valuable addition to our stock of orchestral settings of these Canticles. The instrumentation, too, was fresh and effective, while the vocal part was free from those ambitious and unnatural strainings after effect which so frequently mar the efforts of young composers. The Anthem was Spohr's thoroughly devotional Cantata, "God, Thou art great"—a work not sufficiently well known inside the walls of our churches. The solo parts were sustained by the following members of the Cathedral Choir: soprano, Masters Whittle, Terry, and Banemann; alto, tenor, and bass, Messrs. Frost, Kenningham, and De Lacy. In this, as in all the other vocal parts of the Service, the Choir showed the true characteristics of a highly trained body of vocalists—promptness, purity of tone, refinement as to general expression, and in nice gradations of power; all were here, and the result was, as might be expected, a service of almost unexampled excellence. Mr. G. C. Martin, sub-organist of the Cathedral, presided at the organ throughout the whole Service with his accustomed and recognised ability.

THE Gregorian Association held its Annual Festival in St. Paul's Cathedral on the 16th ult., and attracted an immense congregation. The Choir, which numbered 1,200 voices, sang generally with fine precision and with marvellous effect. Mr. Warwick Jordan, the organist to the Association, presided at the organ as usual, and played with extreme care and judgment. The Processional Hymn was, "Advance! advance! the day is come!" to the German Choral, "Ein Feste Burg," and produced perhaps the most majestic effect of the whole Service. The Psalms selected were the 92nd and the 122nd, and were, as a whole, well sung. The Magnificat was sung to a setting of the Seventh Tone, and the Nunc Dimittis to the Third Tone (Cologne use). The Anthem was Dr. Croft's "Cry aloud and shout," which perhaps was not a wise selection for such an enormous choir. The effect of the first part was simply stupendous, but in the fugal movement (a style, by the way, utterly unsuitable for such an occasion) the voices and instruments, to say the least, were rather wild, and had it not been for the organist's judgment and determination, perhaps the result would have been a complete failure. The Offertory Hymn was, "Of the Father, sole begotten," and after the Blessing "Jerusalem the Golden" served as a Retrocessional. The Rev. H. C. Shuttleworth intoned the prayers.

THE fifth annual meeting of the London Church Choir Association was held on Tuesday the 7th ult. at the Cannon Street Hotel. Through the unavoidable absence of the President, the Rev. W. C. F. Webber, from ill health, the chair was taken by Mr. Horace Buttery, an old supporter of the Association. The balance was not so favourable as that shown at the last meeting; but it was explained that an additional expense on that of the previous year's festival had been incurred for the hire of chairs. had, however, been fully compensated by accommodating 1,000 more people in St. Paul's Cathedral than hitherto. Some discussion took place as to the arrangement at the previous festivals in the Cathedral, and alterations affecting one or two points will be tried on the next occasion. The mode of carrying out the practices will be modified in future, and it was agreed that in cases of new choirs wishing to join the Association they will be required to pass a test of efficiency. A hope was expressed, and cordially concurred in, that the Association might be able to lend its aid to appropriate Charities. The meeting concluded with a vote of thanks to the Chairman and Choirmaster, and to those gentlemen who had given their services at the last festival.

MR. JOHN FARMER'S Oratorio, "Christ and His soldiers," produced recently at Harrow, at which school Mr. Farmer has long been the Musical Professor, was performed for the first time in London, at Exeter Hall, on Saturday last, the 25th ult. Mr. Farmer's work, which is simple and unpretending in character, having been written mainly with the object of being sung to children, consists of two parts composed of popular hymns set as solos and choruses to original music, and representing scenes in the life of the Saviour. The solos were effectively sung by Miss Fonblanque (who replaced Miss Robertson), Miss Annie Butterworth, Mr. Arthur Hooper, and Herr Henschel, the latter artist creating a very marked impression in the Solo and Chorus, "When our heads are bowed with woe." The band and chorus, which consisted of about 300 performers, were alike efficient, and were ably directed by the composer, who was warmly greeted both at the commencement and termination of the work. The Concert, which was given in aid of the Convalescent Home in connection with King's College Hospital, was attended by a crowded audience.

AT the seventy-fourth monthly Concert of the Grosvenor Choral Society on the 26th April, Haydn's "Spring" was successfully performed; and mention must also be made of the effective rendering of Weber's Concertstück by Miss Marie Odell. The solo vocalists were Miss Josephine Fulham, Mr. Arthur Weston, and Mr. Henry Baker; and a feature in the selection was a violin solo, well played by Mr. S. Dean Grimson, the leader of the band. The programme of the Concert on the 17th ult. was entirely miscellaneous, including Stevens's Glee, "The cloud-capt towers" (encored), several Part-songs, and the Madrigals, "Hark! how the birds" (Lahee), and "Now is the month of maying" (Morley). The soloists were the Misses Wilkinson, Lewer, Hemming, and Frame, Messrs. Arthur Weston, T. Nettleship, and Henry Baker. Mr. J. G. Callcott conducted at both Concerts.

THE 140th Anniversary Festival of the Royal Society of Musicians was held at Willis's Rooms on the 3rd ult., under the presidency of the Right Hon. Sir. Alex J. E. Cockburn, Lord Chief Justice of England, who made an eloquent speech in advocacy of the claims of the Society to public support. Amongst the other speakers during the evening were Lord Dudley, Lord Hampton, Professor Macfarren, and Mr. John Hullah. A selection of instrumental music was performed by Madame Arabella Goddard (pianoforte), Señor Sarasate (violin), and the following vocalists contributed solos: Miss Mary Davies, Madame Mudie-Bolingbroke, Mr. W. H. Cummings and Mr. Maybrick. The London Vocal Union, under the able direction of Mr. Fred Walker, also lent efficient aid. The vocal music was accompanied by Mr. Charles Gardner and Mr. Fountain Meen.

ON Tuesday, the 6th ult., at Upper Norwood, the foundation of a new Church, dedicated to St. John the Evangelist, was laid by Rowena Mildred Bateman. There was a numerous attendance of both clergy and laity. After the ceremony a procession was formed into the temporary church where Evensong was held. The prayers were intoned by the Rev. F. Bateman (Vicar), and the sermon preached by the Rev. G. H. Wilkinson (Vicar of St. Peter's, Eaton Square). The service was musical throughout, the Choir being strengthened by Messrs. T. Large, Beckett, and Arthur Wilkinson, who sang in the Anthem "I have surely built Thee an house," by Dr. Boyce. Mr. Westropp Wilkinson, the Organist, presided in a most efficient manner, and the whole of the music was conducted by Mr. Ralph Wilkinson (gentleman of Her Majesty's Chapel Royal).

ON Monday evening, the 20th ult., Dr. Bridge, of Westminster Abbey, opened the organ newly erected in St. Mark's Church, Walworth. The programme contained Mendelssohn's Sonata, No. 2; Allegretto in C, by Gade; Introduction and Fugue (A minor), Handel; Barcarole, Sterndale Bennett; and Bach's Prelude and Fugue in B minor. The performance of all these works was excellent, great judgment being displayed in the use of the solo stops. The organ was purchased by the Rev. R. R. Resker, the Vicar, from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and removed from St. Dionis Backchurch (now being pulled down) by Messrs. Maley, Young, and Oldknow, Organ Builders, King's Road, St. Pancras. It was built by Renatus Harris in 1724, and contains three manuals and twenty-seven stops.

MR. CHARLES LUNN gave a lecture on "Vocal Expression" in the concert-room of the Royal Academy of Music on the 17th ult., in which he ably advocated the necessity of training the intellectual as well as the vocal powers of those who desire to express their words according to their meaning; the only question being—if we may judge from the method exhibited by the lady who sang "Rose softly blooming"—whether he does not push this theory somewhat beyond the legitimate province of the "singing master." We cannot say that Mr. Lunn brought forward any novel views, but what he said was well said; and those who desire to form a more intimate acquaintance with his method should consult his many writings on the subject, all of which are most earnestly and conscientiously written.

A SPECIAL Service was held at All Saints' Church, Kensington Park, on April 30, on the occasion of the unveiling of a new reredos and three new stained-glass windows. The Service was the Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis in F (E. H. Birch); Anthems, "I have surely built Thee an house" (Boyce), "King all glorious" (J. Barnby); Te Deum in F (S. S. Wesley), all of which were effectively rendered. The solo parts were taken by Messrs. J. Lyndon Hodges, Stedman, and Horscroft. The accompaniments were played by the Organist, E. H. Birch, Mus. Bac., Oxon., who has brought this Choir to a high state of efficiency. The church was crowded, Bishop Jenner and the Archimandrite of the Greek Church occupying places amongst the clergy.

MISS ELIZABETH PHILP gave a Concert at St. James's Hall, on the 20th ult., before a numerous audience. The programme consisted principally of vocal compositions, and included a large number of the songs of the concert-giver, all of which, judging by the warm applause with which they were greeted, are likely to become general favourites. Miss Philp was assisted by several eminent vocalists, a débutante, Madame Emily Davison, gaining a well-deserved encore for Gounod's "O that we two were maying;" and in the instrumental department by Herr Frantzen and Miss Cronin (pianoforte), and Herr Van Biene (violoncello). The Conductors were Sir Julius Benedict, Mr. Louis Diehl, and Signor Randegger.

THE second annual Concert of Mr. George Gear, which was given at St. George's Hall on the 14th ult., afforded this rising young artist an opportunity of exhibiting his powers, both as a pianist and composer, to much advantage. His Quartett for stringed instruments, and "Valse Fantastique," for pianoforte, were greatly admired; and three songs, given respectively by Madame Patey, Mr. Lloyd, and Miss Leonora Braham, elicited enthusiastic applause, the one assigned to Madame Patey, "The day is done," being redemanded. In all his solos Mr. Gear was thoroughly successful, his performance of the pianoforte part of Mendelssohn's Trio in C minor (with MM. Wiener and Albert) being especially worthy of praise.

THE St. George's Glee Union gave its usual monthly Concert at the Pimlico Rooms on Friday, the 3rd ult., when Sir Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen" was given in a very satisfactory manner, the Choir, under the conductorship of Mr. T. Garside, doing full justice to the choruses. The soprano music was very well rendered by Miss Jessie Royd, and the tenor and bass by Messrs. Faulkner Leigh and R. F. Roberts; Miss Clara Nash was the contralto, and Miss Ellen Bliss accompanied. A short first part consisting of Part-songs, songs by Miss Nash and Mr. R. F. Roberts, and a pianoforte solo by Miss C. Lockwood completed a most satisfactory programme. Mr. Joseph Monday conducted.

AN Evening Concert was given by Miss Julie Sydney on the 16th ult. at the Beethoven Rooms, before a large audience. Miss Julie Sydney gave great satisfaction in her several songs, and Mesdames Eugenie Samuell, Alma Yorke, Lucia Lyall (who possesses an admirable contralto voice), Mr. Stedman (in "A Sea Song" by H. J. Stark), Signor Urio (in two Italian airs), and Mr. Theodore Distin (in "O ruddier than the cherry"), were all highly successful. The pianoforte playing of Messrs. E. H. Thorne and W. S. Hoyte was much admired, as was also the harp solo of Herr Oberthur.

A SUBSCRIPTION Concert was given by Miss Ada Holman at the Drill Hall, Ealing Dean, on the 22nd ult., in aid of the Ealing Almshouses Building Fund. The artists were Madame Cellini, Miss Marion Beard, Mr. Faulkner Leigh, Mr. C. J. Vincent (who was very successful in two German songs by Hoffmann), and Signor de Lara; Miss Ada Holman, Mr. Oliver King, and Mr. H. Parker (piano), Madame Varley-Liebe (violin), and Miss Marion Beard and Herr Oberthur (harp). Miss Holman's piano solos and a duet by Saint-Säens (in which she was joined by Mr. King) were much appreciated.

THE Lee and Lewisham Musical Society gave its first public Concert on the 30th of April, at the Union Chapel, High Street, Lewisham, under the conductorship of Mr. Sydney Cozens. Part I. consisted of Mendelssohn's "Athalie," the soloists being Madame Worrell-Duval, Miss Edith Lancaster, and Miss Dones. The illustrative verses were recited by Mr. Evan Pryce Jones, and the accompaniments were played by Mrs. B. Miller, who was joined by Miss Ada Walker and Mr. W. Shepherd (harmonium) in "The War March." Part II. was miscellaneous, and consisted of secular music.

AN exceptionally attractive concert was given at the Athenæum, Camden Road, on Saturday the 25th ult. in aid of a local charity. The vocalists were Madame Rose Hersee, Madame Trebelli, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Maybrick, and the Vocal Quartett. Solos on the pianoforte and violin were contributed by Madame Arabella Goddard and Mr. W. H. Eayres, the latter of whom was joined by Mr. Sidney Naylor in Beethoven's "Kreutzer Sonata." The continued indisposition of Mr. Santley prevented his appearing as announced. The concert was in all respects very successful.

MR. GEORGE WATTS, the energetic musical director to Messrs. J. B. Cramer and Co's. establishment at Brighton, announces during the month of June a Concert at the Pavilion, which will no doubt prove one of the principal attractions of the season at this fashionable watering-place. The vocalists are Mdlles. Minnie Hauk, Valleria, Hélène Crosmond, and Tremelli, Signori Campanini, Béttini, Del Puente, Foli, and M. Thierry. M. Victor Buziau will be the violinist and Mr. Willem Coenen the pianist.

WE are gratified to learn that the efforts of the Committee of the Alfred Stone Memorial Fund have resulted in a sum of £2,147 7s. 3d. being subscribed. The incidental expenses amount to £51 19s. 11d., leaving £2,095 7s. 4d. available for the objects in view. This sum has been handed over to three trustees for investment for the widow and children. The members of the Festival Choir have, by a special subscription, raised a sufficient sum to erect a suitable monument to the memory of Mr. Stone.

THE Stradivarius violin, date 1704, known to connoisseurs as the "Betts Strad," has been purchased by Mr. George Hart for the sum of eight hundred guineas. Some seventy years since it was bought by John Betts, the violin maker, for a sovereign, and he declined all offers of sale, though the then unprecedented sum of £500 was tendered. After his death it was disposed of to M. Vuillaume, of Paris, and afterwards to M. Wilmotte, of Antwerp, from whom its late owner purchased it.

MR. CHARLES GARDNER gave a Morning Concert at Willis's Rooms on the 21st ult., before a highly appreciative audience. In addition to the excellent pianoforte performance of the bénéficiaire (who played his own Sonata in A) the rendering of the several pieces included the valuable services of Herr Ludwig (violin), Herr Daubert (violoncello), and Mr. W. G. Cusins (pianoforte), the singers being Mr. Shakespeare and Mdlle. Redeker. The vocal music was accompanied by Mr. Fountain Meen.

ON the occasion of Mr. George Legge resigning the post of organist and choirmaster of St. Thomas's Church, Regent Street, W., to accept a similar appointment at St. Stephen's, Haverstock Hill, the members of the choir invited him to a dinner, when they presented to him a handsome case of silver dessert-knives and forks, as a mark of their affection for, and the high esteem in which they held him.

AN afternoon concert was given by Miss Mathews and Herr Louis Röver at Steinway Hall on the 11th ult. The programme consisted of Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion," which was very creditably sung by a small amateur choir, a Trio by Beethoven, Duet for violin and pianoforte (Schubert), and Solos by Miss Mathews, which were received with much applause. The vocalists were Miss Purdy and Mr. Henry Taylor.

MR. STEDMAN'S Concert on the 15th ult. at the Birkbeck Institution attracted a crowded audience, who showed their appreciation of an admirable programme excellently performed by Madame Liebhart, Miss Alice Parry, Madame Osborne Williams, Miss Kate Leipold, Mr. Stedman, Mr. J. L. Wadmore, Mr. Howard Reynolds (cornet), Messrs. Hoyte and Stark (pianoforte). Several items in the programme were enthusiastically encored.

THE competition for the Lady Goldsmid Scholarship at the Royal Academy of Music took place on the 29th of April, the examiners being Sir Julius Benedict, Messrs. H. C. Lunn, Brinley Richards, Dr. Steggall, and the principal, Professor Macfarren. There were twenty-three candidates, and the scholarship was awarded to Beatrice Frances Sarah Davenport.

THE closing Concert of the second season of the Grove Park Choral Society, Chiswick, was held at the New Vestry Hall, Turnham Green, on the 1st ult., when the chief feature in the programme was the late Sir Sterndale Bennett's Cantata, "The May Queen," which was very well rendered. Mr. Theodore Drew conducted with his usual ability, Miss B. F. Wyatt being again the accompanist.

THE following works will be performed by the Plymouth Vocal Association during the coming season: "Elijah," "Joseph" (Macfarren), "Messiah," and "Israel in Egypt." Mr. Löhr will conduct as usual.

WE regret to announce the death of Mr. Tyler, the well-known first clarinet at the Royal Italian Opera. Mr. Tyler will be regretted not only as a thorough master of his instrument, but for his many amiable qualities.

REVIEWS.

A Dictionary of Music and Musicians (A.D. 1450-1878). By eminent writers, English and Foreign. With illustrations and woodcuts. Edited by George Grove, D.C.L. Part II. [Macmillan and Co.]

A GREAT feature of the second part of this work is the exhaustive article upon Beethoven, by the editor, which occupies upwards of ninety columns. For this paper the most reliable authorities have been consulted, and the result is as excellent and well-digested a biography as the limits of this Dictionary could possibly admit of. The account of the composer's life in Vienna is especially good; and the various points of his character, as developed by the circumstances with which he was surrounded, are shown with an impartiality which is infinitely superior to that hero-worship which renders so many memoirs of the great men of the world almost valueless. We must likewise mention in the highest terms the sketch of the career of Sir Sterndale Bennett, which not only does ample justice to his talent, but records the principal events of his life with an accuracy which contrasts strangely with the biography of this artist by M. Fetis, to which we recently referred in our reviewing columns. The article upon Berlioz, too, fully proves that the editor of this work, although pledged to complete it within a couple of volumes, is resolved not to grudge space for those who are worthy of it; and we are glad indeed to see that the claims of a composer of such decisive originality as Hector Berlioz—whose influence, as is here stated, "has been and will again be felt far and wide"—have been fairly set forth and ably urged in this Dictionary by so zealous a champion. Bellini, Sir Henry Bishop, and many others, have also sufficiently prominent positions in the work. It may be remembered that in our February number we called attention to the fact of Mr. J. A. Novello having supplied the English text to Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang," instead of Mr. William Ball (as stated in the first part of the Dictionary); but in the notice of Mr. William Bartholomew in the second part, this error is repeated. Let us hope, therefore, that a supplement at the conclusion of the book will rectify this and some other mistakes almost inevitable in a work of so comprehensive a nature; and whilst pointing out minor inaccuracies, it may be well to state that Dr. Bexfield's Anthems were not posthumous publications, but were issued in November, 1849—four years before his death. Musicians will, we think, be surprised to find the name of Antoine Edouard Batiste omitted altogether, considering how many of his compositions are constantly before the public, and that a whole column is devoted to him in the recently published Supplement to Fetis's "Biographie Universelle des Musiciens;" and it seems strange, also, that we miss any mention of Dr. Armes (of Durham), Dr. G. B. Arnold (organist of Winchester, composer of the Oratorio, "Ahab"), Frederic Archer, and some others we could mention. Of course we do not deny the privilege of the editor to reject any names he may think proper; but when, for example, in the first part of the Dictionary Signor Agnesi has no place, and a column is given to Belletti in the second part, we cannot quite see the principle of selection. The few woodcuts and musical illustrations in the second part are exceedingly clear; and although so large a space is devoted to the biography of Beethoven, the work has advanced as far as Boieldieu.

A Book of Musical Anecdote; from every available source. By Frederick Crowest, author of the "Great Tone Poets." 2 vols. [Richard Bentley and Son.]

THE title of this work conveys but an imperfect idea of its contents. Mr. Crowest is already known as the author of a book on the "Great Tone Poets" (as it is the fashion now to term the high-class composers), and feeling, we presume, that he has not there said as much as he wanted to say upon his favourite art, he has collected his opinions in two fairly sized volumes, and preceded or followed them by anecdotes, "many of which," he says, "are new, many old; some have been in print before, and some have not." Now we cannot but think that Mr. Crowest would have done more justice to himself, and earned a fairer hearing from those whom he addresses, had he allowed his well-considered remarks to appear without the stories, or the stories without the remarks; for in the work before us it is difficult to know whether the anecdote is hunted up to give force to the opinion, or the opinion written to give force to the anecdote: in either case we are inclined to believe that both are materially weakened by the union. Take for instance the following: "Lully lost a leg on this wise. The King of France, Louis XIV., was once ill and nigh unto death. He recovered, however, and the Court musician was directed to compose a Te Deum in grateful celebration of the event. On the night of its first performance the composer himself conducted, and, finding that the band was getting a little unsteady, in his excitement he struck his foot with the bâton, with which he was conducting. The blow caused a blister, which became so violently inflamed that his physician advised him at once to have a toe taken off, and, after some days, his foot, and at last he had to lose the whole limb." A little incident like this is interesting enough as far as it goes; but on such slender materials our author thus moralises: "Now this is worth the attention of Conductors. There is no prescribed style of conducting, a fact well known to all frequenters of concerts or operas. On the other hand, we all know there is all the diversity of styles that could be wished for. One Conductor treats us to a definition of the circle in indicating common time, another patronises the statuesque style, and goes through the whole performance 'as cool as a cucumber;' another is frantic or fearfully agitated, and taxes to the utmost the stability of the stool on which he sits. Between these two latter we may see every variety; and in making our choice of any one style we shall probably do well to avoid both extremes, not forgetting the warning of the consequences of Lully's over-vehemence." Artistically there can be no doubt that an orchestra should be directed firmly, yet quietly; but avoiding "over-vehemence" for fear you should lose a leg reminds us of the man who, not being able to find boot-hooks when about to put on his boots, used two forks, one of which sprang upwards and destroyed the sight of an eye, and so—he never wore boots afterwards.

But although we may take exception to the general design of the work, we cannot but express our admiration at the industry of the author in collecting so vast a number of anecdotes upon the art, some of which are admirable, and all indeed well worthy of being preserved. Of course we cannot hold Mr. Crowest responsible for the authenticity of every story; but, as he truly says in his preface, "they are all characteristic of the persons of whom they are told." Amongst the musical opinions, too, we light upon many truths which are generally conveyed in forcible language, and are good enough indeed to be published apart from the anecdotes with which they are connected. With some of these remarks, however, we cannot agree; as, for instance, where, after "following Bombet's fancy," as our author says, of comparing painters with composers, he places Wagner with Millais, Mendelssohn with Turner, and Spohr with Constable; but Mr. Crowest of course speaks solely from the impression upon himself; and the history of music will prove to us the different effect of "tone-poems" upon different individuals, even upon those whom we should imagine the most competent to judge. It would be impossible from the 253 anecdotes contained in these volumes to name even half of those which we think especially entitled to attention; and as our reviews do not include extracts, save in illustration of our remarks, readers will not be surprised that, in recommending the work, we do not partially forestall their pleasure in reading it by transferring a number of Mr. Crowest's anecdotes to our own pages. A very commendable feature in the arrangement of the stories is their division into four classes, Book i. containing those relating to Composers, Book ii. to Singers, and Book iii. to Instrumentalists, Book iv. being miscellaneous. We have also a carefully compiled index, in which reference is made to the page in which an artist's name is mentioned. In conclusion we may say that the work is in every respect so well got up that, in addition to the attraction of its contents, it will make an elegant book for the drawing-room table.

Novello's Music Primers. Edited by Dr. Stainer.
Counterpoint, by J. Frederick Bridge, Mus. Doc., Oxon., &c. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

DR. BRIDGE has performed with great dexterity one of the most thankless tasks that can fall to the lot of a modern musician. He has added yet another compilation of the ancient rules of counterpoint to a wearisome list of predecessors reckoned almost by thousands. The author of the Primer on "Counterpoint" discovers at once his special aptitude for the work he has undertaken. In a few introductory observations, he not only provides for us a condensed history of the art, exhibiting its growth from the embryotic diaphony to the highly organised modern fugue, but allows us to see that, imbued with the modern spirit he is thoroughly prepared to meet the inquiries of a too sceptical student. When he tells us that, instead of reproducing examples from Fux and the old contrapuntists, he has written more modern examples for the Primer himself, we are to understand that the art of counterpoint has passed through two remarkably distinct periods, known in music as those of the old and new Tonalities. We have therefore in collating the traditional rules to separate, not exactly the wheat from the chaff, but the rules which are suited to modern requirements from those that are not. The examples Dr. Bridge has given are such as would naturally be expected from a writer of his position and titles in the faculty he represents. The "hood," however, is not necessarily a guarantee for the extreme care and conscientiousness so evident in every page of the treatise we are noticing. The student in reading this Primer will generally find anticipated in the text accompanying or explaining each example most of the stereotyped objections made by generation after generation to this or that "stupid rule" in counterpoint. He will be taught gradually to comprehend, if out of the 131 paragraphs the book contains at least 100 are bonâ fide rules, and not half a dozen amongst them of any use to the modern composer, that, nevertheless, every ancient rule had some good object under the conditions prevailing when it was made; and in certain given species of counterpoint those conditions must always be supposed to prevail. It is of no use adapting the rule to other conditions, but it is always well to understand its object and compare what seems to be intended with our modern harmony notions. Sometimes it may happen, as a result of such comparison, that instead of abolishing the old rule we are inclined to abolish the harmony notion. No musician, of course, thinks of neglecting counterpoint; but it is better, if only for their negative value, not even to neglect the old rules, however inconsistent they may appear, or in some instances are, as Dr. Bridge himself is not afraid to show us.

In his introductory observations Dr. Bridge says: "In England and in some other countries it became customary to teach harmony only, or at any rate before counterpoint. To a certain extent a reaction has set in and many eminent musicians now urge that counterpoint should be taught with and made the basis of harmony." The suggestion involved in that quotation is so interesting, we venture to do little more than draw attention to it. To dilate on the subject would involve a dissertation. We apprehend that Dr. Bridge approves the suggestion. If so, many will be of his opinion; but perhaps with the reservation that its adoption would require a complete change in current methods of teaching harmony. For example, we cannot write counterpoint harmony-wise, and with modern complications, and treat each part as evolved from the harmonic series of one fundamental. It is a significant fact, that theorists of the now rather antiquated "harmonic school" have sneered at Palestrina and the contrapuntists. The reaction Dr. Bridge refers to has set in, and the harmonic series itself is being relegated gradually to a more subordinate position as an exemplar in harmony. To demonstrate the occasional antagonism necessarily arising between harmony according to any system and counterpoints formed on scale subjects, we need only refer to paragraph 52 in this Primer. "There are cases," we are told, "where a perfect fifth must be treated as a discord," &c. That may be perfectly correct as an old contrapuntal rule, but as a question of harmony, in no conceivable case can a perfect fifth be treated as a discord. Dr. Bridge treats the note B in the fifth E-B resolving on E-C, as most people would treat it, as a leading note, prolonged or projected into the tonic triad. To treat it as a discord in obedience to old rules we have to "imply," not a whole fundamental series of harmonics having nothing whatever to do with the context, but simply that the leading note is sounded with the tonic on which it finally resolves, and the appearance of which in the meantime it is made to retard. In that sense, as a melodic note of retardation, the ancients called it a discord. It is, mutatis mutandis, precisely the same in the case of the suspension. It is an immense assistance in these questions to treat with comparative indifference the note of prolongation, and consider only the sound on which we intend that note to resolve, and the harmony of the second chord, or chord of resolution, which it disturbs. Dr. Bridge has hit upon the right method in paragraph 25. We wonder he has not made more use of it. The task, however, he had to perform was of a certain kind and bound within very precise limits. What he set himself to do he has done thoroughly. For an example in florid counterpoint introducing points of imitation, Dr. Bridge acknowledges his indebtedness to his old master, Sir John Goss. One or two examples in counterpoint in six parts are by Dr. Keeton, of Peterborough. James Higgs, Esq., Mus. Bac., hon. secretary of the Musical Association, has assisted Dr. Bridge with valuable suggestions. The parentage and sponsorship of the treatise are accordingly sufficient guarantees as to its value. It is in all sincerity a careful and judicious compilation, neither blemished, as such things might be, by modern harmony "fads," nor by a blind faith in the wisdom of our forefathers.

Semele. An Oratorio. Composed in the year 1743 by G. F. Handel. Edited, and the Pianoforte accompaniment revised from that of the German Handel Society, by Ebenezer Prout. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

FOR want of a better term this work may be called a "Secular Oratorio;" but in truth, save from its length, it might with more propriety be entitled a "Serenata." Arnold, evidently not wishing to style it an Opera, mentions it as a "dramatic performance," and certainly the nature of the libretto precludes the possibility of our surrounding it with any religious associations. Victor Schœlcher in his "Life of Handel" classifies it with "Acis and Galatea," and dwells on the absurdity of the feeling which, in the composer's time, prompted persons to forbid "Esther" or "Judas Maccabæus" to be played in action, whilst they could listen with equanimity to "Semele" even in Lent, because it was "after the manner of an Oratorio." Whatever name we may give to this composition, however, there can be no doubt that it contains some very fine music, many of the choruses, indeed, being in the master's best style. The pianoforte accompaniment in this edition is mainly that prepared for the German Handel Society by E. F. Richter, only a few passages, which were not very close to the original score, having been modified by the editor. We cordially commend this publication to the attention of the many admirers of Handel in this country, to whom the music will have all the charm of novelty.

Sonatas for the Pianoforte. Composed by W. A. Mozart. Edited and fingered by Agnes Zimmermann. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

UNIFORM with the Octavo edition of Beethoven's Sonatas, this volume—precisely the same in its contents as the folio edition, but re-engraved for publication in this shape—is now issued for the benefit of those who care not for possessing these compositions in a more luxurious, but certainly less portable, form. In our former notice of these beautiful Sonatas we expressed a hope that they may be more placed in the hands of young pianoforte students than they have hitherto been; and their publication at a still lower price will unquestionably have the effect of additionally stimulating both teachers and pupils to become more intimately acquainted with compositions of such high artistic importance.

Lieder ohne Worte; for the Pianoforte. Composed by F. Mendelssohn Bartholdy. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

NOTHING need now be written respecting the intrinsic value of this casket of musical gems; but that the whole of the eight books, forming the complete work, are contained in the two cheap editions now before us cannot be too widely known. We have carefully looked through the volumes—which are identical, as far as the contents are concerned, the sole difference being that the music extends to 155 pages in one edition, and is contained within 102 pages in the other—and find not only that the engraving is beautifully clear in both, but that they have been thoroughly revised by comparison with the latest issues of the work in Germany, some few points, which have always been open to question being, as it appears to us, satisfactorily cleared up; as only one proof of which we may mention that the direction "Piano agitato" (No. 5, Book 1), hitherto printed in English editions, is now marked, as it was doubtless intended, "Poco agitato." Although the "Lieder ohne Worte" have now made their way into the homes and hearts of the majority of musical amateurs, we can scarcely doubt that this publication of them in what may be termed "people's editions" will materially extend the popularity of these pianoforte poems throughout the country.

A Calm Sea and a Prosperous Voyage. Composed by L. Van Beethoven. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

ALTHOUGH this work is issued as one of the series of "Novello's Octavo Choruses," it was called by the composer himself a Cantata, and certainly is important enough to justify that title. It is marked "Op. 112," and notwithstanding its having been performed in Germany on Christmas Day of the year in which it was composed (1815) it was allowed to remain in manuscript until 1823. Beethoven's admiration for Goethe's poetry is well known; and this setting of his words, although a small tribute from a kindred mind, is so thoroughly sympathetic with the text that we cannot but wonder that it is as yet but little known in this country. In 1867 it was given by Mr. C. J. Hargitt at St. George's Hall, and three years afterwards at one of the Crystal Palace Concerts; but in consequence we presume of its not being accessible in the popular form now before us, our numerous Choral Societies have yet to make its acquaintance. The composition is written entirely for chorus and orchestra, the calm and melodious beauty of the opening movement most effectively contrasting with the more agitated character of that portion illustrating the "Prosperous voyage," the accompaniment to which flows on almost uninterruptedly in triplets of quavers throughout the movement. An excellent translation of the original has been supplied by the Rev. J. Troutbeck; and the score, which consists of Flutes, Clarionets, Bassoons, Horns, Trumpets, Tympani, and Strings, is carefully indicated wherever necessary in the pianoforte accompaniment.

Jubilate. Von Georg Friedrich Händel, bearbeitet von Robert Franz. [Halle: Heinrich Karmrodt.]

Last month we directed the special attention of our readers to the general fact that many of Handel's finest compositions remain unfamiliar, either because the original thin score has not been filled up, or because the filling-up is not generally known. We also asked attention to the particular case of "L'Allegro ed Il Pensieroso," and pointed out that Herr Franz's thoughtful and judicious accompaniments to that noble work, being generally available, remove the only obstacle to its taking a proper place in our Festival and other programmes. Let us now do the same good office for the Utrecht "Jubilate," which Herr Franz, ten years ago, took into his careful hands, and, with the peculiar instinct that belongs to him, fitted for modern use. We doubt if more than a very small proportion of those who really love Handel, and claim to rank as connoisseurs of his works, know much about the Utrecht "Jubilate." All the same, however, it is one of the old master's grandest pages. When Handel was chosen by Queen Anne (against precedent, he being a foreigner) to write music in celebration of the peace of 1713, he had only been in England a little while on his second visit; he was in the full vigour of early manhood, and it was necessary for him to make the fullest possible use of an opportunity so distinguished. That he should give his Royal Patroness of the best appeared to him a matter of urgent policy as well as of duty, and in the "Te Deum" and "Jubilate" we have the master's greatest powers exemplified—an exemplification rewarded by a life-pension of £200. Handel appears to have himself thought well of the work, inasmuch as he took it with him down to Oxford, along with "Athalia," when he visited that city for the Public Act, or, as we should now call it, the Commemoration, of 1733. Music at this festivity was something new, and, many worthy people thought, something not good. Master of Arts Hearne, for example, wrote in his diary, "The players might as well be allowed to come and act;" and called Handel and his "forreign fidlers" a "lowsy crew," which was neither polite nor refined of Master Hearne, but rather of a piece with a vulgar ballad-opera of the period wherein mention is made of "that cursed Handel, with his confounded oratorios." However, the "Jubilate" was performed, and "Athalia" also, to the profit of the master and the satisfaction of music lovers. We do not wonder that the Utrecht music made a "hit." Its mingled softness and grandeur, simplicity and science, are remarkable, even for Handel, and we have abundant reason for regret if in any degree the shifting current of taste has left it—the "Jubilate" especially—high and dry on the sands.

Franz has treated the work with all his admitted skill. Leaving the composer's own score, as far as it has come down to us, intact, he has added parts for additional instruments with wonderful feeling for the style and character of the original. Especially interesting is the chorus, "Oh, be joyful," with its parts for horns, flutes, oboes, clarionets, and bassoons; and not less so the beautiful duet, "Be ye sure that the Lord He is God," throughout which a judicious use of the wind instruments gives colour and variety alike charming. But we need not discuss details. Franz is now acknowledged as the prince of musical "restorers," and our duty is done when we have called attention to the works upon which his skill has been lavished.

Hushed in Death. A Serious Glee for S.A.T.B., by Henry Hiles, Mus. Doc., Oxon.

Hence, loathed Melancholy! A Cheerful Glee for five voices, by Henry Lahee.

Humpty Dumpty. Humorous Glee by Alfred J. Caldicott, Mus. Bac., Cantab.

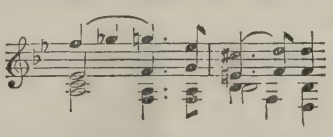
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Let us take this opportunity of thanking the worthy members of the Manchester Gentlemen's Glee Club for doing good suit and service to a distinctively English branch of musical art, not only by promoting a knowledge of works already existing, but by stimulating the production of others. There are, we are glad to say, many associations throughout the kingdom which keep alive regard for the ancient forms of national song, but beyond this do little or nothing to perpetuate them. The members of those associations should be better advised. They should call to mind the fact that in art as, for example, in the case of our English oak, as soon as growth stops decay begins, and that real vitality always implies a power of accretion. We do not know whether the Manchester Gentlemen's Glee Club systematically recognises this; but, at any rate, when prizes were offered this year for the best cheerful and the best serious glee, a step was taken worthy of all praise, and of that which is the sincerest form of praise—imitation.

Dr. Hiles's "Hushed in Death" is the composition which carried off first honours in the class "serious," and a right good thing we pronounce it to be without fear of contradiction. The poetic subject is elegiac:—

> Hushed in death the minstrel lies,
> By his tomb bright eyes are weeping.

The earth is his pillow, "but his soul is with us still," and through all changes he will live in story, unborn millions chanting the praise his strains have won. Here is a wide sweep of feeling from the sadness of death to the grandeur of immortal renown, and Dr. Hiles's music goes with it, always ample in, and appropriate of, expression. The first section is an Adagio (B flat), opening solemnly with the male voices in four parts, and so harmonised as here and there to suggest the manner of Spohr:—



A change of expression on the words "But yet his soul is with us still" delicately indicates an alleviation of sorrow without interfering with the generally sad character of the movement, and altogether the Adagio begins the little work well. A brief Moderato e marcato, in the same key, "Time may move with changeful course," checks the otherwise too rapid transition from the mournfulness of the leading section to the joy of the Finale, which is a fugue, "Unborn millions chant the praise," clearly wrought and effective from beginning to end. Dr. Hiles has not forgotten that more is expected of an English glee-composer than of one who manufactures German part-songs, and he has shown that the contrapuntal knowledge which distinguished our old masters is not entirely neglected by their descendants. The Fugue is a good thing, interesting as such, and containing moreover real vocal parts which can be sung with pleasure. Regarding the Glee as a whole, we will only add that if it did not deserve the prize it won, a very remarkable work indeed must have escaped the notice of the judges.

Mr. Lahee's setting of the opening lines of Milton's "L'Allegro," obtained the Manchester prize for a "cheerful" composition of its class. It begins with a movement in C minor, directed to be sung "heavily and in firm time," massive as to character, and decidedly effective. Let us add that the music is none the worse for suggesting Handel, as in the subjoined example—while it is not unworthy, by reason of the correct and easy flow of the parts, to be in the manner of the great old master. The invocation to Euphrosyne has, of course, a very different character. Here, all is lightness and grace (the key changing to C major), and we consider that Mr. Lahee has been particularly happy in his setting of the passage "Jest and youthful jollity," &c., a simple phrase, airily treated in imitation, producing the best effect. At "These delights if thou canst give," another change takes place. The music becomes more sedate, and a tuneful, plainly harmonised movement ends the work. We should add that the composer has been careful not to exact too much from his executants. The glee is an easy one, and as pleasing as easy.

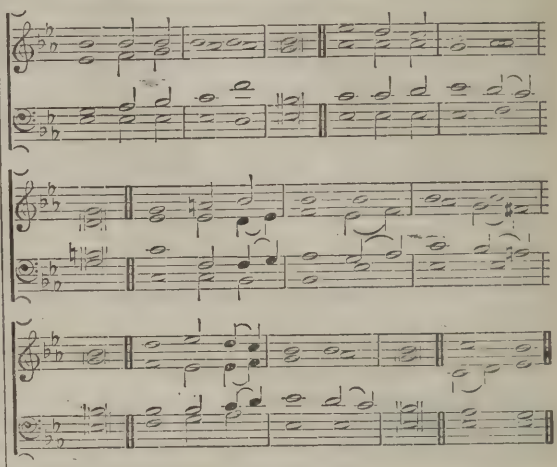
Mr. Caldicott entered as a competitor for the Manchester "cheerful" prize, and his "Humpty Dumpty" was the competing work. But the judges appear to have thought that it should stand in a class apart, and hence the composer received a special prize. This was quite right, for under seeming burlesque the Glee discourses, like another "fool in the forest," on questions of pith and moment. Does not the tragedy of "Humpty Dumpty" teach us the instability of even exalted things, and that one downfall awaits every man from which there can be no recovery? Mr. Caldicott puts the moral clearly before us. He insists through forty-one bars that Humpty Dumpty actually did sit on a wall. We must not forget the wall. Humpty Dumpty was exalted above most. But Humpty Dumpty fell. Perhaps he was ambitious over much, and sought to stand on the wall. As to that history is silent. He fell, we know; and Mr. Caldicott, after telling us so Impetuoso, laments the fact in a bar and a half of Adagio. But he soon proceeds to the moral, reiterating through several pages that all the regal resources in horses and men were impotent to undo what had been done. Nay, he makes a contribution to history, and avers that both men and horses "tried, but couldn't." We should like to know Mr. Caldicott's authority for this statement, because authentic and accepted record says nothing about it. However, it only serves to enforce the moral here set before us, and we hope that, whenever Mr. Caldicott's agreeable music is performed, both singers and audience will take to heart a solemn lesson.

A Selection of Tunes. Composed and arranged by James Comley. [B. Williams.]

To the making of psalm-tunes there is no end, and the most conscientious reviewer could hardly afford to give, under ordinary circumstances, more than a few lines of notice to any average collection. But the work now before us does not appear under ordinary circumstances. It is interesting to think, with Gray, that every English village churchyard contains the bones of some "mute inglorious Milton," and even of a Handel or Beethoven who could never tune his lyre because, though possessed of the tone-poet's soul, he had neither instrument nor instruction. But it is still more interesting to meet with one of these lowly sons of art in actual life, and to see opened to him the "door of utterance" through which he can pass into the view of his fellows. That happens in the case before us. Mr. Comley is a genuine "man of the people," the only one of his family who has ever risen above the rank of a day-labourer, while the outpourings of his muse owe little to anything save an inborn spirit of song. He says, "I only know music as I know grammar, that is, by ear. I don't know the meaning of (musical?) terms, and I cannot play anything by note, and nothing correctly with notes. I never had any lessons, and never belonged to any choir or any society." In the absence of merit a confession like this would only require the comment "Ne sutor," &c., coupled with a warning against presumption; but Mr. Comley's tunes have merit, and not a few of them, taken in connection with the words to which they are allied, possess a value above the average on account of their truthful expression. The composer naïvely tells us that the tune on p. 19, "Far from my heavenly home," is his "favourite;" and as it assuredly presents noteworthy features, looking to the source whence it comes, we transcribe it:—



We have said enough, perhaps, to excite some little interest in Mr. Comley's book, and we earnestly trust that its publication may result in some support to his declining years, and some solace in the midst of his afflictions.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THERE can be no doubt that the tide of popularity which some years ago turned so decidedly in favour of the works of Herr Richard Wagner is still gaining strength in Germany. The enthusiasm and energetic devotion of the more immediate disciples of the poet-composer in propagating the doctrine of the new art-work have indeed never been questioned. That, however, operatic managers of establishments unsubsidised by Government should one by one include in their répertoire albeit only portions of the gigantic Nibelungen-Tetralogy—an undertaking which, from a financial point of view, must always be an unremunerative one—argues the existence of a popular demand which they cannot afford to ignore. Nor should it be overlooked that the adequate production of the opera-dramas in question makes both upon conductors and performers such exceptional demands as can only be realised by earnest and enthusiastic devotion to their task. We have already chronicled in these columns the performance on various German operatic stages of parts of the Nibelungen-Ring, notably that of "Walküre" at Schwerin, which for some weeks had attracted numerous visitors to the Mecklenburg town. The Leipzig Stadt-Theater has, however, been the only one, as yet, to give consecutive representations of the two first dramas of the Tetralogy—viz., "Rheingold" and "Walküre." The performances commenced on April the 28th, and have since been continued at intervals with immense success, and meeting with the approval even of those who have learnt to be fastidious by being present at the Bayreuth Festival. Much praise is bestowed upon the intelligent zeal of the conductor, Herr Sucher, as well as upon the principal artists engaged in the performance. Thus the spell may be said to have been broken, and the possibility demonstrated of producing Herr Wagner's work even outside the precincts of the little Bavarian town, with a more limited expenditure of time in preparations, with an orchestra of less individual excellence than that assembled at Bayreuth, and with an average company of earnest lyrical artists. Perhaps even some day the Tetralogy may be introduced to an English audience on a London stage! The projected performance at the Court Theatre at Munich of "Siegfried" has been postponed until the early part of this month, in consequence of an accident which happened to Herr Vogl (who is to interpret the hero) during a private rehearsal of the work, in which King Louis and Herr Wagner formed the sole audience.

The season of Italian Opera at the Kroll'sche Theater, Berlin, which came to a close last month, has been promptly succeeded by a new series of representations of opera in German, chiefly of a lighter character. During her stay at the Prussian capital, Madame Etelka Gerster has been the object of such enthusiastic demonstrations of popular favour as, according to the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung, have almost recalled the days of a Sontag or a Jenny Lind. The gifted singer was nominated Chamber-singer to the Emperor, besides being the recipient of valuable presents on the part of his Majesty and other members of the Imperial family.

Filippo Marchetti's opera, "Ruy Blas," newly arranged for the German stage, has been selected by the Court Theatre at Dresden for the occasion of the forthcoming celebration of the silver-wedding of the King of Saxony.

Under the direction of Herr Hans Von Bülow, the first representation of Herr Rheintaler's opera entitled "Edda," took place last month at Hanover. The work, which was excellently performed, met with a very favourable reception.

The annual Music-Festival of the Lower Rhine will be held on the 9th inst., at Düsseldorf, and will, as usual, occupy three days. Schumann's "Faust" music, Gluck's "Orpheus," and Brahms's Second Symphony, are among the most interesting numbers of the programme. Herr Anton Rubinstein, who was originally to have conducted the performances, has resigned his bâton to Herr Joachim, in consequence, it is said, of the fatigues which the former artist has undergone during the past season.

Herr F. Hiller's new choral work, "Rebecca," is shortly to be performed at Stuttgart.

Herr Wilhelmj, the eminent violinist, has again been seriously ill during his visit to Italy, but is now on the way to recovery. The great artist is stated to have entered into an engagement for a concert-tour in North America extending over seven months, and commencing in autumn next, for which he will receive the sum of £10,000.

Mdme. Pauline Lucca, whose name now but rarely appears before the public, has recently created great enthusiasm at the Imperial Opera at Vienna in her impersonation of the rôle of Donna Anna in "Don Giovanni."

On the occasion of M. Faure's benefit performance at the Imperial Opera at Vienna, the Orchestra played a new Gavotte by Signor Arditi, which was unanimously redemanded by the auditors. Both M. Faure and Madame Nilsson have left the Austrian capital, neither of these artists intending, it is said, to accept any operatic engagement for the present. The performances of Opera in German at the Imperial establishment in question commenced on the 4th ult. with Gluck's "Armida."

It is announced in the Neue Freie Presse that Madame Marchesi, the celebrated professor at the Conservatorium of Vienna, has yielded to the solicitations of her numerous friends and has decided to remain with an institution where she has for many years rendered such valuable service. The journal quoted adds that, directly the lady's intention to resign her present post became known, propositions were made to her by some twenty-five similar institutions both in Germany and elsewhere.

A Concert has been given by the Leipzig Conservatorium, the proceeds of which will form the nucleus of a fund for the erection of a church to be placed at the disposal of the English residents in that town. As is well known, the Leipzig Conservatorium numbers, as a rule, more English-speaking pupils than any other similar establishment on the Continent.

The second Mozart Festival is to be held at Salzburg about the middle of next month, under the conductorship, as last year, of Herr Dessoff. The orchestra will consist of members of the Imperial Opera at Vienna, as well as of musicians from various German music institutions.

Herr von Wolzogen, the zealous commentator on the works of Herr Wagner, has a new work in the press, wherein he examines, from a philological point of view, "the diction of Richard Wagner's poetry."

A new choral and orchestral work entitled "Barbarossa's Erwachen," was performed for the first time last month at Darmstadt with great success. The author, both of poetry and music, is Herr C. A. Mangold, and the work is said to be one of exceptional merit.

On the occasion of the opening of the Paris Exhibition on May 1, a Concert was given at the Elysée, under the direction of M. Colonne, consisting entirely of orchestral works by Mozart, Gluck, Rameau, Méhul, Beethoven, Weber, Mendelssohn, and Thomas. The date fixed for the commencement of the Exhibition Concerts is the 6th inst., and the opening performance will be devoted exclusively to works by French masters, viz.: First part of "Le Désert" (Félicien David); "Prométhée, Poëme Symphonique" (Saint-Saëns); Septett and March from "Les Troyens" (Berlioz); "Sapho" (Lacombe); Prayer from "La Muette" (Auber); Credo and Laudate (Ambroise Thomas). The Revue et Gazette Musicale of the 26th ult. contains a list of the order of musical performances up to October 10. M. Halanzier, the director of the Paris Grand-Opéra, in a circular addressed to the members of the institute, announces that, during the Exhibition, at least four operatic performances will take place each week, and reminds the artists of a clause in their contract, according to which no member of the Opéra is to take part in the performances of any other stage or concert-room. The director, in conclusion, counts upon the esprit de corps of the members in demonstrating to the foreign visitors the superiority of the French lyrical stage.

A very successful revival took place on the 21st ult. at the Opéra-Comique of Paris, of M. Ambroise Thomas's Opera, "Psyché," a work which, after having obtained little more than a succès d'estime on its first representation, in 1857, had been completely neglected until now. The excellent interpretation of the principal rôles on the part of Mdlle. Heilbron, Mme. Engally, and M. Morlet is said to have contributed not a little to this favourable result.

A Requiem for orchestra, organ, chorus, and soli, by M. Saint-Säens, was performed for the first time at the church of Saint-Sulpice, in Paris, on the 22nd ult., in memory of the composer's late intimate friend, M. Libon. A great many musical artists assembled on the occasion.

M. Adolphe Jullien has just completed a series of interesting articles in the Revue et Gazette Musicale, entitled "Racine et la Musique," in which he traces the influence exercised by the works of the great French dramatic poet upon musical composers, among them upon Grétry, Gluck, Graun, Rameau, Boieldieu, and Mendelssohn.

Franz Liszt is shortly expected in Paris to form part of the International Jury in the musical section of the Exhibition, as representative of Hungary.

A Wagner Concert, recently organised by M. Brassin at the Théâtre de la Monnaie at Bruxelles, for the benefit of the Bayreuth undertaking, has failed to attract general attention. The performances at Rome of "Lohengrin" have likewise met with but scanty support on the part of the public, chiefly, it is said, owing to the inefficiency of some of the principal singers. At Rotterdam, on the other hand, the poet-composer's "Walküre" has been repeatedly performed with great éclat; and the production at no distant date of the entire "Tetralogy" is seriously contemplated.

The hundredth anniversary of the inauguration of the theatre La Scala at Milan is to be celebrated by the performance of three of the most important works which have been written expressly for that institution at different periods.

The remains of Rossini will shortly be transferred to Florence, and placed in the Church of Santa Croce, where the dust of Michael Angelo, Dante, Alfieri, Macchiavelli, Galileo, and Cherubini already repose.

The impresario Strakosch has commenced a series of performances of Italian Opera at New York with Verdi's "Aïda," and the undertaking bids fair to turn out a remunerative one.

We have received the two first numbers of a new weekly journal, entitled Le Progrès Artistique, published at Paris, and representing especially the interests of executive musicians. It is edited by M. Léon Moonen.

We record the death of Themistocle Solera, author of numerous operatic libretti, notably those of "I Lombardi" and "Nabuco," set to music by Verdi. Solera died in April last at Milan

François Benoist, formerly professor of the organ at the Paris Conservatoire, composer of merit and contributor to the Gazette Musicale and the Dictionnaire de la Conversation, died last month at Paris at the age of 84.

The death is also announced in German papers of Theodor Krumbholz, for many years professor at the Stuttgart Conservatorium, and a violoncello player of great reputation.

We subjoin, as usual, the programmes of Concerts recently given at some of the leading institutions abroad:—

Paris.—Société Nationale de Musique (April 27): Melancholia, orchestral work (S. Rousseau); Air from "Bathylle" (Salomé); Symphonie gothique (Godard); Pianoforte Concerto, No. 1 (Saint-Saëns). Société Nationale (May 7): Overture, "Beatrice" (Bernard); "La Forêt enchantée," Légende-Symphonie (D'Indy); Concerto for hautboy (Madame de Grandval); Lamento, Fantaisie Orchestrale (Chabrier); Sérénade for violin (Lalo). Société des Compositeurs de Musique (May 23): String-quartett (Dancla); Madrigal for five voices (H. Cohen); Sonata for two pianofortes (Pfeiffer); "Maguelonne," Scéne Lyrique (Laussel); Quintett for flute, hautboy, clarinet, cornet, and bassoon (Taffanel).

Leipzig.—Chorgesangverein (April 11): "Pilgrimage of the Rose" (Schumann); Choral Fantasia (Beethoven). Thomas-Choir (April 14): "Last Judgment" (Spohr).

Berlin.—Singakademie (April 19): "Der Tod Jesu," Oratorio (Graun). Sternscher-Verein (April 20): "St. Matthew Passion Music" (Bach). Bilse Concert (April 20): March C minor (Schubert-Liszt); Symphony B flat major (Beethoven); Funeral March (Chopin), &c. Bilse Concert (April 24): Rhapsody No. 3 (Liszt); Feuerzauber from Walküre (Wagner); Symphony, "In the Forest" (Raff). Soirée of the Tonkünstler-Verein (May 11): Sonata for pianoforte and violin (Brahmüller); Romance for flute (Saint-Saëns); Nocturne for violin (Field); Tarantelle for flute and clarinet (Saint-Saëns).

CORRESPONDENCE.

SCOTCH REELS, &c.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—Will you kindly allow me, as a Scotchwoman, and life-long dancer of Reels, to correct some slips made by Mr. Salaman in the April instalment of his article on "Music in Connection with Dancing." Speaking of our Scotch dance-music, he says: "'Tullochgorum' is as fair a specimen of a Reel tune as can be named." "Tullochgorum" is emphatically a Strathspey, and no one could possibly dance a Reel to it. Mr. Salaman perhaps means the "Reel of Tulloch," but that is hardly an average specimen, as it is differently danced from ordinary Reels. Among the best-known Reel tunes are "Mrs. Macleod of Rasay," "Clydeside Lassies," "The Wind that shakes the Barley," "The Bob of Fettercairn," and "The De'il among the Tailors;" among the Strathspeys, "The Marchioness of Huntly," "The Marquis of Huntly's Farewell," "Stumpie," "The Marquis of Huntly's Highland Fling," "Daintie Davie," and "Brechin Castle." I have been unable to find "Tam's Highland Fling" in any of the many collections, new and old, to which I have access, but it may be another name for some well-known tune. Strathspey is not "a little town," but one of the districts of Inverness-shire—"strath" in Gaelic signifying "a broad valley." The usual order of Reel-dancing is a Reel, then a Strathspey, and as a finish the "Reel of Tulloch," in which the couples twist arms and turn each other round, as the first part of the figure, instead of moving round in an oval as in the Reel, or doing the "figure eight" as in the Strathspey. There are threesome, foursome, or eightsome Reels, the second being the best-known and most commonly danced.—Yours faithfully, Nellie Maclagan.

[Mr. Salaman is greatly indebted to the writer of the above letter for her interesting information concerning the Reel and the Strathspey. Mr. Salaman, never having been a dancer of Reels or of Strathspeys,—having only seen them danced, in former years, at Caledonian public balls—is glad to receive technical knowledge from a lady evidently well skilled in the national dances of Scotland. John Wilson, the famous Scotch Tenor, was wont to sing "Tullochgorum" under the title of Reel. Mr. Salaman considered that he was safe in following such an authority. "Tam's Highland Fling" is to be found in Boosey's Collection of Scotch dance-tunes. When, in 1843, Mr. Salaman was making a tour in Invernessshire, he was under the impression that he visited a town, or village, called Strathspey, and he is yet under the idea that a place so named is mentioned in "Black's Guide to Scotland." The Gaelic signification of the term strath was already known to Mr. Salaman.—Manchester, May 7, 1878.]

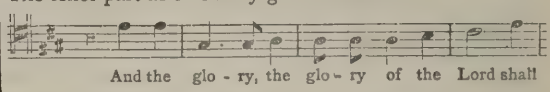
THE TENOR CLEF.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

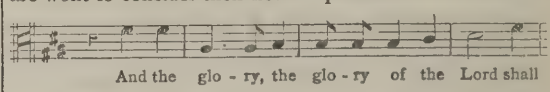
Sir,—In the interests of the musical public I beg to bring under your notice a suggestion which may prove, I trust, worthy of consideration.

As a tenor singer, I have from time to time occasion to make use of music written in the Tenor Clef. And although little or no difficulty arises from the use of the C clef in simple music, such as that employed in psalmody, the case is very different when a singer is confronted with the music occurring in Oratorio and other elaborate works.

I find that from time to time the G clef has occupied different places upon the stave, and I should infer that it would not be unfair to give to the Tenor Clef a position different from that which it now ordinarily occupies. To give an example, I will write a few bars from the Chorus "And the glory of the Lord" (Handel's "Messiah"). The tenor part as ordinarily given runs thus:—



Now if the clef were lowered to the extent of one degree, the notes, instead of presenting so much difficulty to the amateur, would fall into what tenor, alto, and treble singers are wont to consider their normal positions. Thus:—



Having been for some time a member of a Choral Society, and having taken part in the performance of many of the standard Oratorios, I am much impressed with the importance of simplifying and extending to the utmost a branch of study so elevating as that of music.—I am, sir, your obedient servant,

F. Whitaker,
Schoolmaster, Royal Engineers.

MUSIC AT RIPON CATHEDRAL.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—May I ask you to allow me, in justice to a valued colleague, to transfer to him a share, and a large share too, of the credit which your correspondent has too favourably lavished upon me for the improvement in the musical part of the service in Ripon Cathedral.

Our choir could not in so comparatively short a time have won its claims to a favourable criticism, had it not been that every member of it has given a willing and hearty attention to a course of steady work; and yet even this would have failed to ensure success but for the experience as a thorough musician, as well as for the untiring patience, of Mr. Crow, upon whom, as Choirmaster as well as Organist, has devolved the actual work of training the choir.

I think that Mr. Crow's name certainly deserves equal or greater prominence than mine in our joint work, and I ask you kindly to allow me at the least to place it side by side with my own.—I am, yours, &c.,

Samuel Joy, Precentor of Ripon.

"GOD SAVE THE KING."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—Will you kindly allow me a few lines for the purpose of correcting a slight error into which Mr. Cummings (usually a most accurate and careful writer) has fallen, in his article last month. Speaking of Dr. Kitchener, he assigns 1840 as the year of his decease, but the actual date of that event was 1827, on the 27th of February.

I have no intention of adding another to the number of the controversialists on the above subject, but I may say my opinion hitherto has always been that Bull was the composer of the framework of the melody, which Carey and others afterwards trimmed up and tried to claim. And I may add that up to the present moment that idea is rather confirmed than otherwise by Mr. Cummings's researches.—Yours truly, D. BAPTIE.

CHOIR RULES.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—I wish to obtain a series of well-digested rules for a Choir (boys only, or boys and men).

I shall be greatly obliged to any clergyman or choirmaster for information, or the loan of any MSS. for this purpose; or if you, Mr. Editor, have any such rules published, you will be good enough to inform me in your next issue of the MUSICAL TIMES.

I have delayed attempting to frame such for myself, because I know that much attention has been given to this matter in localities where every facility has existed for the perfection of little points of detail which in the aggregate would prove of the highest importance, the necessity for which would remain undiscovered until some failure should disclose their imperfection.

An early response to the above request will be esteemed a favour from either yourself or other correspondent by

AN ORGANIST AND CHOIRMASTER.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

 Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will greatly oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

ABERDEEN.—The Musical Association, assisted by the Philharmonic Society, gave a private Concert in the Music Hall, on the 6th ult. The programme opened with the performance, by the Philharmonic Society, of Beethoven's Overture to Egmont, followed by Mendelssohn's As the Hart pants, excellently rendered by band, chorus, and soloists. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous. Two of the pieces had been specially arranged by Herr August Reiter, the energetic and able Conductor of both choir and band.

BANFF.—The first Concert of the Musical Association was given in the County Hall, on the 7th ult., when the programme, which was miscellaneous, was exceedingly well rendered. The members of the Association have been trained by Herr Hoffmann, who conducted.

BARBADOS, WEST INDIES.—On the departure of Mr. T. W. Potter, Organist and Choirmaster of St. Leonard's Church, from the island, the members of the choir presented him with a handsome stationery case and inkstand, as a token of their respect and esteem, and in appreciation of his courtesy and ability as their trainer during the two years he had been with them. The presentation was made by Mr. W. H. Armstrong, the oldest member of the choir, and cordially acknowledged by Mr. Potter.

BARNARD CASTLE.—A Concert was given in this town on Friday the 17th ult. Mr. J. H. Lewis was the Pianist and Conductor. Vocalists: Miss S. E. Seymour, Mr. R. Cundell, Mr. J. Butler, Mr. J. Watson, and Master R. Bucton. Mr. J. H. Lewis played Beethoven's "Sonata Pathetique," "Home, sweet home" (Thalberg), &c. The concert was greatly appreciated by a fashionable audience.

BARTON-UNDER-NEEDWOOD.—Mr. Leake, Organist of the Parish Church, gave his first Concert at the Central Hall on the 2nd ult., under the patronage of the Ven. Archdeacon Iles, assisted by the Barton Choral Society, under the conductorship of Mr. Inglis Bervon, Organist and Choirmaster of the Parish Church, Stafford. The choruses and part-songs were given with great precision and expression. Songs were contributed by Miss L. Earle, who was highly successful in "With verdure clad" (Creation), Miss Prowse, and Mr. East. A feature in the second part was Miss Colman's brilliant performance of Mendelssohn's Andante and Rondo Capriccioso. Mr. Inglis Bervon was unanimously encored in his own song, "The soldier's dream of home." Mr. Leake accompanied in a most efficient manner.

BIRMINGHAM.—The annual Concert of the Edgbaston Amateur Musical Union was given in the Town Hall on Thursday, April 25. The band, assisted by professional gentlemen in some departments, numbered nearly 70 performers; the vocalists were Madame Sicklemore and Mr. Chas. Abercrombie. Mr. C. J. Duchemin conducted. The programme included Mendelssohn's "Reformation Symphony," the Overtures to Ruins of Athens, Haydée, and Zauberflöte.——A Pianoforte Recital was given by Mr. Walter Bache, on Saturday, April 27, before the subscribers to the Royal Society of Artists. The programme comprised specimens of Bach, Beethoven, Chopin, Mendelssohn, Schubert, Schumann, and Liszt.——The Promenade Concerts at the Theatre Royal terminated on the 4th ult. The vocal artists included Madame Rose Hersee, Miss Marian Williams, Miss Helen D'Alton, Mdlles. José Sherrington and Enriquez; Mr. Vernon Rigby, Mr. F. Celli, Mr. Maybrick, and Mr. Cecil Tovey. The programmes were good and varied, comprising, besides the vocal and orchestral items, solos for pianoforte (Miss Davis), violoncello (Mr. Weston), cornet (Mr. W. G. Chapman), clarionet (Mr. T. Pountney), and harp (Mr. D. F. Davis).——A Juvenile Concert, by a choir of 1,000 voices, from various parochial schools, was given in the Town Hall, on Friday the 3rd ult. The Rev. F. G. Bussell, M.A., of Leamington Parish Church, conducted, and the accompanists were Messrs. Pearce and Halliley. The concert was in aid of the Children's Hospital. The Right Hon. Lord Leigh presided, and there was a large audience. ——The Amateur Harmonic Association gave an open Rehearsal in the Town Hall on Thursday the 9th ult. The feature of the entertainment was the performance, for the first time in Birmingham, of Gounod's Messe du Sacré Cœur de Jesus, which, with organ accompaniment only, was well given by the Choir. Mozart's Motett, "Alma Dei Creatoris," followed. The second part consisted of glees, part-songs, and some concerted pieces, Mendelssohn's Trio in D minor, and Spohr's Dramatic Concerto; the executants being Mr. T. M. Abbott, violin; Mr. Owen, violoncello; and Mr. F. T. Cox, pianoforte. Mr. Stimpson played Gade's three Organ Pieces, Op. 22, and Gluck's Overture to Iphigenia in Aulis. The Choir has made a great advance under the able direction of Mr. W. C. Stockley.——The children attending the Board Schools receive instruction in singing, and on the 14th ult. a Concert, in aid of the Children's Special Prize Fund, was given in the Town Hall, by a selected Choir of 1,000 voices, under the direction of Mr. Wm. Dobson. Mr. Stimpson presided at the organ.

BRISTOL.—On Monday the 29th of April, another of the series of Monday Popular Concerts was given in the Colston Hall, Mr. George Riseley's band of fifty performers being the principal attraction. Schubert's unfinished Symphony in B minor, Reissiger's Overture "Die Felsenmuhle," and Joachim Raff's "Festival March," Op. 139, were amongst the principal items, but Sir W. S. Bennett's Concerto in F minor occupied the post of honour. The solo part was finely rendered by Mrs. Viner-Pomeroy. Mr. Louis Naile played Dr. Popper's Violoncello Solo, "Sarabande and Gavotte," and Miss Alice Fripp was the vocalist.——On Monday the 13th ult. the next Concert of the same series was given in the Colston Hall, for the benefit of the Leader of the Orchestra, Mr. A. W. Naile. The programme included the Overtures, Midsummer Night's Dream (Mendelssohn), Maritana (Wallace), and Le Brasseur de Preston (Adam). Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in E flat was grandly rendered, the solo part being taken by Miss Goold, the first winner of the "Goldsmid" scholarship at the Royal Academy of Music. Mr. A. W. Naile contributed a violoncello solo, and Miss Jessie Royd was the vocalist. Mr. George Riseley conducted both Concerts.——On Thursday the 16th ult. one of the series of intermediate Concerts, which are given by the Musical Festival Society between the triennial festivals, took place in the Colston Hall. The programme consisted of Mozart's Requiem Mass, Gade's Spring's Message, and Mendelssohn's Walpurgis Night. The choruses were excellently rendered, reflecting the gratest credit on the recently appointed Chorus-master, Mr. Daniel W. Rootham, who met with a most gratifying reception. The vocalists were Madame Lily Lowe, Miss Bertha Griffiths, Mr. Walter Kidner, and Mr. Lewis Thomas. The accompaniments throughout were played with masterly skill on the great organ by Mr. George Riseley.

BROMPTON, KENT.—An Evening Concert, in aid of the organ and choir fund of Holy Trinity, was given on Tuesday, April 30, in the National Schools of the parish, Mr. H. Hoare, the Choirmaster, conducting. There was a numerous and appreciative audience. The entertainment consisted of part-songs (given by members of the Church choir), and popular songs. Miss Morna Jones, and Messrs. Atkins, Hoare, and Rowe were highly successful, receiving several encores. Miss S. Pearce, the Church Organist, efficiently presided at the piano.

BURY ST. EDMUNDS.—A Concert, under the management of Mr. Thomas Smith, was given at the Athenæum on the 7th ult., the artists being Miss Robertson, Miss F. Robertson, Miss Fonblanque, Mr. Henry Guy, and Mr. Wadmore, with Signor Randegger as Conductor. The programme was miscellaneous. Miss Robertson in Ganz's "Sing, birdie, sing," received a perfect ovation, and was obliged to respond to an encore. The concert was a marked success.

COVENTRY.—A performance of Judas Maccabæus was given in the Corn Exchange on Tuesday, April 30. The principal vocalists were Miss Anna Williams, Miss Orridge, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Thurley Beale. The band and chorus, to the number of 150, acquitted themselves admirably. Mr. Arthur Tricket, F.C.O., conducted.

DEVIZES.—The Amateur Vocal Society gave the second open Rehearsal at the Town Hall on Monday evening, April 29. The first part was devoted exclusively to sacred pieces, the duets and solos being rendered with remarkable precision, especially Mendelssohn's "Jerusalem, thou that killest," and "I waited for the Lord." In the second part the selection was very attractive, the part-songs being given with admirable effect. Mr. Clarke conducted.

DISS.—The last Concert of the season was given by the Choral Society on Tuesday evening the 7th ult., when Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise formed the first part of the programme. The principal vocalists were Miss Ada Patterson, R.A.M., Miss Bessie Hill, and Mr. John Lincoln. The band was augmented on the occasion by several performers from Norwich and Ipswich. The second part opened with an Introduction and Fugue by Dr. Hill (first time of performance), the subject of the Fugue being the first line of St. Ann's Tune, the second violins giving out the subject. Miss Patterson was encored in "With verdure clad," and a duet, "When the shades of night" (Dr. Hill), was effectively given by Miss Hill and Mr. Lincoln. Mr. Hemstock presided at the organ, and Dr. Hill conducted. The choir sang throughout with great precision and taste.

ELMHAM.—On Thursday evening, the 9th ult., a very successful Concert was given in the National Schoolroom, which was filled with a large and appreciative audience. The Dereham Quintett Party, under the leadership of Mr. J. U. Martin, played the Overture to Figaro, and Haydn's Sinfonia in B flat, in a very creditable manner. The Choir fully sustained its well-earned reputation for part-singing, and did great credit to its Conductor and Teacher, Mr. W. W. Pearson. The pianoforte performance was excellent. Mrs. Latham played the Andante and Scherzo from Beethoven's "Pastoral Sonata," and Mr. Holt the Allegro and Courante from Handel's "14th Suite." Several ladies and gentlemen of the neighbourhood contributed songs and duets.

ERITH.—Cowen's Corsair and Mendelssohn's 95th Psalm were given by the Choral Society at the Public Hall on the 9th ult., under the direction of Mr. Richard Lemaire. The artists engaged were Madame Suter, Miss L. Clement, Mr. Kenningham, and Mr. Kempton, with Messrs. Byron and Jury as accompanists. The choruses were very fairly rendered by the members of the Society.

EXETER.—Advantage was taken of the erection of an organ in the Victoria Hall, in connection with the Western Counties' Musical Association's performance of the Messiah, to give an Organ Recital on Saturday evening, April 27. The organ is a new one, built by Messrs. Dicker and Son, of this city, for Exmouth Church, and the performer was Mr. D. J. Wood, Mus. Bac., Fellow of the College of Organists, and Organist of Exeter Cathedral, who exhibited the capabilities of the instrument to the greatest advantage. The programme was well selected and varied.

EXMOUTH.—A special Service was held on the 17th ult. in Trinity Church, for the purpose of opening the new organ, just erected by Messrs. H. P. Dicker and Son, organ builders, of Exeter. The entire cost of the instrument has been raised by voluntary contributions, of which the Hon. Mark Rolle contributed the handsome sum of £100, besides providing entirely at his own expense for the erection of the organ chamber in the north-east corner of the edifice, and supplying the choir stalls in the chancel. The new instrument is built from the specification of Mr. W. Vinnicombe, Organist of Withycombe Church, who presided at the opening ceremony. The organ is pronounced an instrument of almost unrivalled tone and beauty, and one of rare musical completeness. After the service, which was fully choral, Mr. Vinnicombe gave a Recital, exhibiting the capabilities of the instrument.

FROME.—The Harmonic Society gave a very successful performance of Elijah at the Mechanics' Hall, on Tuesday the 14th ult. The solos were sung by members of the Society, Mr. E. R. Trotman giving a very good rendering of the part of the Prophet, the other vocalists being Mrs. F. Harrold, Miss Coombs, and Mr. F. Harrold. The band, which was strengthened by some of the leading players from Bristol and Bath, was led by Mr. W. E. Cox, and was very efficient. Mr. J. Davis Cox conducted.

FULHAM.—The All Saints' Choral Society gave a very successful performance of Sterndale Bennett's May Queen on the 7th ult. Much praise is due to the Conductor, Mr. F. Grizelle, for the manner in which he has trained this newly formed choir. The accompanist was Mr. C. J. Frost, Mus. Bac., Cantab.

GEORGE TOWN, DEMERARA.—Mr. J. W. Potter, late Organist of St. Leonard's Church, Barbados, gave a Recital on the organ at the Scotch Church on the 11th of April. The Church was densely crowded. The programme was excellently carried out.

GLASGOW.—The first of the series of Summer Promenade Concerts was given by the St. George's Choral Union in the Kibble Palace Botanic Gardens, on the 8th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. William Moodie. The programme consisted of glees, part-songs, and solos, and violin solos by Mr. W. H. Cole. The choruses were most efficiently rendered and applauded by an appreciative audience. The solos were carefully sung by members of the Society. Mr. Cole's solos displayed great finish and taste, and were well received. Mr. Turnbull presided at the piano.

GREENOCK.—A private Concert was given in the Town Hall on the 16th ult. by the members of the Choral Society. The programme was composed of sacred and secular pieces, including several part-songs and solos. Mr. D. Middleton conducted. The singing of the members was excellent, and the soloists were well received. A feature in the programme was the performance at the organ of Dr. Peace, who played a "Marche militaire" by Gounod, and Rossini's Overture to William Tell in masterly style.

HERTFORD.—Mr. Malcolm Heywood gave his annual Concert in the Corn Exchange on Monday, April 29, before a large audience. The work performed was Handel's Acis and Galatea, followed by a miscellaneous selection. The soloists were Miss Mary Davies, Mr. Henry Guy, and Mr. Wadmore, and the choral portions of the work were admirably rendered by the Hertford Choral Society. Mr. Heywood conducted throughout, and played as a pianoforte solo his new "Valse Brillante."

HIGH WYCOMBE.—On the 29th of April the members of the Choral Society gave their third and last Concert of the season in the Town Hall, when Mendelssohn's Hymn o Praise was performed for the first time. The principal artists were Miss Adela Vernon and Mr. Sydney Tower, R.A.M. The band and chorus numbered over sixty performers. The execution of Mendelssohn's work was excellent. Dr. Bridge, who presided at the organ, played in his usual efficient manner. A short miscellaneous programme preceded the Lobgesang, and included Dr. Bridge's part-song, "Flowers" (conducted by the composer), two numbers from Raff's Suite, Op. 200, for pianoforte and orchestra, the solo part admirably played by Mr. J. G. Wrigley, F.C.O., and Bishop's glee "Now tramp," the solo part brilliantly sung by Miss Adela Vernon. Mr. Wrigley conducted.

HOUNSLOW.—Mr. John Whall, Organist of St. Stephen's Church gave his annual Concert on the 30th of April. The principal vocalists were Miss Kate Shaloe, R.A.M., Miss S. Mills, Mr. Pushman, and Mr. Long. The programme included a setting of Mrs. Hemans's "Flowers" by the bénéficiaire. The solo pianoforte playing of Mr. Short was highly appreciated, and the excellent choir, trained by Mr. Ruddock, sang some choruses from the Oratorios.

HULL.—The members of the Philharmonic Society gave the last Concert of the season on Friday the 10th ult. in the Music Hall, when Handel's Joshua was performed. The principal vocalists were Miss C. Clelland, Miss E. Clelland, Mr. A. Kenningham, and Mr. Thurley Beale, all of whom were very successful. Mr. J. W. Stephenson conducted. Mr. E. Winter led the band, and Mr. G. H. Smith presided at the organ.

HUNTINGDON.—The Hunts Choral Society gave their last Concerts for the season on the 8th and 9th ult., Haydn's Creation being the work selected. The whole of the series of Concerts have been signal successes, but each has evidenced a marked improvement on its predecessor, and the manner in which the Creation was performed shows an approach to vocal and instrumental perfection which augurs a brilliant future for the Society. Mr. A. Villin (of Her Majesty's Opera) led the band, and the solos were well sung by Mrs. Ewen, Miss Rooper, and Mr. J. W. Ingram. The choruses generally were rendered in first-rate style, especially "Achieved is the glorious work." The performance testified to the great tact and skill possessed by Mr. Rees, both as a teacher and Conductor.

INVERESK.—The first Concert given by the Choir of the Parish Church took place in the Musselburgh Town Hall on the 9th ult. The programme was carefully selected. The glees were well rendered by a choir of forty voices; and an orchestra of thirteen performers, from the Edinburgh Orchestral Society, played some overtures and a light symphony by Romberg. Mr. W. S. Brown, the Organist of the Church, acted as Conductor, and in some cases as accompanist.

ISLEWORTH.—A very successful Concert was given here on the 16th ult. by the members of the Spring Grove Choral Society, under the conductorship of Mr. H. G. Trembath, Mus. Bac., Oxon. The first part of the programme was devoted to Dr. Sullivan's Cantata, On Shore and Sea, which was sustained throughout with an excellence that brought repeated applause from the audience; the duet, as also the final chorus, being redemanded. The second part consisted of vocal and instrumental solos and duets (all by members of the Society), with some operatic choruses and unaccompanied part-songs. The Choir, which seemed under perfect control, reflected great credit on their new Conductor by their precision and taste, especially shown in Verdi's "O hail us ye free" and the "Old Romance," and "On a lake," Mendelssohn.

KINGSBRIDGE.—The members of the Vocal Association, assisted by Madame Cross Lavers and Mr. Henry Cross, gave a Concert at the Literary and Scientific Institution on Tuesday evening, April 30. The principal item in the programme was Romberg's Lay of the Bell, which was excellently rendered, the choruses being given with precision and refinement, reflecting the highest credit on Mr. Squire, their hon. Conductor. Mrs. Squire presided at the pianoforte.

KNUTSFORD.—On Thursday evening, the 9th ult., the Amateur Choral Society gave its third Concert for the season, under the direction of Dr. Hiles. The choir is well drilled, and the solo singing far above the usual average of suburban Societies. The principal work selected for performance was Dr. Bridge's Mount Moriah. The second portion of the programme contained several part-songs of great interest, and many solo performances of considerable power.

LANCASTER.—A vocal and instrumental Concert, in aid of the fund which is being raised for the purpose of providing a new organ for St. Anne's Church, was given in the Schoolroom, in Edward Street, on the 2nd ult. The Rev. J. Francis, Vicar of St. Anne's, said he had been asked to open the concert with a few introductory remarks. After stating that it was the Organist of St. Anne's Church who had kindly arranged the concert, he informed the audience that the new organ would ultimately cost them £900 or £1,000, and therefore he hoped it would be a first-class instrument, and prove of additional advantage to the town and church. The organ is being built by the firm of Bevington and Sons. Mr. Francis concluded by thanking the friends present for their attendance, and a popular programme was then efficiently carried out.

LEAMINGTON.—Mr. Frank Spinney's second (subscription) Pianoforte Recital was given on Wednesday the 15th ult., when he was assisted by Mr. Charles Fletcher, violinist. The programme consisted of works by Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Chopin, Schumann, Dussek, Rheinberger, Raff, Rubinstein, Salaman, and Sterndale Bennett. ——A well-attended and successful Concert was given by the Milverton Choral Society in the Assembly Rooms, on Tuesday, the 21st ult., the chief feature in the programme of which was Bennett's Pastoral Cantata, the May Queen, the solos in which were very ably sustained by Miss Marian Williams, Messrs. Alfred Kenningham and William Sutton. The accompaniments were rendered by a quintett of strings, with harmonium to represent the wind parts, in a very efficient and effective manner. Mr. George Kennett conducted, and by his performance of Weber's brilliant Rondo, Op. 62, in the second part, secured an encore. The choir (about thirty in number) gave an excellent rendering of Leslie's "Lullaby of Life," Smart's trio, "Hope and Memory," Stevens's glee, "Ye spotted snakes," and the choral music in the Cantata.

LEEDS.—A Concert was given by the members of the Private Vocal Society, on Tuesday evening, April 30, in the large hall of the Church Institute, when a good selection of glees and part-songs for male voices was well rendered. The soloists were Messrs. Coldwell, Tetley, Buckley, and Sugden. Mr. Joseph Parkin accompanied the voices, and Mr. E. O. Dykes conducted with his customary tact and efficiency.

LINCOLN.—A grand Choral Festival was held in St. Martin's Parish Church on the 1st ult. The lay vicars of the Cathedral, the choirs of St. Peter-at-Arches, St. Swithin's, St. Andrew's, St. Botolph's, St. Peter-at-Gowts, and the members of the Lincoln Choral Society, united with St. Martin's Choir, under the conductorship and management of the Organist, Mr. W. Mason, in bringing successfully to an issue the first festival of its kind held in Lincoln. The choirs, numbering about 130 voices, preceded by the Lord Bishop of the diocese, the chief dignitaries of the Cathedral, and clergy of the city, entered the Church, singing as a processional hymn, "Onward, Christian soldiers," to Sullivan's well-known tune. Evening prayers were then intoned by the Rev. E. Rayner Cousans. During the service a selection of music from the Messiah was performed, and the following voluntaries upon the fine organ: Larghetto from Beethoven's 1st Symphony, Slow Movement from Spohr's Quartett in G minor, and Mendelssohn's 5th Organ Concerto. The festival was a great success in every respect, both musically and financially, realising, with subscriptions, the sum of £360. The parochial council and churchwardens, through the vicar, the Rev. J. Foy, tendered Mr. W. Mason, the Organist, a handsome acknowledgment for his successful exertions in working up the musical portion of the festival.

LIVERPOOL.—On Friday evening, the 17th ult., Mr. James J. Monk, honorary local secretary, Trinity College, London, gave a lecture in the schoolroom, Everton Valley, on the "Life and Works of Handel." The Rev. T. Major Lester presided. The lecturer, after a brief sketch of the great composer's life, gave a summary of his multifarious works, treating consecutively of his secular vocal compositions, particularly Italian operas, his instrumental works, and his Oratorios. The lecture was interspersed with vocal and instrumental illustrations. Miss Byers (a pupil of Mr. Monk) was warmly applauded for her rendering of "Lascia ch'io pianga" (Rinaldo). Other vocal selections were contributed by Messrs. Sanderson, Lenton, and Clegg. Choruses from the Messiah, Samson, Acis and Galatea, &c., were effectively rendered by the Chadwick Mount Choir, and the success of the entertainment was materially enhanced by Mr. Monk's instrumental performances, which included an Aria, Minuet, and Hornpipe from the Water Music, and a Suite in B flat from the Pièces pour le Clavecin, &c.

LOUTH.—A most successful Entertainment was given in the Town Hall on Wednesday evening, the 8th ult., by the members of the Philharmonic Society, assisted by the Musical Union. The first part of the programme consisted of sacred and the second of secular music. Mr. W. H. C. Foster officiated as Conductor, and Mr. W. Rysdale was Leader of the band. Mr. T. Willey (of the Musical Union) was Chorusmaster, and Miss Atkin presided at the piano. The instrumental portion of the programme reflected the highest credit upon the respective performers, and the choruses, with the exception of the "Hallelujah," were well taken up and sung in excellent time.

LUDLOW.—The second Concert of the season in connection with the Amateur Choral Society, which has for its president the Rev. Sir F. A. Gore Ouseley, Bart., and its vice-president the Rev. E. Ff. Clayton, Rector of Ludlow, attracted a large and fashionable audience to the Assembly Room on Tuesday evening, the 7th ult. Mr. R. Bartholomew conducted, Mr. J. T. Rawlings and Miss Lawrence presided at the pianoforte; and in addition to the excellent band of amateur instrumentalists, there was a chorus of over forty voices. The professional vocalists were Miss Constance Herring, Mr. T. Shorrock, and Mr. Charles Fredericks. The first part of the programme comprised a new Cantata, Fayre Pastorel (words by L. Leigh, music by H. Hiles, Mus. Doc.), which was excellently rendered. The choruses were evenly sung, and the orchestral accompaniments were all that could be desired. The second part of the Concert consisted of a miscellaneous selection.

MARGATE.—The second Concert of the Choral Society was given in the Royal Assembly Rooms on Tuesday the 7th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. J. B. Lott, Mus. Bac., Oxon., Organist of the Parish Church. The work performed was Haydn's Creation. The solos were sustained by Miss McEwen (amateur), and Messrs. Rhodes and Grundy (Canterbury Cathedral). Mr. J. L. Hatton presided at the piano, and Dr. Prior, of Ramsgate, at the harmonium. The band was led by Mr. C. M. Gann, of Canterbury. The choruses were sung with great precision and nicety of tone. At the conclusion of the second part, Mr. Lott was presented by the members of the Choral Society with a silver-mounted ivory bâton, and Full-score copies of the Creation and Elijah, in token of their appreciation of his efforts for the cause of music during his three years' residence in the town.

NEW MILL, NEAR HUDDERSFIELD.—On Wednesday the 1st ult. an excellent Concert of classical music was given in the National School by the choir of the Parish Church, under the direction of Mr. C. E. Holmes, Organist and Choirmaster. The programme was selected from the Oratorios of Handel, Haydn, and Mendelssohn. The solos were sung by Miss M. E. Roberts, Miss Annie Jenkinson, and Messrs. James Bailey and Hirst. Miss Annie Jenkinson received a most enthusiastic encore for her rendering of "Angels ever bright and fair," and Mr. J. L. Hirst was recalled for his singing of "The trumpet shall sound." The choruses were rendered with marked precision, and received the approbation of the audience.

PLYMOUTH.—The eleventh season of the Vocal Association was closed with great éclat on the 8th ult. by a fine performance of Samson, in the Guildhall. The band played with excellent judgment. The choruses, sung by the members of Mr. Löhr's Choir, went very steadily, especially "To song and dance," "Fixed in His everlasting seat," and the concluding chorus, "Let their celestial concerts all unite." Miss Anna Williams made a marked impression by her brilliant rendering of "Let the bright seraphim," in which she was ably supported by Mr. Fly's trumpet obbligato. Madame Enriquez was highly effective in "Return, O God of hosts," and "The Holy One of Israel." The part of "Samson" was sung by Mr. Shakespeare with remarkable ability and taste, and the bass solos were taken by Mr. Thurley Beale with admirable effect.

RICHMOND, YORKS.—A very successful performance of Sir Michael Costa's Oratorio, Naaman, was given in the Assembly Rooms on Thursday the 2nd ult. under the auspices of the Richmond Amateur Choral Union. The principal vocalists were Madame Pauline Graystone, Miss Ferry, Mr. Verney Binns, and Mr. W. H. Emsley. Mdlle. Bertha Brousil led the band, and the Choral Union, assisted by a small contingent from the Leeds Festival Chorus, sang the choruses in a praiseworthy manner, under the direction of Mr. James H. Rooks, who conducted. A very influential list of guarantors had been secured to ensure the Society against loss, and the performance was a great treat to those fortunate enough to procure seats.

ROCHESTER.—At the fifteenth Subscription Concert of the Rochester, Strood, and Chatham Choral Society, on the 6th ult., Handel's Oratorio, Judas Maccabæus, was performed, the principals being Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Miss Mary Davies, Miss Annie Butterworth, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. R. Hilton. The band and chorus numbered 270, the band being led by Herr Carl Deichmann. The Rev. W. H. Nutter and the Rev. E. C. Corfe acted as Conductors.

RYDE, ISLE OF WIGHT.—Mr. Claude R. Fowles, late Organist and Choirmaster of SS. Michael and All Angels, had presented to him (on his resignation of that post) a handsome gold hunter lever watch and chain, by the priests, choir, and congregation, in recognition of his efforts in improving the singing of the choir during the two years he held the post of Organist of the above church. Mr. Fowles is succeeded by his sister, who has been Organist at St. James's, in this town, for the past twelve or thirteen years.

SHEFFIELD.—The members of the Albert Choral Society gave a Concert on Monday evening, April 29, when the first half of the programme was devoted to the performance of Herr Niels W. Gade's Cantata, the Crusaders. The solos were admirably rendered by Miss Mary Davies, R.A.M., Mr. William Shakespeare, and Mr. Wadmore. The choir was composed of the members of the Society, about seventy in number, and the band (under the leadership of Mr. John Peck) was constituted almost entirely of local performers. The choruses were well sustained, and Mr. Trimnell is to be congratulated on the success which has attended his exertions in bringing about the present efficient state of the Society as a choral body. The applause at the close of the Cantata testified to the pleasure its performance had given. The second part of the Concert was miscellaneous. Mr. J. W. Phillips officiated as pianoforte accompanist in the Cantata as well as in the miscellaneous selection; and Mr. Trimnell, the head of the Society, was the Conductor.

SIDMOUTH.—On Thursday evening the 2nd ult. the members of the Choral Society gave their ninth Concert in the Assembly Rooms. The programme, which was miscellaneous, contained some of Handel's finest choruses, preceded by the Overture to Esther, in the first part, and in the second the Overtures to Masaniello and Fra Diavolo, Lachner's Suite, Introduction, Fugue, Andante, and Minuetto, Mendelssohn's Capriccioso in B minor, &c. The performance of the whole gave the greatest satisfaction. Mr. H. A. Harding, Mus. Bac., Oxon., conducted.

SOUTHSEA.—A very successful Concert was given at the Portland Hall, on April 26, in aid of the widows, orphans, and dependent relatives of the crew of H.M.S. Eurydice. The first part consisted of Mr. J. F. Barnett's Cantata, the Ancient Mariner, which was performed in a highly creditable manner. The principal artists were Mrs. Cookworthy, Miss Rawstorne, Mrs. Jerrard Parsons, Mrs. Lennox Napier, Mrs. Staveley Murray, Mr. C. E. McCheane, and Mr. W. H. Beckett. The orchestra consisted of a well-arranged string band, ably led by Mr. Chas. Fletcher; Mrs. Bunbury and Mr. G. S. Löhr presided at the pianoforte. The Cantata was conducted by the composer. A miscellaneous selection of music was performed in the second part. The greatest praise is due to Mr. McCheane for bringing the concert to such a successful issue, £65 being handed over to the "Eurydice Fund."——The first of a series of three Concerts was given by Mr. Mew, in the Portland Hall, on the 7th ult. The vocalists were Madame Sherrington, Mdlle. José Sherrington, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Miss Dones, and Messrs. Vernon Rigby, Hollins, and Pyatt. Miss Emma Barnett was the pianist, and Chevalier Lemmens presided at the Mustel-organ. The programme, which was of a popular character, was excellently rendered, and highly appreciated.

ST. LEONARDS.—A Musical Festival was held at the Cambridge Hall on Wednesday the 1st ult., when the building was specially fitted up for the occasion. Handel's Messiah was performed in the afternoon, with band and chorus numbering 150. The precision and effectiveness of the chorus reflects the greatest credit on Dr. Abram's training. Mr. H. Abram presided at the American organ. The leading artists were Miss Davies, Madame Patey, Mr. Kenningham, and Mr. Thurley Beale. The evening Concert consisted of Mendelssohn's Oratorio, Elijah, with the same artists. The rendering of both works was excellent. Dr. Abram conducted.

STEEPLE ASHTON.—A Festival of Parish Choirs in union with the Salisbury Diocesan Choral Association was held on the 22nd ult. Eleven choirs, numbering in all 210 voices, took part in the service, which was attended by a very large congregation. The lack of altos and tenors caused the rendering of the music to be less effective than it would have been with a due proportion of these voices, but the service throughout was fairly successful. Mr. Clarke (the Diocesan Choirmaster) and Mr. C. F. Wilshire (the Organist) presided at the organ; the prayers were intoned by the Rev. G. E. Cleather, and the sermon was preached by the Vicar, the Rev. A. O. Hartley.

STOKE-ON-TRENT.—The second Concert of the second season of the Philharmonic Society was given in the Town Hall, on the 29th of April, with a full band and chorus of 130 performers. The programme included Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm, Gade's Spring's Message, Dr. Heap's "Benedictus," some solos by members of the Society, and several overtures. Mr. T. M. Abbott played Mendelssohn's

Violin Concerto with admirable refinement and delicacy, and met with quite an ovation. Dr. Swinnerton Heap's "Benedictus" elicited loud applause; the solo was sung by Mrs. Minton Taylor, and the band, of selected instrumentalists from Birmingham, did justice to the skilful and effective orchestration. The choir sang well, especially in the fugue in the 42nd Psalm and the Gloria to the "Benedictus," and the playing of the band throughout the evening was a great treat. Dr. Heap conducted with his usual skill and judgment, using the silver-mounted ivory bâton which was presented to him at the last rehearsal by Archdeacon Sir Lovelace Stamer, on behalf of the members, "in token of his great ability and kindness."

STRATFORD-ON-AVON.—On the 14th ult. a Concert was given at the Town Hall by the members of the Choral Society. The programme consisted of Haydn's Spring, several part-songs, and vocal solos. The principal artists were Mr. O. Millward, of Worcester Cathedral, the Rev. F. J. O. Helmore, and the Misses Francklyn and White. Mr. Caseley conducted, and Mr. Maries accompanied. Mr. Millward's "O ruddier than the cherry" was enthusiastically re-demanded, as was also the quintett, "Blow, gentle gales."

SUNDERLAND.—The report of the Philharmonic Society shows that although the three concerts given during the past season have been successful in a musical point of view, the receipts have fallen below those of the previous year. It does not appear, however, that the energy displayed in the management of the Society will be at all relaxed during the coming season, for it is already announced that the work to be produced at the first concert is Professor Macfarren's Lady of the Lake.

SURBITON.—Mr. R. Sebastian Hart's annual Concert took place on the 21st ult., and was well attended. The artists were Miss Helene Greiffenhagen, Madame Poole, Mr. Stedman, and Mr. Ralph Wilkinson, all of whom pleased greatly in their several solos. The pianoforte playing of Mr. Hart gave great satisfaction, and orchestral music was furnished by the Surbiton Orchestral Society.

THORNTON HEATH.—The members of the Musical Society gave an excellent performance of Gade's Cantata, the Erl King's Daughter, in the Public Hall, on the 3rd ult. The solos were sung by Miss Annette Ivanova, Mrs. Brett, and Mr. Albert Hirschfield. The choir was very efficient. Mr. Windham Ryves conducted, and Mrs. Sanders accompanied.

TRENTON, NEW JERSEY, NORTH AMERICA.—At the Easter Services in Trinity Church the musical portion in the morning comprised Processional Hymn 99 (Hymnal), Te Deum and Jubilate (Harrison Millard), Anthem, "Christ being raised" (Webbe); and at the Evening Service, Processional Hymn 103 (Hymnal), Cantate Domino (Jackson), "Benedic anima me" (J. R. Thomas), and, during the offertoire, "Hallelujah" (Messiah). Mr. Samuel Ash gave an excellent rendering of the tenor solos, and Mr. T. Ash, sen., was highly effective in the bass parts. The whole of the music was exceedingly well sung by the choir, and effectively accompanied by the Organist, Mr. Thomas Ash.

WALTON-ON-THE-HILL.—The new church of St. John the Evangelist was opened for Divine Service on Thursday the 16th ult., when the Rev. Canon Espin, B.D., Chancellor of the Diocese, preached a sermon suitable to the occasion. The service, which was choral throughout, was rendered by the new surpliced choir, which has been trained by the Organist, Mr. Carmichael.

WEST HARTLEPOOL.—On Friday evening, the 10th ult., Mr. J. H. Lewis, Organist of the Parish Church, gave a Concert in the large hall of the Athenæum, which was a great success. The solo artists were Miss Effie Goodwin (Edinburgh), Master Fielding, Mr. J. Thompson, Mr. J. Hunter, and Mr. Wilson. Mr. J. H. Lewis was the Pianist and Conductor, Mr. G. Dalziel presided at the harmonium, and Mr. J. Garry, violin. Members of the Parish Church choir assisted in the performance of the glees, which included a new part-song composed by Mr. J. H. Lewis.

WHITTINGTON MOOR.—On the 20th ult. the Whittington and Newbold Choral Society gave its first Concert in the Church Schools, before a numerous audience. The first part of the programme consisted of Haite's Cantata, Abraham's Sacrifice, and the second part contained a selection of part-songs and concerted music by Pinsuti, Hatton, Sullivan, &c. The solo vocalists were Madame George, Miss Bolton, Mr. Thos. Cooper, and Mr. L. Wilkinson, all of whom were highly successful. Mr. J. White presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. T. Armstrong conducted.

WINDSOR.—The third and last Concert of the season, given by the members of the Windsor and Eton Choral Society, took place in the Town Hall on Friday, April 26, under the patronage of H.R.H. the Princess Christian of Schleswig-Holstein. The work performed was Handel's Oratorio, Samson. The principal artists were Miss Edith Abell, Master Arthur Smith, and Messrs. Hunt and Briggs, of St. George's Chapel. Miss Edith Abell made her first appearance, and created a very favourable impression by her excellent rendering of the solos allotted to her. Mr. Hunt sang exceedingly well. Mr. Briggs gave with admirable effect "Honour and arms," and Master Arthur Smith was particularly good in "Return, O God of hosts" and "The Holy One of Israel." The choruses were very well executed, especially "O first created beam," "Then round about the starry throne," and "Let their celestial concerts." The orchestra was small, but very efficient; the performance of the Overture and "Dead March" being highly creditable. Sir George Elvey conducted. Mr. Liddle, Mus. Bac., led the band. Mr. S. Smith presided at the harmonium, and Mr. J. Donoghue played the trumpet obbligato.

WOMBOURN.—A very successful Concert was given in the National Schoolroom on Friday evening, April 26, before a large and highly appreciative audience. The principal vocalists were Miss Hayward, Miss Alice Hayward, Miss Church, Mr. G. R. Wace, Mr. M. Williams, and the Rev. G. A. Pugh. The programme was of an attractive character, and the various items were well rendered, a pianoforte duet by Miss Lister and Mr. F. Lister being a special feature. Mr. Frederick Lister, the Organist of Wombourn, ably officiated as accompanist.

WORCESTER.—The first Concert of the season of the Philharmonic Society was given at the Music Hall, on Wednesday evening, the 1st ult. Dr. Crotch's Oratorio, Palestine, formed the pièce de résistance. The work is rich in dramatic effect, and the vocal and instrumental parts contain many gems that should make it popular. It is a composition of considerable importance, and the excellent manner in which it was produced reflected the highest credit on Mr. Done, the able Conductor of the Society, and on every individual member, for the time, labour, and painstaking care which had been bestowed on its rehearsal. The band, which was a most efficient one, was fully equal to the difficult instrumentation of the work, which was played throughout with considerable effect. The band and chorus consisted of 130 performers. The principal soloists were Miss Catherine Penna, Mr. Wm. Dyson (Worcester Cathedral), and Mr. T. Kempton, assisted by Miss Edwards, Mr. B. Newth, and Master Blackford. Mr. Done conducted with his usual skill, and Mr. Quarterman rendered good service at the pianoforte.

WORTHING.—Mendelssohn's Elijah was given by the Worthing Sacred Harmonic Society at Montague Hall, on Wednesday the 15th ult., and the result was a most gratifying success. The members have worked hard through the winter; indeed, nothing short of the diligent and earnest application which has been manifested for months past could have won such a cordial and unanimous verdict of approval as was accorded to the performance of the Oratorio by one of the largest and most appreciative audiences ever assembled in Worthing. The principal vocalists were Miss Jessie Jones, Miss Annie Butterworth, Mr. W. H. Cummings, and Mr. Orlando Christian, and the band was thoroughly efficient under the leadership of Herr Straus. The solos, especially "Hear ye, Israel" (Miss Jones), "O rest in the Lord" (Miss Butterworth), and the two tenor songs (Mr. Cummings), were excellently rendered; and the singing of the choir, under the able direction of Mr. L. S. Palmer, was the theme of universal admiration. Mr. W. H. Morford (formerly organist of St. Botolph's Church) presided at the organ.

MUSIC PRIMERS

EDITED BY

DR. STAINER.

In issuing this series of Music Primers the Editor sees with pleasure the realisation of a desire he has long felt, to place in the hands of teachers and students of music a set of educational works of a high standard at a price so low as to render them attainable by all.

The growing interest in music generally, and rapid spread of its study, so very evident in this country, render it of the utmost importance that the student's first steps in every branch should be directed with skill and based on sound principles. The Editor has kept this object steadily in view, and he believes that each one of these Primers will prove to be as carefully constructed in detail as it is comprehensive in design.

Such a result would have been impossible but for the hearty support and sympathy of those authors, men of known ability in their special branches of art, who have embodied the results of their long and valuable experience in their respective contributions.

While gratefully acknowledging the kindness of these gentlemen, the Editor cannot but express a hope that the Primers may prove as useful to the public, and as beneficial to art, as both authors and publishers have endeavoured to make them.

Second Edition, Revised.

A CONCISE HISTORY of MUSIC from the commencement of the Christian Era to the present time. For the use of Schools. By H. G. BONAVIA HUNT, Warden of Trinity College, London, and Lecturer of Musical History in the same College. Fcap. 8vo, 3s. 6d.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"Mr. Hunt has produced a well-arranged and really concise history of the subject with which he deals. The book is divided into three sections, the first of which is a general review of musical epoch and events, while the second presents a series of chronometrical tables, and the third summarises a history of the art. The student 'is warned' in the preface 'that he is not to expect what is called a readable book,' but we feel bound to say that Mr. Hunt's work is, in the proper sense of the word, far more readable than books which attempt to combine valuable information with attractiveness by tricks to which Mr. Hunt has not condescended. Those who care to follow the fortunes of opera and music in general cannot do better than turn to Mr. Hunt's little book."—Saturday Review.

"Mr. Hunt has the enviable power of giving much information in few words; he has therefore in this small volume afforded valuable assistance to musical students preparing for competitive examinations, which they could not so easily obtain elsewhere."—Musical Standard.

"Mr. Hunt's little work is emphatically a well-designed book. . . . Especially is the author to be commended for not attempting too much, and for adapting his language to the comprehension of pupils. It is, in short, the work of a practical man, of one who in the course of his labours has felt the want of such a book, and who has taken an infinity of pains to make it useful."—Music Trade Review.

HUSHED IN DEATH

PRIZE GLEE

BY

HENRY HILES, Mus. Doc., OXON.

To this Composition was awarded the First Prize for a Serious Glee.

"We have great pleasure in noticing the excellent manner in which Dr. Hiles's admirable work was given. The Glee fulfils all the requirements of a work of the kind, and if the judges who awarded the first prize to it were present they could not but be gratified to hear their verdict confirmed by the emphatic approval of the audience. Scholarly writing one always expects from Dr. Hiles, whose experience as a choirmaster has also given him peculiar advantages as a writer of vocal harmony, and his Prize Glee could only have been written by an accomplished musician. The melody of the first part of the Glee is flowing and graceful, and the fugue at the end is exceedingly effective. It cannot but be gratifying to Manchester that a local composer should have been successful in a competition in which he had to contend against not a few distinguished composers."—Manchester Examiner and Times, May 9, 1878.

"Dr. Hiles's Serious Glee, 'Hushed in Death,' has carried away the prize on the strength of its intrinsic technical worth. It embodies a higher display of musical knowledge and is a more solidly constructed composition than either of the other five competitive glees that figure in the programme. In this respect it must have left the judges little space for hesitancy."—Manchester Courier, May 9, 1878.

London: NOVELLO, EWER and Co.

HUMPTY DUMPTY. Price 6d. SPECIAL PRIZE GLEE (S.A.T.B.) MANCHESTER CLUB, by ALFRED J. CALDICOTT, Mus. Bac., Cantab.

"Strikingly clever and original. Its performance created a perfect furore."—Manchester Mail.

"A humorous musical device, showing an originality of construction and freedom of treatment with which we can readily believe none of the others showed any parallel."—Courier.

"Loudly redemanded."—Guardian.

Post-free, six stamps, of the Composer, Worcester. Special rates to societies.

Also, "JACK AND JILL." Price 4d.

This Glee was awarded the Prize of £20 offered by the Manchester Gentlemen's Glee Club, for the best Cheerful Glee, 1878.

NEW WORK FOR SINGING CLASSES.

CHAPPELL'S PENNY OPERATIC PART-SONGS.

For Soprano, Alto, Tenor, and Bass.

The present collection of Part-Songs is entirely new, being selected and adapted from the most striking and popular Choruses in the Favourite Foreign Operas. The Arrangement is purely Vocal, such Choruses only being chosen as can be sung without the aid of an Instrumental Accompaniment. The Words have been expressly written for the work, and the harmonies arranged in four parts, as likely to be most useful in small classes.

1.	Hymn of the Fisherman's Children	Adapted to a Melody from Herold's "ZAMPA."
2.	Fays and Elves (In mia fe)	From Flotow's "MARTA."
3.	Spring's Bright Glances (In Elvezia non v' ha)	From Bellini's "LA SONNAMBULA."
4.	From Yonder Vale and Hill (D' immenso giubilo)	From Donizetti's "LUCIA DI LAMMERMOOR."
5.	Here we Rest (Qui la selva)	From Bellini's "LA SONNAMBULA."
6.	Onward to Battle (Squilli echeggi)	From Verdi's "IL TROVATORE."
7.	Rataplan (Rataplan)	From Donizetti's "LA FIGLIA DEL REGGIMENTO."
8.	The Gipsy's Star (Vedi! le fosche)	From Verdi's "IL TROVATORE."
9.	War Song of the Druids (Dell' aura tua profetica)	From Bellini's "NORMA."
10.	In Mercy, hear us! (Cielo clemente)	From Donizetti's "LA FIGLIA DEL REGGIMENTO."
11.	Come to the Fair! (Accorete, giovinette)	From Flotow's "MARTA."
12.	Friendship (Per te d' immenso giubilo)	From Donizetti's "LUCIA DI LAMMERMOOR."
13.	Away, the Morning freshly breaking (The Chorus of Fishermen)	From Auber's "MASANIELLO."
14.	Pretty Village Maiden (Peasants' Serenade Chorus)	From Gounod's "FAUST."
15.	The soft Winds around us (The Gipsy Chorus)	From Weber's "PRECIOSA."

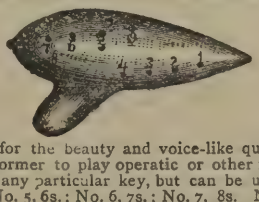
CAUTION.

Mr. BARR finds it necessary to caution the public and trade against worthless imitations of the original Prize Medal Chromatic Ocarina, for which he is the Sole Agent, these imitations being utterly useless as Musical Instruments.



"Mr. M. Barr, of Queen Victoria Street, has brought out a new instrument called the 'Ocarina.'"—Figaro.

"The tone bears a striking resemblance to the vox humana stop of a large organ."—Musical Times.

Can be seen and heard daily at M. Barr's Music Repository, 80, Queen Victoria Street, E.C.

THIS original Musical Instrument is unequalled for the beauty and voice-like quality of its tone, and the ease with which it can be acquired—a very little practice enabling the performer to play operatic or other melodies. It has a complete chromatic scale, from the lower B to the upper E, and is thus not confined to any particular key, but can be used with other instruments, notably the Pianoforte. Prices: No. 1, 2s.; No. 2, 3s.; No. 3, 4s.; No. 4, 5s.; No. 5, 6s.; No. 6, 7s.; No. 7, 8s. Nos. 5 and 7 specially tuned to go with the Pianoforte.

GOLD MEDAL PIANOS.

18, WIGMORE STREET, LONDON. W.

ON THE THREE YEARS' SYSTEM.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' GOLD MEDAL PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

SIR JULIUS BENEDICT. { "This most ingenious and valuable invention cannot fail to meet with success."
SYDNEY SMITH. "The touch is absolute perfection."
BRINLEY RICHARDS. { "A very clever and useful invention, and likely to be extensively adopted."

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' SHORT IRON GRAND PIANOS. Six feet six inches in length, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action. Price, 105 to 115 Guineas.

"The tone of the Grand now referred to possessed all the qualities that a good piano ought to have, and in touch and action was perfect. The sweet and silvery quality of the upper octaves was worthy of special admiration."—The Era.

"Sir Julius Benedict played his well-known composition, 'Where the Bee sucks,' on one of Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons' Grand Pianos, with the recently patented improvements, which enabled him to produce the sustained tones with great variety of effect in the light and shade of tones, especially so when extreme delicacy of touch is required."—Court Journal.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' SHORT IRON GRAND PIANOS. Six feet six inches in length, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action. Price, 105 to 115 Guineas.

"Admirable repetition, perfect sostenuto, and luscious tone of the instrument fully justified the performer's choice."—Sunday Times.

"Magnificent, grand, the air telling out with almost vocal clearness and sweetness to the bell-like treble arpeggio accompaniment, which contrasted excellently with the extraordinary power produced in the forte passages."—Illustrated Sporting and Dramatic News.

"An immense improvement in arpeggios. The rapid passages in the upper register, the beautiful flute-like tone, and quick and perfect repetition, were very effective."—Figaro.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' CONCERT IRON GRAND PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

"Sir Julius Benedict, now seldom heard as a soloist, delighted the public once more by his arrangement of 'Where the Bee sucks.' He played upon a new Patent Grand by Brinsmead, possessing a remarkably loud and clear tone."—Echo.

"The upright Iron Grand Piano, with sostenente sounding-board, the mechanism produces the obvious result of a fuller and richer tone."—Morning Advertiser.

"Every means are adopted to insure the production of perfect instruments."—The Orchestra.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' SHORT IRON GRAND PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action

"Where all the pianos go to seems somewhat of a mystery, for a really good instrument will last a lifetime: and yet every year thousands are made by each of the great London manufacturers, while the numbers made by the 200 or more smaller firms must represent an enormous number in the course of each year. The improvements made in English pianos have caused this trade rapidly to increase, until one pianoforte manufactory after another has been built to supply the growing demand. One of the largest of these, lately erected by Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons, of Wigmore Street, covers nearly an acre of ground in the Grafton Road, Kentish Town, and is intended to accommodate 300 workmen. These works alone can supply 3,000 pianos annually, and there are at least three manufactories in London capable of making an equal number."—Illustrated London News.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' GOLD MEDAL PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

"A metal bridge of a peculiar form is used to produce the treble, and a much finer tone is produced than if a wooden bridge were used."—Morning Post.

"A perfect check, great power, and quick repetition."—Times of India.

"Produces a better quality of tone, greater durability, the new patent perfect repetition, with a check (never before attained), with the certainty of the instrument never blocking."—Land and Water.

"Beautiful, light, and elastic touch, and an instant repetition."—Globe.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' GOLD MEDAL PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

"The softest touch is sufficient to secure a reply, the touch and facility of repetition are really perfect."—Belgravia.

"The advantages fully justify the term 'Perfect' Check Repeater Action."—John Bull.

"The touch is very sure, light, and elastic."—Musical Times.

"This invention is simplicity itself."—The Queen.

"The latest and greatest improvements in the pianoforte."—City Press.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' GOLD MEDAL PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

On the Three Years' System.

"Receive the greatest approbation everywhere of musicians and manufacturers."—Standard.

CHALLEN & SON'S GOLD MEDAL PIANETTE,

WITH CHECK ACTION, IN ELEGANT WALNUT OR ROSEWOOD CASE.

FROM 25 GUINEAS.

"The Pianettes manufactured by CHALLEN & SON are most satisfactory instruments."—Anton Rubinstein.

"I can testify in the strongest manner to the qualities of the Pianette as manufactured by CHALLEN & SON. In every point, as to tone and touch, they are excellent; and I can also certify from experience as to their durability under hard wear."—William Henry Monk, Professor of Music in King's College, London.

CHALLEN & SON'S GOLD MEDAL SEMI-COTTAGE,

WITH CHECK REPEATER ACTION.

FROM 32 GUINEAS.

"The Pianos I have selected from Messrs. CHALLEN & SON have invariably given complete satisfaction, some of them having had to bear the severe test of an Indian climate."—William H. Cummings.

"As a customer of some years' standing, I speak with confidence of the quality of the instruments supplied by Messrs. CHALLEN & SON. The two I have for my own use have had a great deal of wear, and in this respect have entirely satisfied me as to their durability; and the tone and touch of all those selected by me for myself or pupils have been much commended."—Alfred Gilbert, R.A.M.

CHALLEN & SON'S GOLD MEDAL COTTAGE;

TRICHORD THROUGHOUT; BRASS BRIDGE; CHECK REPEATER ACTION.

FROM 60 GUINEAS.

"I hold a very high opinion of Messrs. CHALLEN & SON'S Pianos. Their qualities of tone and touch can be at once estimated; but I can furthermore bear testimony to their great durability."—Lindsay Sloper.

"CHALLEN & SON is a name synonymous with wonderful durability, great beauty of tone, and moderation in price. We know of not one single maker whose Pianos excel theirs in the qualities most desirable in a good and lasting Piano."—Cape Argus, May 7.

WARD'S

ROYAL PIANOFORTE AND HARMONIUM LAMP,

FOR PROVIDING A CENTRAL & DIRECT LIGHT FOR THE PERFORMER.

The inconvenience of the present mode of lighting a performer at a pianoforte or harmonium by means of sconces fitted at the extremities of the instrument has long been a subject of complaint. The requirement is a central light to fall direct upon the music-book. This can be obtained by using Thomas Ward's Royal Pianoforte Lamp, which can be fitted to any form of instrument without defacing the same. Vocalists also will thus find a convenience which does not exist in other modes of lighting.

PROSPECTUSES POST-FREE.

Price 10s. 6d.

Agents: Mr. J. WILLIAMS, 23, Berners Street, Oxford Street (W.), and Messrs. METZLER and Co., 37, Great Marlborough Street (W.) Sole Agents for Sussex: Messrs. J. and W. CHESTER, 1, Palace Place, Brighton.

TESTIMONIAL.

"Barrow Street, Quorndon, near Loughborough,
"July 16, 1877.

"SIR,—It is now over two years since I purchased a set of your pedals and action for pianofortes. After having thoroughly tested them and used them regularly for so long a period I have no hesitation in saying that they are a most decided success, and at the same time advise every organ student who wishes to become proficient in the art of pedalling to procure a set of them at once.

"I remain, Sir, yours truly,
"To Mr. J. Hamilton." "J. J. CALLIS.

MUSIC IN PARIS.

(BY OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

VICTOR HUGO'S boast that Paris is the light of the world and the centre of the universe holds good in some respects just now. Commenting on the review held the other day at Longchamps, a writer in the Figaro said, "Foreigners may not like us when they are outside our boundaries, but when here they love Paris. Is it because she is the universal courtesan? It is true she is courtesan sometimes, but sometimes, also, she reigns as queen." The fair city on the Seine is undoubtedly queen at present, and to her all eyes are turned in homage. Right well she deserves it. I stood the other day on the Trocadéro and looked across the river, from the base of a sumptuous edifice dedicated to Art, on a picture which seemed rather the creation of an enchanter's wand than the result of human labour. It was hard indeed to believe that only a few short years ago I had stood on the same spot—near where a battery of Communistic cannon rained death upon the Versaillese—and beheld far and wide the marks of ruin and desolation. Surely Paris is the phœnix of cities! You may burn it, but a fairer Paris arises from the ashes. My business, however, is not to write a eulogium upon the beautiful Lutetia so much as to call the reader's attention to one particular phase of its present busy aspect. Musical people in plenty will go there during the remaining months of summer, and they are certain to accept with interest even an imperfect suggestion of what, in the way of music, may lie before them. That suggestion is my task.

People are naturally apt to base their expectations as to the result of given circumstances abroad from what would be the result of the same circumstances at home, and an Englishman visiting Paris just now would expect to find an enormous musical activity embracing the whole range of art. But disappointment surely awaits the traveller who indulges in such dreams. Outside the bounds of the Exhibition—within which I shall take my reader presently—musical Paris goes on in the old way, making no special effort, and resting content with the normal activity of the lyric theatres. Concerts there are next to none, unless the entertainment provided in the Champs Elysées may be so called; while for neither love nor money could you procure the hearing of a Symphony; an Oratorio, of course, being out of the question, now that M. Lamoureux has retired from the field, and M. Pasdeloup has found that it does not pay for working. He, therefore, who will have music in Paris must frequent the lyric theatres—go to the Opéra, if he can stay long enough to find a place; or, failing that, try the Opéra-Comique or the Italiens, when it is open; or, as a dernier ressort, patronise the Bouffes or the Renaissance. The Opéra is crowded night after night, so that a seat can only be obtained some time in advance, and the fact would appear to indicate that the gorgeous building has not yet exhausted its attraction. It may be, however, that popular favour in France, as here, gathers most readily round music which is best known. If so, the management can certainly claim the credit of taking the fullest advantage of the circumstance. Whatever M. Halanzier may do in the immediate future, he is at present satisfied with "Faust," "Les Huguenots," "Guillaume Tell," "L'Africaine," and other works equally familiar. His justification is, if at all, that the public are satisfied too. They crowd the building, and the director lets well alone. The same sort of activity reigns at the Opéra-Comique, without attracting an equal amount of support. M. Carvalho has good, though not full, houses; and I am bound to say that the performances in the historic theatre of the Rue Favart are most enjoyable. On the night of my visit the work played was "La Fille du Régiment," and, after it, a very old friend, "Le Postillon de Longjumeau"—two fairly long Operas at one sitting. We know "La Fille du Régiment" here, or fancy we do, but in strict truth the "La Figlia del Reggimento" of our Italian stage is a very different thing. It is different because altogether wanting in the relief afforded by a vivacious dialogue, capital acting, and a proper development of character. Take, for example, the chief domestic or intendant of the Marquise de Berkensfeld. At the Italian Opera he is a mere sketch, having very little to do, and that little of no account; whereas on the French stage he becomes a personage of dramatic importance, bearing a considerable share in the humour of the scene. On the French stage, also, a character is introduced which has no existence in the Italian version because no music is written for it. I refer to the Duchess who desires to negotiate a marriage between her son and Maria. The meeting of the two grandes dames for this purpose is an excellent bit of comedy that lights up the last act wonderfully, and explains a good deal which, on the Italian stage, is a little obscure. But the musical performance it was my pleasure to witness had merits scarcely inferior to those of the finished dramatic representation. The orchestra was kept admirably under control throughout, and, though its quality of tone was not equal to that of an English band, its ensemble was in all other respects better. Especially was this observable when accompanying. No desire appeared to drown the voices, or rob them of their rightful pre-eminence, while every point was taken up with a neatness and precision most satisfying to critical ears. But neatness and precision characterised the entire performance. Whatever the chorus had to do was done at the right moment and in the right manner, with an assurance and aplomb that seemed to say, "They could not go wrong if they tried." The principal characters were equally well represented; Tonio by M. Furst, Sulpice by M. Maris, Marie by Mdlle. Mézeray, and La Marquise by Madame Decroix. The Sulpice was especially admirable, because altogether wanting in the coarseness to which we are accustomed, while not forgetting to take the pardonable liberties of an old and faithful friend. Another point worthy of praise lay in the absence of needless and, indeed, incongruous military display. At our Italian Opera the collective "father" of Maria appears as a regiment with officers and colours, and presents arms to the departing vivandière—a notion wildly absurd. At the Opèra-Comique we see merely a crowd of soldiers whose homage to their favourite is offered, so to speak, unofficially, and seems a perfectly natural and reasonable thing. As was the excellence of "La Fille du Régiment" so also was that of "Le Postillon de Longjumeau," which, indeed, met with a reception that saved the "claque" labour by drowning their applause in a general chorus of approval. The favourite Opera had not been heard since January, 1875, and then had only a run of three nights. It was therefore comparatively fresh on the occasion of which I speak; and, in spite of heat and fatigue, the audience sat it out to the last note, having then strength enough left to summon the actors amid shouts of applause. This result partly arose from pleasure at hearing once more music which, if not great, is always agreeable by reason of tunefulness and vivacity. But it was due in other part to the exertions of a tenor, M. Bertin, fresh from the Théâtre de la Monnaie at Brussels. M. Bertin made a complete conquest of his new public, and was well described the next morning by Le National as a "charming comedian, playing the part with remarkable intelligence, singing with a voice un peu blanche, but with an infinity of taste; perhaps, in a word, the true opéra-comique tenor, the ideal so often dreamed of and so long desired." I quite agree with the critic of Le National, even to the voice un peu blanche, which, however, is no great drawback. M. Bertin is physically well qualified for stage work. He acts with grace and intelligence, and his vocal powers qualify him for the special rôles in the repertory of opéra-comique. He is a great "catch" for M. Carvalho, and, although his success on the Italian stage may be problematical, Mr. Gye or Mr. Mapleson might do many a worse thing than try to secure him for certain parts, such as Fra Diavolo, now hard to fill. But M. Bertin was not the only artist deserving of praise in the cast of Adam's opera. Mdlle. Ducasse played Madeleine with infinite spirit and address, her assumption of the two parts being clever enough to deceive any one not previously aware that both were sustained by the same person. Altogether the work, now more than forty years old, seemed rejuvenated, and there can be little doubt that visitors to Paris during the present summer will have ample opportunities of witnessing it. Another work they are certain to see if they care to do so, and that is "La Timbale d'Argent" at the Bouffes-Parisiens, where M. Leon Vasseur's opéra-bouffe is running far on towards its 500th night, with not the smallest sign of decreasing favour. English people, however, had better leave their wives and daughters outside the theatre, even if they are ignorant of French, because however much men of the world may enjoy indecency, when glorified by consummate art, it is not worth while to place innocence in contact with it. And "La Timbale d'Argent" is a thing not to be described here even in outline. I cannot separate the wit of its dialogue from the underlying grossness, nor picture the interest of its action apart from the suggestiveness that attends it. The theatre, however, is crowded night after night, and the performance elicits one continued accompaniment of laughter and applause. Let us hope that this is by way of homage to the extraordinary ability of the artists, and to an ensemble the most perfect that any stage has ever witnessed. Nothing finer in its way can be conceived than the acting of the troupe headed by Madame Théo and M. Daubray. It is "touched up" to the last degree, and the humblest member of the chorus seems equally an artist in his measure with those who take the prominent parts. But the drama is much and the music little. Indeed, I can discover no particular reason why the actors in "La Timbale d'Argent" should attempt to sing. In the first place, and speaking generally, they attempt what they cannot achieve, and what their audiences do not care they ever should achieve. Madame Théo, for example, makes a noise only to be called singing by stretching courtesy to the breaking point, and the others, with one exception, are but little better. Thus does the divine art have its revenge for an enforced alliance with that which degrades its nobility and sullies its pureness. As regards M. Vasseur's music, it is doubtless good enough for its purpose, if not too good. There is dash in it, its melodies are sometimes catching, and one cannot refuse to lend it an approving ear. But nobody goes to "La Timbale d'Argent" for music. It is when the conductor lays down his bâton that the audience prick up their ears to catch M. Daubray's next pointed remark, and open their eyes to see Madame Théo's next suggestive action. Nevertheless, this is what passes in Paris for a musical entertainment, and it is certainly more lively than an Exeter Hall oratorio, but ——. If any one wants variety of the kind he need not take much trouble to seek it. At the Folies-Dramatiques they are playing "Les Cloches de Corneville," and at the Renaissance "Le Petit Duc" still holds court. But there are better things than these. "Aïda," for example, has been a feature of the season at the Italiens, and before these lines appear in print the Lyrique (Salle Ventadour) will have opened with a new Opera, by MM. Mendes and Pessard, entitled "Le Capitaine Fracasse." As regards lyric theatres, therefore, the innumerable visitors to Paris just now have little reason to complain. There is abundance of all sorts to choose from, and the taste must be singular indeed which cannot find enough and to spare of suitable aliment. But for music in its highest form visitors must look to the Exhibition itself, and thither I now ask the reader to bear me company.

The general arrangements for the music connected with the Exhibition have already been set forth in the pages of the MUSICAL TIMES, and I do not propose to reiterate them. My object is simply to describe what I saw and heard on the occasion of two visits to the palace of the Trocadéro, where alone the musical performances take place. First, as to the building itself. There can be little doubt that the general idea of the edifice which now crowns the famous hill above the Pont de Jena was taken from the Albert Hall. Relatively to the Exhibition itself, it occupies precisely the same situation as would the Albert Hall with respect to the South Kensington edifice of 1862, were it now standing. You emerge from the Exhibition proper into a vast garden stretching across the river (the connecting bridge being included within the grounds) to the foot of the Trocadéro, on which stands a huge circular building crowned by towers, and having on either side a wing with arcades similar to those flanking the Albert Hall. The centre of this edifice contains the grande salle and there the orchestral and vocal performances are given. Although not nearly so large as that at Kensington (it will accommodate only some five or six thousand persons), the French interior bears a general resemblance to the English one. The details, however, are very different. For example, there are but two tiers of boxes, while the decorations make up a coup d'œil, which, though by no means ornate, exhibits the well-known characteristics of French taste rather than those marking an English want of it. As regards the acoustics of the hall, a far more important matter than any question of shape or ornament, French musical critics profess to be satisfied with them; but I am bound to say that those gentlemen are easily pleased. The fault on the Trocadéro, as at Kensington, is a too great sonority. The sound-waves emanating from the orchestra are caught up and flung back in masses upon those advancing behind, and the result in certain localities is most painful confusion. Measures are being adopted for the rectification of this state of things; but the cause is, I fear, beyond reach, short of altering the form of the hall materially, an idea not now to be thought of. Let me add that the critics aforesaid, while passing lightly over acoustical defects, gravely animadvert upon the injurious influence which such huge concert-rooms must have upon music; and there is a good deal of sense and reason in what they say. Hear, for example, a writer in L'Art Musical:—"If an enlarged locale cannot be made profitable with the existing repertory of concert-rooms and theatres, it will be necessary to provide another. The box is ready and it must be filled. Thus, then, are our composers condemned to work on a certain scale whether they will or no. Architects have imposed upon them the obligation. But what is the gain from this agglomeration of material? Nothing; not even for art, in the name of which it has been made. How many composers of delicate talent, wishing not to appear indifferent, will imitate the frog in the fable, and with the same result? How many singers fitted for an honourable career will lose their chance in the unhappy emulation now set up? The renovation of music by command is sure to entail a catastrophe. It will kill the art of singing, already in its agony. Murder dogs the steps of composition. It is not in doubling, tripling, or quadrupling the quartett of an orchestra that a proportionate increase of effect is secured. It is not by covering a delicate man with many clothes that he is made strong. He loses, under the mass of his wrappings, the proportions of his form, and with that his attraction and all that constitutes his specialty." L'Art Musical is, perhaps, somewhat unduly frightened by the big concert-room on the Trocadéro, but there can be no question as to the mischief indicated by its remarks. In these feverish sensational days music has not escaped the general infection, and the French critic justly lifts up his voice against a tendency charged with the possibilities of infinite mischief to our art.

Readers of the MUSICAL TIMES are well aware of the arrangement by which an International exhibition of music has been secured for the first time in the history of a "World's Fair." They know that the various countries of Europe have been invited to send their own compositions, together with their own performers, to Paris, and that the liberal conditions offered have induced many to accept and act upon the idea. In due time England, represented in an executive sense by the orchestra of the Royal Italian Opera and Mr. Henry Leslie's Choir, will appear on the scene. Meanwhile Italy has had her turn; and it was my fortune to be present at the initial performance of the orchestra of La Scala, Milan, conducted by Signor Franco Faccio. All honour to the public spirit which sent these musicians over the Alps to show assembled Europe what the erewhile "land of song" can still achieve in the highest regions of art. It did one good to see the practice of music so far disassociated from purely mercenary considerations, and connected with an honourable emulation. Italy, let me say at once, had no reason to be ashamed of her champions. The orchestra appeared on the platform 115 strong; that is to say, 90 strings, 24 wind instruments, and one harp. Signor Faccio divided his army of strings thus:—24 first violins, 20 second violins, 16 violas, 16 violoncellos, and 14 double-basses. As will readily be supposed, the effect produced in a hall so resonant was very great, and French connoisseurs readily admitted that Signor Faccio had a right to pride himself upon the power of his "quartett." But it strikes me that, in this respect at least, they will open their eyes and ears very wide indeed when the "strings" of our English orchestra make play in the same building. The instruments used by the Italians were little, if at all, better in quality than those generally heard in French orchestras, and it is quality rather than number which tells. Accustomed to the magnificent tone of the "strings" in the hands of English players, I must confess to not having been so much impressed by the Italian "quartett" as apparently was the mass of the audience. Moreover, although the wind instruments were but twenty-four against ninety, they dominated in an unusual degree; a result partly due to the acoustics of the building; in other part to the wood wind being placed above and not, as usual, below the brass. The playing of the orchestra had some remarkable characteristics, one very prominent feature being the immense superiority of the "strings" over the "wind." It must be confessed that the "strings," in the matter of execution, were splendid. Their fire was immense when the conductor let them loose, and even French amateurs, who are no strangers to impulsiveness, declared that the Italian impetuosity was somewhat too great for their taste. One critic called Signor Faccio's men "the Zouaves of symphony," and avowed that, at need, they could improvise the music they had forgotten to place upon their desks. But while the "go" of the Milanese had a curious effect upon those not used to it, their manner and its results presented features of great attraction. Nothing could be more interesting than to compare well-known works, like Beethoven's Overture "Coriolan," as rendered by the Italians, with the same masterpiece as given by an English orchestra. The text was the same, and also its general character, but in all other respects the widest possible divergence challenged curious notice. So much, after all, is music a matter of temperament and so widely different may its interpretation legitimately be by different people. One other feature remains for notice, and that is the excessive attention paid to nuances. Refinement is, beyond question, a quality which every orchestra should seek to acquire as a thing absolutely essential, but it may be sought with too great an earnestness, and to the general detriment. He who examines a picture with a magnifying glass must necessarily lose the tout ensemble in his attention to details, and this was precisely the case with the Italian orchestra. The conductor's whole mind, and that of his followers, seemed engrossed by the minutiæ of their work, the consequence being an exaggeration of minutiæ at the expense of breadth of effect. "Blue pencil" is, doubtless, a useful article in the hands of a conductor, but it can be easily abused—a fact of which we need hardly go to Paris for proof—and, after all, music is not simply a question of varying dynamics and shades of tempo. The Italian programme contained, as was to be expected, a large proportion of Italian music, but was not wholly so made up. Signor Faccio thought it well to explain this by stating that he wished the cosmopolitan public of Paris to hear his orchestra in some classical piece chosen without reference to school, era, or nationality. Hence the overture to "Coriolan" had a place in the scheme. He desired also to show a mark of homage to his French hosts, and a performance of Berlioz's "Carnaval Romain" was accordingly given, to the evident satisfaction of the audience. The Italian music began with an overture by Foroni, which, having no particular distinctiveness of style, fell somewhat flat. I cannot but think that it was badly chosen as a representative of national art, since its character approximated more to the German than the Italian school. Two short movements, "Contemplazione" and "Scherzo," by Signor Catalani, followed without producing much effect; but, per contra, the Overture to "Il Guarany," which we know in England, aroused something like enthusiasm, played as it was with wonderful verve. A pretty little Gavotte, courtly and elegant as became the old dance, by Bazzini, met with a still better reception. Arranged for strings alone, and rendered most delicately, it gained an easy encore. Then came the Overture to Ponchielli's "I Promessi Sposi," and after it a Funeral March, "Amleto," from the conductor's own pen. This made the greatest effect of all—a result due rather to the manner in which the resources of the orchestra were employed than to any special quality of greatness in the music. Signor Faccio well knows what can be done with the means at his disposal, and too much praise cannot be given to the grouping of his instruments and the impressive colouring resultant therefrom. One passage especially, in which muted strings were predominant, had a thrilling effect. It and, indeed, the entire work really moved the audience, who gave vent to their approval in the form of an imperative encore. The Overture to Verdi's "Vêprès Siciliennes" closed the Italian selection, and this also was received with distinguished favour. On the whole then the concert was a success, and well opened the brief campaign of the Italians in Paris; but the programme cannot be looked at without a reflection by no means flattering to Italy. Its greatest works were borrowed from the repertory of France and Germany, and all that could be offered really representative of Italian art was some Operatic Overtures, together with a few detached pieces of no special importance. Signor Faccio must, one would think, have been painfully conscious of his poverty of choice; and the feeling doubtless tempered the gratification caused by executive triumph.

I pass now from orchestral music to that of the chamber, which occupies its rightful place in the general scheme. It is needless to say that quartetts and sonatas are not given in the huge central hall, where they would be lost. A smaller room, seating some 600 persons, has been prepared for them, or rather will have been prepared when the workmen who now swarm about the place have concluded their labours. The whole palace is in an unfinished condition, but the Salle des Conférences—so the chamber-music room is grandly called—and its immediate surroundings need a good deal of touching-up before completion. As, however, the apartment can be used, the concerts take place in regular order, with no more hindrance than the noise of the operations outside. Its acoustics give no cause for complaint, and as the platform is situated in the centre of the long side of the quadrangle, the artists are brought sufficiently near to every one for the pleasant sense of contiguity which the proper enjoyment of chamber-music requires. I was able to attend the second concert of the series, but cannot say that the privilege which, on payment of three francs, the vast crowd outside enjoyed in common with myself led to a rush for places. On ascending the dusty stairs and moving through the noisy workmen to the door of the concert-room, ten minutes before the time fixed for beginning, I found nobody in possession save a band of young women ushers gaily adorned with pink ribbons. As there were programmes to be sold and half-francs to pocket, the bevy made an instinctive move towards the solitary visitor, who, on his part, alarmed at the prospect, beat a hasty retreat. Presently, however, an audience began to muster by twos and threes; then an entire ladies' school swept primly along, and at last some 150 persons had gathered to "assist" at the solemnity, if that may be so called which had rather the appearance of an informal meeting. There being no artists' room, the performers, when not actually engaged, mixed with the audience, and as everybody seemed to know everybody else, a good deal of hand-shaking and gossip went on in the intervals of the music. But the French can do all this without troubling the serious concert-goer, and it must be said for them that every bar of every composition was listened to with complete attention. The people reserved their chatter till after the final cadence, and then had a good talk, which is better than spreading it impartially over the entire proceedings. Three works were in the programme, all by French composers, a Quartett of M. Gouvy (Op. 56) leading the way. M. Gouvy, as those who know anything of French music are well aware, is a composer who writes much, and writes not a little that is worth having. He has chiefly contributed, at present, to the repertory of the pianoforte, but not a few of his most important works belong to the class exemplified at the Trocadéro concert. The Quartett chosen is one of two but lately composed, and represents, therefore, the master's ripest talent. It is beyond question an able work, in accepted classical form, and wrought in details, as in general outline, so as to accord with classical precedents. The opening Allegro and the Larghetto are very fine movements, worthy of serious notice and qualified to rank among the best of their kind. Mr. Arthur Chappell may certainly do a worse thing than introduce the Quartett to his patrons at St. James's Hall, if only because it would tend to dissipate the notion that Germans have a monopoly of this form of composition. The work was very well played by MM. Taudon, Desjardins, Lefort, and Rabaud, the first violin distinguishing himself especially by beauty of tone and finish of execution. But the ensemble showed all four artists to be thoroughly capable men; and fit for the position they occupy at these important concerts. After the Quartett came a suite in four movements with a prelude, written by Madame de Grandval for flute and piano. "Who is Madame de Grandval?" the English reader may ask. I answer that in the world of French music she is by no means an inconsiderable person. In "society" she is known as Marie-Félicie-Clémence de Reiset, Vicomtesse de Grandval, but out of it men speak of her with respect as the pupil of Flotow and Saint-Saëns; as the composer of six operas or dramatic poems, of seven masses and other works for the Church, and of a host of miscellaneous pieces for voices or instruments. Judging by the Suite for flute and piano, I am disposed to think that Madame de Grandval is a little too prolific. She seems to put down whatever first comes into her head, and to leave it there, without taking the trouble to revise and improve. Hence her music is rather eccentric in point of form, and just a little diffuse and incoherent in expression. The Suite made no real effect, though it was courteously applauded. Besides, who cares to hear a flute and pianoforte for half-an-hour at a stretch, even when as well played as, on this occasion, by MM. Taffanel and Fissot. Third and last in the programme came a Trio for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, by Castillon. Again, the English reader is likely to put a question—"Who is Castillon?" Unhappily the query should be framed in the past tense, for the composer died in 1873 at the early age of forty-four. In life he was known to his friends as Alexis-Saint-Victor, Vicomte de Castillon; so that in him we have another of the gay and giddy French aristocracy who gave himself up to serious artistic pursuits. Starting upon his career as a soldier, Castillon resigned the sword for the lyre, put himself under Victor Massé, and soon began to make a name as an earnest and industrious musician. He wrote many ambitious works, including a Pianoforte Concerto, two Suites d'Orchestre, a Psalm, and a Symphonic Overture, "Torquato Tasso." That these works have not obtained more vogue is perhaps due to the fact that their composer had strong sympathies with the "advanced" school. His Trio, for example, while containing much that insures respect and even admiration, is often as laboured and as vague as any work that ever secured the applause of "higher development." It was, however, worth hearing, if only because showing how far music in its more serious forms commands the attention of French connoisseurs. We in England are singularly unaware of the doings of our nearest neighbours in this respect. Every small German makes himself known to us, whereas, the other day, we were ignorant almost of the existence of such men as Bizet and Massenet. Let us try to rid ourselves of the prejudice that a French composer can only be good enough for opéra-bouffe or opéra-comique at most; since the sooner we do so the better for our repute and for the art as it exists among us. I have only to add that performances of chamber-music will take place in the Salle des Conférences throughout the season, and to assure intending visitors that, judging by one specimen, they will find in them plenty to interest and a good deal to admire.

Will the reader now be good enough to emerge with me from the Palace of the Trocadéro, descend the hill by the side of the waterfall, cross the river, pass through the garden, without being tempted from the direct path by the crowd of interesting objects on either side, and enter the main Exhibition building. My purpose is to take a rapid look at the musical part of the great show; and I should caution the reader that even a rapid look cannot be enjoyed save at a considerable sacrifice of exertion. The instruments we seek will not be found in a mass, but scattered far and wide according to the nationality of their makers. Nor even with reference to a particular country can they be lighted upon with ease. Suppose, for example, we enter the space occupied by the United States—a considerable area—we may search some time before, in a variety of odd corners, we discover what we want. And the Champ de Mars, be it remembered, is a large place. Search, therefore, involves no small measure of running about from pillar to post and back again. However, if we pass along the Street of the Nations nearly to its end, wheel to the left through the Fine Arts Department, and enter the immense space devoted to French manufactures, we come at once upon the show of musical instruments made by our respected neighbours. It is a tolerably large show, but, save to those who are amateurs of wood and brass work, it is not particularly attractive, for you are requested in large letters not to touch, and crimson ropes effectually bar you from any attempt to play. But, if you wait long enough, mayhap somebody privileged to test the quality of the goods will appear. In that case, of course, you have all that is necessary to form an opinion; and I cannot but think that more comprehensive measures should be adopted to make the display of musical instruments other than a show of material. The outside of a pianoforte or organ gives no indication of its real worth, and a clarinet shut up in a glass case is simply so much wood and metal. But, to return from this little digression, let me indicate the chief objects in the French department which the musical visitor should seek out and examine. There is, first, a set of curious-looking instruments exhibited by J. Turon, under the name of Le Ceciliam. They are of various sizes, answering to the various members of the string family, whose work they purport to do in a mechanical manner not very clear to those who do not see them in action. There are plenty of such fancy instruments in the Exhibition—pianos and harmoniums combined (as the so-called annexe-piano of Gavioli and Co.); the piano-mécanique of Debain; and, most singular as well as newest of all, the double piano exhibited by Mangeot frères. The last-named instrument, which is in charge of a gentleman who really seems inspired by long contemplation of its beauties and advantages, consists of two sets of strings and keys, the one above the other, and having one set inverted — that is to say, the deepest note of the upper keyboard is on the extreme right of the player, immediately over the acutest note of the lower. The advantage claimed is that the player can execute passages, which at present require to be done with crossed hands, in a manner much more facile; and that, generally speaking, his executive powers are supplied with greatly extended resources. That may be, and I have not the smallest desire to "throw cold water" upon the invention; but is the game worth the candle? Does the double piano confer an advantage in proportion to its increased cost? I think not, nor will it do so until composers have supplied it with a repertory. The pianoforte music we have at present has all been written for, and can be played upon, the ordinary instrument, and, as far as it is concerned, the new and complicated machine has no raison d'être. Still, it is possible that, in course of time, the "double piano" may take a prominent place. One can never be safe in running down new inventions or combinations simply because their value is not immediately obvious, and all the objection I care to advance against the "double piano reversed" is that at present it needs a vocation. Turning from instruments of this class—from a "stenographic piano," exhibited by a firm at Douai; a "piano-à-diapasons" sent from Neuilly; and the automatic pianos of Lacape, it is easy to find special admiration for the noble and orthodox instruments exhibited by Erard, Pleyel-Wolff, and Thibaut; all of which worthily sustain the repute of France in this branch of art manufacture. The harmoniums are, of course, numerous, and a long paper might be written upon them alone. Here the firm of Alexandre and Cie take the lead, not the least noteworthy of their exhibits being a cottage harmonium sold for the astonishingly low price of 65 francs. I need hardly say that it is a simple and unpretending affair, but having regard to the cost, it is a "little wonder." The tone cannot be objected to, and the instrument, as far as it goes, makes really good music. No working man's home need therefore be without this addition to its artistic resources. Mertens, of Paris, is also a notable exhibitor in this department, and at least one of his instruments, upon which a selection from "Faust" was played in my hearing, produced almost an orchestral effect. The French organs, with the exception of one by Cavaille-Coll, are placed in a gallery at the end of the building nearest the Ecole Militaire, but of them I had no opportunity of judging, nor is the show either a large or, to all seeming, an important one. Returning through nearly the entire length of the edifice to the English section, I find the great London firms conspicuous by their absence. For good or evil the Broadwoods, the Collards, and the insular branch of the house of Erard, have declined to enter into competition, leaving the field to Hopkinson, Brinsmead, Challen, Ogden (of Manchester), and other firms of a like character who are energetically working to the front. There can be no question about the fact that our country is well represented even with the giants absent. The Hopkinson instruments are specially worthy of note, a small iron grand in an ebony and gold case above all. Messrs. Brinsmead's show also deserves attention, if only because of the improvements introduced; and an inspection is worthily invited by the exhibits of Challen and Son, Ivory and Son, and Ogden. A grand shown by the Manchester house is really a masterpiece of workmanship, and I am not surprised to find it marked "sold" at the high figure of £475. In this section, as in the French, harmoniums are numerous, but the English organ-makers have stayed away with remarkable unanimity, and, as far as I was able to discover, only one provincial manufacturer, Brown (of Sheffield), has thought it worth while to put in an appearance. This is to be regretted, if not for the sake of the firms concerned, at all events for that of our country's repute in a branch of art-workmanship long cultivated with special success. The splendid instruments shown in the American section will excite no little anxiety as to the result of competition between the new and old worlds. It is clear that "effete Europe" is run very hard by the energetic young country across the Atlantic, and it is decidedly amusing to observe the rough and tumble fashion in which the American makers contend among themselves for the palm of excellence. The reed-organ firms are particularly lively in this respect, and their neatly got-up books of description and commendation are scattered about with quite a reckless disregard of printer's bills. One needs a hand-basket in order to be an impartial recipient of the pamphlets with which the Americans carry on their reed-organ war; but most of them are worth accepting and preserving as examples of the most developed form of modern advertising. Poetry is often pressed into the service. Thus sings one bard, inter alia:—

> O the tone, the beautiful tone,
> Surpassing all others, I am sure you must own,
> So rich and so pure, never jarring or rough,
> Is the beautiful tone of the "Simmons and Clough."
> The touch too, is splendid—responding so quick—
> And the voicing so true as to make one quite sick
> Of Eastern-made work, which sounds reedy enough,
> Whenever compared with the Simmons and Clough.

Here the heartiness with which the poet reaches out from Detroit to cuff the makers of New York and Boston is delightfully characteristic of the spirit our transatlantic friends show when dealing with each other as rivals. But it must be owned that they do not make "much ado about nothing." With scarcely an exception, the instruments shown by firms like Shoninger (of New Haven), Clough and Warren (of Detroit), Estey, and Mason and Hamlin, are marvels of what inventiveness and skill can get out of a free reed. The effects produced are beautiful, and in some cases it is hard to distinguish the tone of the "full" reed-organ from that of the organ proper, so cleverly is it imitated. Already the "reed-organs" have made a sensation in Paris, and whenever one of them is played upon, curious and admiring crowds gather round to listen. Germany, being absent from the World's Fair, of course sends no musical instruments; but Austria is well represented. Belgium also makes a fair display, the principal contributors being Burden and Cie, of Brussels, and J. Oor of the same capital. Switzerland stands well to the fore with her Zurich pianos; and Italy, Russia, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, &c., have sent examples worthy of inspection. Musical visitors should also be careful not to miss the display made by the great publishing houses of Paris—Brandus, Huegel, Michaëlis, and others. It supplies a remarkable instance of long-sustained energy and great success.

I have now indicated very briefly, merely skimming the surface as it were, the chief musical features of the Exposition. A closer examination may follow in due course, but, anyhow, something has been attempted in the course of these remarks by way of justice to a great occasion, the full advantage of which none should let slip.

THE LITERATURE OF NATIONAL MUSIC.

By CARL ENGEL.

I PURPOSE to give some account of the books relating to National Music which have been published in different countries. Before entering upon this subject, I venture to submit to the consideration of the intelligent musician a few introductory remarks, which may perhaps be of assistance to him in his perusal of the following survey, in case he should not previously have given particular attention to National Music as a science. Indeed, there is reason to surmise that the subject is rather new to many musicians; at all events, the present essay cannot claim to "supply a long-felt want in literature." Still, whoever has obtained some insight into the rich treasures of popular songs and tunes, which have been hitherto but little explored, will probably be convinced that the study of National Music is sure to become gradually more appreciated by the earnest promoters of the art.

As regards the term National Music, it must be remembered that, taken in its widest sense, it designates any music which, being composed in the peculiar taste of the nation to which it appertains, appeals more powerfully than other music to the feelings of that nation, and is consequently pre-eminently cultivated in a certain country. In this sense Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven may be regarded as representatives of German National Music; Rossini, Bellini, and Donizetti of Italian National Music; Auber, Boïeldieu, and Hérold of French National Music. However, distinguished composers have developed their style in great measure by studying the works of previous masters of different countries. The peculiar characteristics of the music of the nation are therefore more strongly exhibited in the popular songs and dance-tunes traditionally preserved by the country-people and the lower classes of society, which form the great majority of a nation. These musical conceptions, generally simple and unpretending in construction, often retain their popularity for a long period, since the views and sentiments of the uneducated or simple-minded man are less subjected to external influences than are those of the educated or ambitious man. Thus may perhaps be explained the fact that we find among the rural population in some countries tunes still sung which are known to be above a century old. True, they have been somewhat altered in the course of time. It is surprising that their alteration is not very great, considering that they have been preserved traditionally from mouth to mouth, at least only so by the country-people who own them.

Now it is with this kind of music, or with National Music in a more strict sense of the term, and not with the elaborate productions of distinguished composers, with which the reader is invited to occupy his attention. But, it may be asked, what is the advantage of carefully investigating such inartistic musical effusions? The reply is: The study of National Music is useful on account of the great originality of popular tunes. Professional musicians have many inducements to compose or perform music which they do not feel, while the untaught peasant will sing when his heart's emotions impel him to it. No wonder that his musical effusions, artless as they may be, should often be a truer expression of feelings than well-constructed productions of clever artists.

The study of National Music is useful on account of the great variety in the popular tunes. This variety is really astounding, almost every nation's music having its own peculiar stamp. Through a familiarity with the popular tunes of many countries, so very different from each other, our musical conception becomes enlarged, and we learn more clearly that the rules laid down for our guidance in art are by no means so infallible as they may appear at first sight, but that most of them can not unfrequently be disregarded with advantage.

The study of National Music is useful on account of the great beauty of many of the popular tunes. If the reader is acquainted with some of the most admired Scotch, Irish, or Welsh songs, he will probably testify to the exquisite beauty and impressiveness of the airs. He may be assured that all European nations possess such heartfelt melodies, only different in form and rhythmical expression; he will find this to be the case, if he is not deterred by their strange characteristics from familiarising himself with them thoroughly. The characteristics are, in many instances, so greatly at variance with those which distinguish our own popular music, that an intimacy with them is only gradually obtainable. Especially the tunes, or melodious phrases, of the Arabs, Hindus, Chinese, and several other extra-European nations, appear to us on first acquaintance almost as unintelligible as a language with which we are but very slightly acquainted. Howbeit, also these nations possess beautiful airs of popular songs. Their conceptions are perhaps all the more interesting to the student, since the airs are founded on successions of intervals, or scales, different from our own scales.

Again, the study of National Music is useful in an historical point of view; because it affords us an insight into the different stages of development of the art of music in different countries. Besides, popular ballads and other compositions are not unfrequently associated with important national events, by which they were called forth, or which they promoted.

The study of National Music is also useful in ethnological researches, as it gives us an insight into the inward man, reveals the character and temperament of different races, and the degree of affinity which exists between the different human families. Perhaps it would be more correct to consider a knowledge of it desirable in the pursuit of anthropology, which treats on the natural history of man, rather than of ethnology; for the latter science is only a branch of the former, and treats on the relations of the different varieties of mankind to each other. But it may well be doubted whether National Music will ever become of essential use in these sciences; certainly it cannot compare with languages in this respect. Music is too fugitive; the construction and mode of expression of its compositions are constantly subject to modifications. At any rate, this is the case in civilised nations. Among uncivilised nations, not affected by European influence, any changes of this kind are much more gradual, and may scarcely be traceable during centuries. Besides, an exact knowledge of National Music is not sufficient for the purpose in question: an acute feeling for its beauties and various characteristics is equally requisite. But it is a rare coincidence when scientific men possess this acute feeling, which is, in fact, a musical talent, not attainable by study, though capable of development like other innate gifts. However, this question needs no further consideration here, since it does not immediately concern the musical student.

Likewise will it suffice merely to allude to the interest which popular songs possess for the philologist, on account of the languages and the dialects exhibited in poetry of different countries and different districts of a country. Moreover, the poetry is, as is well known, often of great beauty—indeed, not less so than the music; and deserves for this reason the attention of the artistic mind.

Now, should the previous statements have convinced the reflecting musician of the advantage of an acquaintance with National Music, he will perhaps be glad to know the proper sources for information, and the nearest way of access to them. Many of the printed collections of popular songs and tunes have been published in out-of-the-way places, in foreign countries, and have not become known through the usual channel of the book trade, for the obvious reason that they were only issued for the people to whom they belong, others not caring about them. It is often difficult to obtain a copy of such a publication; indeed, it requires almost a lifetime to hunt up the most important ones, and to collect them together. The collector must be prepared for frequent disappointments, occasioned by the promising titles of worthless compilations, which he is tempted to order from foreign countries. Just as is the case with other literary productions, the really valuable works have generally more modest titles than those which possess comparatively but little merit.

As the following survey is intended to save the student disappointment and time, by pointing out the most important works, publications which are out of print or are otherwise not easily accessible will be noticed more fully than those which may be supposed to be known to many musicians. In order not to enlarge the survey to an inconvenient length, many publications which have no especial claim to consideration will be left unnoticed. The reader must therefore not expect to find an exhaustive list of works on the subject under discussion.

National Songs.

Collections of National Songs which contain merely notation of the airs, with the words, are generally the most desirable for the musical student. In many collections a pianoforte accompaniment has been added which is foreign to the original music and which obscures its characteristics. Pianoforte arrangements of airs, in which the words have been omitted, are generally the least useful, since it is seldom possible to ascertain from them how much is genuine, and to disentangle the original air from the interspersions and ornamentations of the arranger. The popular songs of most nations are usually sung by a single voice, or by a number of voices in unison; harmony is employed only in exceptional instances. When in a collection the tunes are faithfully rendered in notation, the student, by being supplied with an additional harmony, has only the disadvantage of possessing a more bulky and expensive book than he requires. Be this as it may, the pianoforte accompaniments of National Songs are often far too elaborate and anything but tasteful. If the song is to be accompanied, the harmony should, as a rule, be as unpretentious as possible; perhaps a few chords, such as the common chord, on the tonic, on the dominant and subdominant, occasionally struck and long sustained, will be found to answer the purpose best; although the peculiar modulations prevailing in the airs of certain nations require some unusual successions of chords, if they are to be harmonised at all.

In examining the collections, the student will probably soon become convinced that National Songs are most effective without the usual attempts of professional musicians to dress them up to greater advantage. As it is, a harmonised national tune conveys not unfrequently a ludicrous impression, somewhat similar to that which might be conveyed by the sight of a peasant, attired in a fashionable evening dress, behaving awkwardly in a drawing-room party.

A published collection of national airs containing genuine specimens from every country, is still an unaccomplished work. The largest collection of the kind which has hitherto appeared in print, was compiled by Andreas Peter Berggreen, a professional musician in Copenhagen, and dates from the year 1855. It is entitled "Folke-Sange og Melodier," and consists of four volumes in oblong folio. A second edition, greatly enlarged, was published in the year 1862, and comprises ten volumes. The songs are with pianoforte accompaniments, and dance-tunes arranged for the pianoforte are interspersed; but it can hardly be said that the editor has been successful with his arrangements. The songs are almost exclusively from European nations; the collection is therefore far from sufficiently comprehensive for the study of National Songs. As might perhaps be expected from the circumstance of the editor being a Dane, the Scandinavian airs comprise a large portion of the work, the first volume containing above two hundred Danish tunes harmonised. Another publication of the kind, but much smaller, is by O. L. B. Wolff, and was published about the year 1840 by Simrock in Bonn. It is entitled "Braga," and contains additional pianoforte accompaniments to the original airs, and German translations of the original poetry. Somewhat similar publications, such as "Bardale," edited by Baumstark and Waldbrühl (Leipzig), "Cent Chants populaires, par G. Fulgence" (Paris), "Orpheus," edited by Kayser (Hamburgh, 1853), are too insignificant to be useful for study. The same may be said of the English publications by Edward Jones, entitled "Lyric Airs" (London, 1804), and "Musical Curiosities" (London, 1811); likewise of Clementi's "Selection from the Melodies of different Nations;" and of the national tunes arranged for the pianoforte by W. Crotch, which form the first volume of his "Specimens of various styles of Music;" and others.

Let us now examine the collections restricted to the songs of single nations, in which we find more useful information. To begin with the Scandinavians (the Danes, Swedes, Norwegians, Icelanders, and Faroe Islanders), who have proved themselves zealous collectors of their beautiful popular songs. As far back as in the year 1591 Sofrenson Vedel, a parson in Denmark, published a number of those famous Danish ballads called "Kämpeviser;" of which, in the year 1695, Peter Syv brought out a greatly enlarged edition. Especially noteworthy is a collection by Abrahamson, Nyerup, and Rahbek, entitled "Udvalgte Danske Viser fra Middelalderen" (Copenhagen, 1812, sm. 8vo, five vols.), which contains, in an appendix, a number of tunes in notation. A supplement to this important work was published by P. Rasmussen and R. Nyerup, in two volumes 8vo (Copenhagen, 1821).

Among the Swedish publications, the student ought to consult especially "Svenska Folk-Visor," by Geijer and Afzelius (Stockholm, 1846, 8vo, three vols.); "Svenska Fornsänger," by Arwidsson (Stockholm, 1834-42, 8vo, three vols.); "Svenska Vallvisor och Hornlåtar," by R. Dybeck (Stockholm, 1846, 8vo). The two last-named works have the notation of the airs without any attempts at improvement by unwarranted arrangements or additions; the work edited by Geijer and Afzelius has a pianoforte accompaniment to the airs, which was made by J. C. F. Haeffner, a German musician residing in Stockholm. There is also an interesting collection of Swedish songs and dance-tunes arranged with pianoforte accompaniments, by Ahlström and Boman (Stockholm, Hirsch, folio); and another, edited by A. G. Rosenberg, and entitled "160 Polskor, Visor och Danslekar uppteeknade i Södermanland, samt sattei för Pianoforte" (Stockholm, 1876, folio).

The most recommendable Norwegian collections are "Norske Folkviser" by M. B. Landstad (Christiania, 1853, 8vo), and "Gamle Norske Folkviser," by Sophus Bugge (Christiania, 1858, 8vo). Both of these works are carefully edited. Landstad is a Norwegian clergyman, and we are informed that his present collection of Norwegian minstrelsy was gathered from the lips of the people. It comprises 113 tunes, which are printed at the end of the volume of poetry. Sophus Bugge, a young student of antiquarian taste and knowledge, about the year 1856 visited the remote villages of Norway, at the expense of the Swedish government, to collect all the metrical tales and traditions that still linger there. Perhaps it may interest some readers of a linguistic taste to be apprised of a little book with tunes which is entitled "Norske Viser og Stev i Folkesproget," and of which a second edition was published by Jorgen Moe (Christiania, 1848, sm. 8vo). The songs are in the dialect of the peasantry, which differs from the Danish language spoken by the educated classes in Norway. Furthermore, there requires to be noticed the "Norske Fjeldmelodier," arranged for the pianoforte by L. M. Lindeman, a learned musician in Christiania, and published in folio. This work contains 283 tunes, which the student may find useful if he has the patience to extricate them from the constant changes in harmony, imitations according to the rules of counterpoint, and other clever contrivances testifying to the editor's skill as a theorist.

Turning to the Slavonic races (the Russians, Poles, Czechs, Wendes, Serbes, &c.), we again meet with several very interesting publications. The Russians especially have not neglected to collect their fine songs and tunes. The most noteworthy Russian books of the kind are by the following editors: Michailow Tchulkow (St. Petersburg, 1770-88); Michailow Popow (St. Petersburg, 1792); Dmitriew (Moscow, 1796); Katalim (Moscow, 1810); Baikow (St. Petersburg, 1814); Shukowsky; Glasunow; Prince Zertülow. The first edition of the well-known collection of Russian popular songs with pianoforte accompaniment, by T. Pratch, was published in St. Petersburg in the year 1790, in one volume 8vo; a second edition, in two volumes 4to, appeared in 1806, and a third edition in 1815. It contains an introductory essay on the Russian National Song, written by Lwow. There is also a noteworthy publication of ancient and modern Russian songs, arranged for the pianoforte, and issued in three volumes 8vo, by Gerstenberg and Ditmar, in St. Petersburg. More recently, A. Kocipinski has brought out a collection of one hundred airs sung in the Ukraine and Podolia. This work, entitled "Pisni, Dumki, i Szumki Ruskoho," &c. (Kiev and Kamenetz 1861, royal 8vo), deserves especial attention. There is also an edition of it in folio, published in the same year, which contains a pianoforte accompaniment to the airs, but has only the first verse of the poetry to each air. In the pianoforte accompaniment the student will find vexatious examples as to how National Music ought not to be treated. The editor is probably a native of the district where the airs are at home; at any rate, his name indicates that he belongs to the Slavonic races, and this being the case, it certainly appears strange that he should have so little caught the spirit of the music as to overload the accompaniment with all kinds of inappropriate passages and unmeaning modulations. It may perhaps seem unnecessary to the reader to have his attention drawn to bad arrangements; but if he examines the publications pointed out in the present survey, he will soon become convinced how important it is, in examining a collection of tunes, to discern at once what is genuine and what is spurious. My observations are intended to facilitate his labour. Other collections of national airs of Little-Russia are by Halahan, Lyssenko, &c.

The Russian language is so little cultivated in Western Europe, that but few English musicians are likely to be able to understand the poetry of the songs just noticed. There are, however, some German translations of Russian songs, with the original tunes, which may perhaps be more convenient to the English student of Slavonic music. Take, for instance, "Russische Volkslieder," by G. von Doppelmair (Leipzig: Breitkopf and Härtel; 4to), and "Die beliebtesten Russischen Volkslieder übersetzt von Grünbaum" (Berlin: Schlesinger; folio).

Having thought it necessary to protest against certain tasteless arrangements, it is to me a duty all the more pleasant to draw attention to the discernment evinced by Oskar Kolberg, in his "Piesni Ludu Polskiego" (Warsaw, 1857, 8vo), which contains 466 Polish airs of songs and dance-tunes. Only the melody is given with the words of the songs; deviations popular in certain districts of Poland are indicated by small notes. In the dance-tunes occasionally some harmony is admitted, precisely as the people are in the habit of introducing it. Moreover, the book is embellished with ten coloured plates representing Poles in their national costumes. Oskar Kolberg is a native of Poland, and studied music for some time in Berlin. On his return to Warsaw he made it one of his principal objects to investigate the National Music of his country. He also published 126 Polish airs with pianoforte accompaniments (Posen, 1842, folio). A collection of Polish songs, by A. Sowinski (Paris, 1830, folio), has a French translation printed together with the original words. Especially noteworthy are also the songs of the people in Cracow, published by Konopka (Cracow, 1840); and the songs of the White-Crobatians, Masovians, and Russinnians on the river Bug, published by K. W. Wojcicki (Warsaw, 1836, two vols.) Songs of the Polish inhabitants in Eastern Prussia have been published by J. J. Lipinski (Posen, 1842, sm. 8vo); Julius Roger (Breslau, 1863, 8vo); Hoffmann von Fallersleben (Cassel, 1865, 8vo).

The Wends are a Slavonic race living in some villages of Lusatia, in Germany. A comprehensive collection of their popular songs, edited by Haupt and Schmaler (Grimma, 1841, 4to, two vols.), contains 530 songs with the tunes. The words are in Wendish, with a German translation; and the interesting work is illustrated with coloured plates representing Wendish men and women in their picturesque costumes, and various objects illustrative of their manners and customs.

A curious instance, showing how even a distinguished musician may be deceived in hunting out national tunes if he has not made the subject his study, occurs in "Presni Polskie i Ruskie Ludu Galicyjskiego," a collection of popular songs of the Polish and Russian people in Galicia, published by Venceslas Zaleski (Lemberg, 1833, 8vo, two vols.) The second volume contains 160 airs, with pianoforte accompaniments, by Charles Lipinski, the celebrated violinist. He was a native of Galicia; nevertheless he admits in his publication, No. 80 of the set of tunes, an air which is in construction and expression so different from those of his native country that he might have surmised that it could not be Galician, although he was not aware that it is the melody of "Nel cor più non mi sento," from the Opera of "La Molinara," by Paisiello, on which Beethoven has composed beautiful variations, and which is known in England as the air of "Hope told a flatt'ring tale." Other Galician popular songs have been collected and published by Zegota Pauli (Lemberg, 1838, 1839).

The Czechs are the Slavonic inhabitants of Bohemia. A valuable collection of their songs, edited by K. J. Erben (Prague, 1862 and 1864, 8vo, two vols.), contains 811 tunes with the original words. An earlier publication, by Erben and Martinowsky (Prague, 1847, 4to), contains 300 songs with pianoforte accompaniments. Particularly interesting are the incorporated twenty old songs of the Hussites, which a friend of Erben committed to notation from the lips of an old minstrel, in the district of Budweis in Bohemia. These Hussite tunes are mostly in the minor key, but are more wild than sad. Other noteworthy publications of Bohemian National Music are by Rittersberg and Weber (Prague); Frantisek Martinec (Prague, 1856, oblong 8vo); J. Vashak (Prague, 1844); W. A. Swaboda (Prague, 1829, 8vo); F. L. Czelahowsky (Prague, 1822-27); J. W. Kamaryta (Prague, 1832). There are also two fine collections of Moravian songs, edited by Frantisek Sushil. The first of these (Brunn, 1840) has the poetry printed in 12mo, and the music, consisting of 480 tunes without any accompaniment, in oblong folio. The other contains, in one volume 8vo, 800 songs, with their tunes, and was published in Brunn in the year 1860.

In the charming Wallachian airs arranged for the pianoforte by J. A. Wachmann, a music director at Bucharest, we have an instructive example as to how such music ought to be treated if it is to be arranged at all. In the present instance the difficulty was the greater, since the peculiar succession of tones prevalent in the Wallachian melodies, with the frequent occurrence of the interval called the superfluous (or augmented) second, rather invites the arranger to some unwarrantable treatment. Wachmann has not been misled to extravagances; the genuine melody is always clearly prominent, and the accompaniment renders the peculiar rhythm which distinguishes many of the Wallachian tunes. There are in all sixty-two melodies thus issued by Wachmann, in four numbers (Vienna: Müller; folio), and the first number dates from about the middle of the present century. Wachmann states, in a short preface to the third number, that he has taken great care to retain the original characteristics of the music, that he has not allowed himself to add even a note of embellishment, and that his chief endeavour has been to transfer the music, as he often heard it performed by the perambulating musical bands in Wallachia, to the pianoforte as faithfully as possible. The members of these bands are frequently gipsies. Any musician acquainted with Roumanian music will probably admit that Wachmann has succeeded remarkably well.

It is impossible to bestow a similar commendation on the pianoforte arrangement of Servian tunes by Alois Kalauz (Vienna: Müller; folio, in two numbers); however, as many of the airs have the Servian poetry, with a German translation of the words, given with the notation, it is possible to recognise the original tunes, and to pick out the grain from the chaff. Kalauz gives in the second number some Bosnian tunes, which cannot fail to interest the student on account of their great originality. Here may also be noticed the songs of the Slavonic inhabitants of Carniola, edited by Achazel and Korytho, under the title "Slovenske Pjesni Krajnskiga Naroda" (Laibach, 1839).

LONDON UNIVERSITY MUSICAL DEGREES.

By H. HEATHCOTE STATHAM.

LOOKING over the new code of regulations as to the attainment of degrees in music, just published by the London University, one is reminded of the anecdote of Rossini turning over M. Fétis' work on composition at a music publisher's, when the author of the treatise happened to enter. "Ah! M. Fétis," said Rossini, as the numerous chapters on all the varieties of counterpoint and fugue flitted before his eyes, "does it take all this to enable one to compose?" Perhaps the story has two edges to it; for it may be admitted that Rossini, like the imaginary person reprobated by Wordsworth, "had faculties which he had never used," and might have turned his genius to higher account had he been willing to give more serious study to musical construction. A thorough grasp of the scientific construction of music, on the basis of the theories which most of the great masters of the art have acknowledged, must, no doubt, be acquired by any one who would handle with freedom and mastery even the less logical forms of composition; unless when in exceptional cases, as in that of Mozart, such power seems to come by instinct. But this is a very small part of the London University programme, which must be credited with being a scheme for arming the professor of music at all points with a thoroughness which has hardly been proposed hitherto in this country. Of the completeness of the curriculum, as a "preventive measure," there can be little question. None of the great composers could have taken degrees under it. Bach, with his strong and logical brain, and power of steady application, would have been the most likely of them to go in for it. One can imagine Handel dismissing it with, "Te tevil! vot vor sall I tell you of de vhenomena of zound, and of hydrosdadigs and hydrauligs—dom your degree!" Mozart laughing it off, in a jaunty little note to one of his très cher correspondents; Beethoven wrapping bread and cheese in it; Chopin dreamingly musing over "the principles of melodial progression" and "the phenomena attending the combinations of two sounds." Mendelssohn would have had more chance of making something of it, and could have got the degree if he had given his mind to it; but then he certainly never would; he was too fond of society.

However, of course, it may be said that the object of a Mus. Doc. curriculum is not to make great composers, but to point out by a distinguishing honour certain men who have taken the trouble to learn all that can be learned about the history and science of music, and who receive a kind of imprimatur as recognised authorities, to whom any one, even the distinguished composer himself, may go for information upon any knotty point which it needs science and study rather than genius to unravel. This, again, is not the way in which musical degrees have hitherto been regarded. Of course, one may leave out of the question the sham degrees for merely nominal knowledge which have been rightly falling into utter disrepute; but the existing recognised musical degrees include mainly what is necessary for a good standard of professional knowledge as a musician, being chiefly based on the evidence of sound attainment in counterpoint and the more elaborate forms of composition; and, of course, it is well known that these are often sought by clever young musicians who have no initial advantage of means or connection, and who want the affix to their name as a help to them in making a start in their professional life. There is no reason why a degree should not be sought with this object; but it must be recognised that the London University degree, as proposed, will necessarily stand on a different footing. It would not "pay" any man to go through their curriculum to obtain the degrees merely as a means of getting his name forward. The obstacle is not merely in the large amount of scientific knowledge in regard to the physical basis of music which is demanded, and which would, it may be said, be of no practical value in the ordinary pursuit of the musical profession, but in the fact that, before the musical degree can be attacked at all, the candidate must have passed the general matriculation examination, which requires him to show a competent knowledge in each of the following subjects:—1. Latin; 2, any two out of a list of other languages (Greek, French, German, Sanscrit, or Arabic); 3, the English language, English History, and Modern Geography; 4, Mathematics; 5, Natural Philosophy; 6, Chemistry. The details of the acquirements expected under these heads are given, and include considerably more than mere generalities.

If it is the object of the London University to create a high class of scientific musical scholars, with a basis of broad general education, literary and scientific, of course this is an admirable programme, and the only thing needed is to find the people who will have sufficient enthusiasm to work up to it, and who are sufficiently independent to afford time to do so. But it is only reasonable to ask whether this is the object, or whether it is intended to appeal to the musical profession generally? If the latter, then the University have overshot the mark in demanding a degree of knowledge of subjects apart from music which no one intending to make his living by active professional work could possibly have time to acquire. This is to be regretted, because, without intending anything censorious of the musical profession, it will probably be admitted by most readers, including the best class among the professional musicians themselves, that there is nothing more required in the musical profession, or which would tend more to elevate it in social estimation, than a higher standard of general culture than at present for the most part exists within its ranks; and this end would have been far more likely to be attained by giving a musical degree for proficiency in the knowledge and the handling of music as an art, preceded by a more limited matriculation examination, such as would insure that the candidate had received a fair liberal education, but not burdening him with scientific subjects which he may never intend to make use of again, and which, if he means serious work as a musician, he cannot possibly have time to study thoroughly. If the London University degree were framed on this principle, it might, if properly worked, have become an instrument for raising the educational status of the musical profession; but as it is framed it cannot do so, because it attempts too much, and is calculated only to bring forth a small band of musical sciolists. If this is the object, well and good; certainly the degree is hardly one which Handel could have turned over to his "pellows-plower;" only one cannot help feeling that more might be accomplished if less were demanded, and that a general raising of the status of musical education would be of even more value than the production of a few erudite scientific theorists.

For the long list of subjects to be studied we must refer readers to the printed copy of "Regulations," to be obtained from the Registrar of the University of London; we may mention that the Mus. Bac. Examinations include a knowledge of the theoretic physical basis of music, and the production of a composition in five-part vocal counterpoint, with accompaniments for a quintett string band, with the knowledge of the theory of counterpoint and musical form, a critical knowledge of the scores of standard classical compositions, &c. The Mus. Doc. examination goes further on the same lines, and, in fact, is obviously intended to include all that can, so far, be known about music; which of course is as it should be. One or two points in detail seem open to question. For instance, the candidate for Mus. Bac. who is told that he is to be examined in "the principles of the construction of chords" might very fairly retort "Whose principles?" And at all events it would be as well to give some indication whether any particular theory is favoured, or whether an adequate exposition by the candidate of the theory which he considers to be the correct one will pass muster. Among one or two subjects which the Mus. Bac. candidate may claim to be examined in for extra honours is "playing an accompaniment from a figured bass." Is it worth while to keep up examination in an art which the full writing and engraving of modern music has rendered superfluous? Among the Mus. Doc. subjects occurs "the principles of melodial progression." Here, again, there seems to be a begging of the question. Is every one agreed there are principles of melodial progression? And if so, what they are? What would Herr Wagner have to say on the point? On the other hand, there is one subject in the list of great value, and new (as far as I know) in such a curriculum: viz., "the general distinction between physical and æsthetical* or artistic principles, as bearing on musical forms and rules." If the London University can get any one to settle that, they will indeed have done something to speak of, something not a little significant towards parting the sheep from the goats in modern music.

There is one provision, however, in the Mus. Doc. regulations by no means novel, but to my thinking most undesirable—that, namely, which rules that the candidate, having written a test composition in eight-part vocal harmony, with full orchestral accompaniment, shall be required to conduct a public performance of his exercise at his own expense. The objection to this is not merely that, as an able critic in a contemporary has already pointed out, many men who are competent to pass the examination with honour may be very ill able to afford the expense of such a performance; the far stronger objection is that it is undesirable on artistic grounds to make public performances of music written to order and as an exercise. The whole object of such examinations as these is to give proof of proficiency in the scientific knowledge and handling of music; but that is only the means. The end of music is poetic expression, and in that no one can be examined: success or non-success can be estimated only by the emotion of the listeners, and that which is to produce emotion must be the product of emotion, which a composition made to order and to illustrate the scientific difficulties of composition hardly ever can be. Numbers of these test Cantatas are in existence somewhere, and whoever hears them, hears of them, or cares for them? The audience who hear them are only likely to feel, like the organist in Browning's poem:—

> So your fugue broadens and thickens,
> Greatens and deepens and lengthens,
> Till we exclaim—"But where's music, the dickens?"

No; let the candidate write his "exercise" in due form, satisfy the examiners, and then, if he is wise, put it in the waste-basket, and never think of it again.

The perusal of such a curriculum as this, after all, tends to make one melancholy. For, if all analogy in art-history goes for anything, this determination to "know all about it" is one of the strongest indications that what many of us sadly suspect is but too true—that music as an emotional and joyful art is "played out." It is with art as with an organism, you cannot probe and dissect it while it is living; it is only after death that there comes the investigation by the scalpel. Music has lived a short but happy life with the world, and now her heart has ceased to beat and her life-blood to flow, and we sit down before her dead organism to investigate the reason of it, and find out how it was all done, and why it affected us so powerfully. The study is not without interest, though we can never really fathom the mystery even by the help of Helmholtz and his compeers. But will all this learning give us one new emotion in music—one new symphony to speak to us with a voice like that of the Immortal Nine? We have here a splendid machinery for turning out musical professors; but who will turn us out a musical poet?

* Why "æsthetical?" We generally say æsthetic. And if "æsthetical," why not "artistical?" If the termination is right for the one word, it must be for the other.—H. H. S.

"GOD SAVE THE KING."

By WILLIAM H. CUMMINGS.

THIS is all George Saville Carey could say concerning the assumption that his father, Henry Carey, had composed "God save the King." The attempts of Carey the younger to obtain a pension failed, and he seems to have accepted the situation with tolerable equanimity. Had other and more weighty evidence been obtainable he doubtless would have brought it into notice. He adds to the foregoing statement:—

> I am convinced, had my plea been fairly stated at a great and good man's house, I should have had a Princely answer; but his doors perhaps, like Jaffer's, might have been "damm'd up," not with "starving creditors," but clamorous petitioners, backed with such irrestible influence that there was nothing to be done for me.

It is only fair here to refer to a statement, which has obtained considerable acceptance, that Henry Carey sang "God save the King" in 1740 at a tavern in Cornhill, at a dinner given to celebrate the victory of Admiral Vernon at Portobello. The evidence adduced to support this assertion is not very direct or precise. A letter addressed to the Gentlemen's Magazine in 1796 contains the following passage: "The first time I ever heard the anthem of 'God save the King' was about the year 1740, on some public occasion, at a tavern in Cornhill." Mr. Townsend in 1794 told Mr. John Ashley, of Bath, that his father dined with Henry Carey at a tavern in Cornhill, in the year 1740, at a meeting convened to celebrate Admiral Vernon's capture of Portobello, and that "Carey sang it on that occasion." "The applause he received was very great, especially when he announced it to be his own composition" (Ashley's letter to the Rev. W. L. Bowles, 1828). This third-hand evidence is surely of small value. It is possible that the memory of these gentlemen may have played them false, and that they heard Carey sing some patriotic song resembling "God save the King." There are two songs of Carey's which might have done duty at the tavern in Cornhill. One of them is to the following words:—

> He comes, he comes, the Hero comes,
> Sound, sound your trumpets, beat your drums.
> From Port to Port let cannons roar
> His welcome to the British Shoar.
> Welcome to the British Shoar.
> Prepare, prepare, your songs prepare,
> Loud, loudly rend the Ecchoing Air;
> From pole to pole your joys resound,
> For Virtue is with glory crown'd.
> Virtue, Virtue, Virtue, Virtue,
> Virtue is with glory crown'd.

The second song is to be found in a small stage piece of Carey's which he calls "Nancy, or, The Parting Lovers: an Interlude set to music by the author:"—

> AIR.—Death or Victory, now must determinate
> All disputes with Haughty Spain;
> That proud race we'll entirely exterminate,
> Or be Masters of the Main.
> CHORUS.—Britons, rouse up your great magnanimity:
> Let your courage now be shewn!
> Till proud Spain shall, with Pusilanimity,
> For its insults past atone.

If Carey really had been the sole author and composer of "God save the King," how was it that he never included it in any of his numerous publications? and if "God save the King" had been sung at the convivial meeting in Cornhill, in 1740, with so much applause, would it not have been published by one of the many musicsellers who at the time were ever ready to appropriate and publish the effusions of composers of merit or note?

A writer on the subject in Long Ago, February, 1874, accounts for the non-publication of "God save the King" by hazarding the supposition that Carey's last printed composition appeared in 1740, and that "God save the King" was probably written immediately afterward; but this is clearly an error, for I have now lying before me a printed song of Henry Carey's, composed and written to celebrate the "late glorious victory at Dettingen." The date of this victory was June 16, 1743, therefore Carey's song must have been published only just before his death, which took place on October the 5th of the same year. Again, I find the following advertisement in the Daily Advertiser, December 20, 1743:—

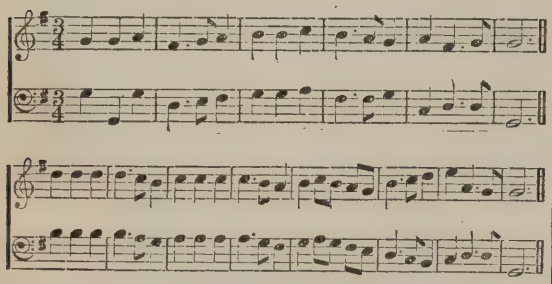
Whereas the late Mr. Henry Carey published proposals, dated September 20, 1743, for the reprinting of his Dramatic works in Quarto, bound in calves leather, at half a guinea; this is to give notice, that the said books are reprinted, and ready to be deliver'd to the subscribers. The widow of the late Mr. Carey humbly begs the favour of those gentlemen and ladies who are subscribers, to send a letter or messenger to her house in Cross Street, Hatton Garden, where they shall be deliver'd, she being unacquainted where to send, otherwise would wait on them with the said books, and likewise those gentlemen and ladies who have subscribed to his "Musical Century" may be supplied therewith at the same place.

From the latter part of this advertisement we may infer that a new edition of the "Musical Century" had just been issued from the press. As "God save the King" appeared in "Harmonia Anglicana," in 1742, without a composer's name, is it not most probable that had Carey been wholly entitled to the authorship he would have included it, with his name, in his publications of 1743? I cannot altogether believe that Mr. John Christopher Smith's correction of Carey's bass can have reference to "God save the King." Smith, the friend and amanuensis of Handel, was an admirable musician, as is evidenced by his numerous compositions; surely then the following corrected bass from the "Harmonia Anglicana," can scarcely be considered as worthy of his well-known skill:—



It must be borne in mind that Arne and Burney, who arranged the anthem for the theatres in 1745, never associated Carey's name with the air in any shape or form, and that no claim was made on his behalf before that of G. S. Carey, in 1799.

Dr. Chrysander, in his "Jahrbücher" (Leipzig, 1863), page 397, gives a paragraph in italics, as if from the General Advertiser, 28th of September, 1745: "An demselben 28 September liefs Lacy zum erstenmal in seinen Theater Carey's God save the King singen." ("On the same 28 September, Lacy had Carey's 'God save the King' sung for the first time in his theatre.") This is calculated to mislead. It is true, as we have seen by the extract from the Daily Advertiser, September 30, 1745, previously quoted, that "God save the King" was first performed at the theatre on September 28, but Carey's name never appears in connection with it in the General Advertiser, or any other paper of the period.

On Thursday, the 17th of November, 1743, a performance was given at Covent Garden Theatre for the benefit of the widow and family of Henry Carey. The advertisement announcing it is curious as containing the only instance I have seen of Carey's name appearing without an "e," evidently a misprint; his name is always spelt Carey on his own numerous publications, and on the rolls of the "Royal Society of Musicians," of which he was a member.

For the benefit of the Widow and four small children of the late Mr. Henry Cary. At the Theatre Royal in Covent Garden on Thursday next, the 17th inst., will be presented a Comedy, call'd The Miser. The part of Lappit to be perform'd by Mrs. Clive, in which character will be added a Farce call'd The Virgin Unmask'd. The part of Miss Lucy by Mrs. Clive. With other entertainments as will be express'd in the bills. Boxes 5s. Pit 3s. Gallery 2s. Tickets and places to be had of Mr. Page at the Stage door of the Theatre, or at Mr. Suett's, the Apple Tree in Cold-Bath Fields; or at the Widow Cary's in Cross Street, Hatton Garden.

In the Daily Advertiser, December 1, 1743, we find the following prologue, which may be regarded as containing a summary of the notable doings of the deceased Henry Carey, but we find no reference to any National Song or Anthem:—

Prologue (spoke by Mr. Hale) to The Miser; acted at the Theatre Royal in Covent Garden, for the benefit of the Widow of the late Mr. Henry Carey, and her four small children.

By Mr. Lockman.

Deep in the Fane, where Monarch's breathless lie,
Pleas'd we the Busts, to Poets would descry;
As a just Tribute offer'd to their Name:
And rousing some to vie with them in Fame.
Yet idle all such Trophies must appear,
Compar'd to what now forms the Circle here:
Those are but Honours to a Phantom paid;
By you the Helpless will be Happy made.
And sure no contrast is more strong or just,
Than that 'twixt succouring Life and honouring Dust,
Ye generous Souls, whose sympathising Breast
Shares every Pang that tortures the distress'd,
Say, mid the various Joys you taste below,
What Bliss so great as easing virtuous Woe?
O! say what Charm, the Widow's Tear to dry,
To echo fondly to the Orphan's sigh?—
To be their Guardian, bid their Wailings cease
And, with kind Language, tune their Souls to Peace?
Frequent the Bard, whose Reliques are your Care,
In Theatres has pleas'd the Brave and Fair;
His double Muse diverts us from the Stage,
Whilst Nature, Humour, ev'ry Ear engage:
She soothes in private, whilst the Fair-One sings
Gaily responsive to th' harmonious Strings.
Ah! should his breathing Offspring then be left
Weeping, defenceless, of all Aid bereft?
Be sunk in Sorrow, when their Father's Lyre
With Cheerfulness does ev'ry Heart inspire?
Vain is the Recompense, of only Fame:
Who serve the Public, thence Support may claim.
Yet this Reflection cannot here have Place,
Vanish'd the Bard and clos'd his mortal Race;
From his blithe Fancy you no more expect,
And 'tis from Goodness only you protect.
Exalted Goodness! which whilst it supplies
Another's Wants, bids countless Transports rise;
Transports that bless the Donor; dart a Joy
Which naught can lessen, nor even Death destroy.
Raptures like these (bright Charity's alone, Child of the Skies) to Avarice are unknown.
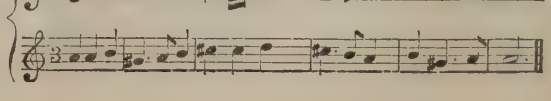
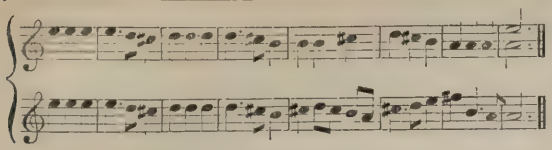
Av'rice to all Things, but mean Interest blind,
Can boast no kindred; outcast of Mankind.
Fruitless, mid you, our comic Muse wou'd place
Her sportive Glass, in hopes to catch a Face.
She comes not to instruct, but to delight,
So only holds your Counterpart in Sight;
A Miser! Weeds like this curse ev'ry Soil
Beauty is best distinguished by her Foil.

It has now been seen (1) that the earliest known copy of "God save the King" was published in 1742 without name of either author or composer; (2) that there is no reliable evidence to show that Carey had aught to do with its composition; and I think it has also been shown (3) that the resemblance between the tune of "God save the King" and the Ayre of Dr. Bull (written and composed without a title and without words) could not have been accidental. In order to make this last point as clear as possible, I give Bull's Ayre and the 1742 "God save the King" in parallel staves. The latter I have transposed one tone higher in order that the comparison may be more easily made:—





At the commencement of this history of the "God save the King" controversy, reference was made to a recent letter of Lord Houghton's which appeared in the Times. That letter concluded with the following bold assertion: "The French might find some consolation in the knowledge that 'God save the King' was composed by Lully, and first produced on the visit of Louis XIV. and Madame de Maintenon to the convent of the Demoiselles de St.-Cyr. Some years after it was happily and unscrupulously appropriated by Dr. Bull, organist of St. Paul's."

Lully was born in 1633, five years after the death of Dr. Bull, who, by the way, was never organist of St. Paul's; therefore the stigma of "unscrupulous appropriation" should rest on the head of Lully, were there any foundation for the mythical performance before Louis and Madame de Maintenon. The whole story, however, rests on the mendacious fabrication entitled "Souvenirs de la Marquise de Créqui, 1710 à 1800," Paris 1834. Soon after the appearance of this work the first and second volumes were noticed in the Quarterly Review. The article extends to nearly eight pages, and most conclusively proves the worthlessness and absurdity of the clumsy forgery. A sentence or two from the Quarterly Review must suffice:—

Infinite are the shapes of falsehood, and depuis feu Protée, as Madame de Deffand pleasantly says, nothing can equal the versatility of a Parisian manufacturer of memoirs. We are confident, and shall prove, that the "Mémoires" are, in every point of view, a complete forgery—the grossest and most impudent of impostures; for not only are the facts false, and the work spurious, but the very person to whom they are attributed is a phantom created by the ignorance of the fabricator, who, having very ridiculously mistaken one lady of the family of Créqui for another, builds his whole edifice on this fundamental blunder. We add, that the literary merit of the work is worse than nothing—vulgar trash—stupid threadbare stories, not only common to all French jest-books, but to be found in our own Joe Miller—indecent in many passages, disgusting in more, contemptible in all.

The article from which the above passages have been extracted appeared in June, 1834, and in the following August the story of "God save the King" and the nuns of St.-Cyr was innocently paraded in the Times as a marvellous discovery, but was very speedily demolished. The Parisians, not content with the "Souvenirs de la Marquise de Créqui," manufactured the following canard, which appeared in the Cabinet de Lecture:—

They write from Edinburgh that the MS. Memoirs of the Duchess of Perth have been sold in London for £3,000; among them are to be found a number of interesting details relative to the court of Louis XIV., as well as of James II., during the sojourn of the King and Queen of England at St.-Germain-en-Laye. In giving an account of the establishment of St.-Cyr, she bears testimony not quite unknown in France, but which hitherto rested on that of the ancient nuns of this house, namely, that the air and words of "God save the King" are of French origin. She says, when the most Christian King entered the Chapel, all the Choir of the aforesaid noble damsels sang each time the following words to a very fine air by Sieur de Lully.

OPERA OR ORATORIO?

THE gentleman who writes upon music for the Athenæum tells the readers of that learned weekly that he has discovered something really "too bad." Can our own readers imagine what that something is? Perhaps they fancy it may be a habit of using the pages of confiding journals for the purpose of unmeasured puff or unmitigated abuse, without reference to anything save personal feeling. No, it is not that. Perhaps they fancy it may be taking liberties with dead composers, or vulgarising music by excess of noise. No, it is neither of these offences. Then what is it? Simply that musical history is often treated in this country with recklessness. As our own duty consists, in humble measure, of contributing to musical history, we are naturally alarmed at the discovery of the gentleman who writes for the Athenæum. And we therefore proceed to examine the article by which he seeks to substantiate the charge.

The text of the gentleman's article is Rossini's "Mosè in Egitto," about which, it appears, some people have made the "extraordinary statement" that it is an Opera. Those are the people who treat musical history recklessly, and this is a specimen of their reprehensible doings. "Mosè in Egitto," the gentleman says, is not an Opera but an Oratorio. It was produced, we are told, "at the San Carlo in Naples, during Lent, 1818, as an Oratorio, and as such first performed at Covent Garden Theatre in 1822, at the Lenten Concerts of Sacred Music, under the direction of Bochsa, the harpist." Now here we have a contribution to musical history made in very explicit terms. Let us see if there be in it any trace of the recklessness with which the writer charges others. "Mosè" was brought out at the San Carlo "as an Oratorio." The reader will observe that the word "Oratorio" is used without having attached to it any special signification, and must therefore be considered as employed in its ordinary and accepted English sense. Now what is the ordinary and accepted sense of "Oratorio" among those whom the gentleman addresses. It means a sacred musical drama performed without the aid of dramatic action and stage effects. This has always been the meaning of the term in English; for Hawkins tells us that among the considerations which led Handel to go on writing Oratorios was the fact that their representation "could be conducted at a small expense: no costly scenery was required, nor dresses for the performers other than a suit of black, with which all persons that appeared in public were supposed to be provided." When therefore an English musical historian, writing for English readers, tells them that "Mosè" was first brought out "as an Oratorio," he must be understood to mean that it was performed without scenery, dresses, and action. But we know, and the gentleman knows, that in reality "Mosè" was played on the stage precisely in the manner of an Opera. Then he must intend us to accept the term "Oratorio" in its Italian and not its English sense. Very good; but why could he not say so? "Really the recklessness with which musical history is often treated in this country is too bad." Thus the gentleman exclaims in the Athenæum, and we quite agree with him. Next we are told "Mosè" was performed "as such"—that is, "as an Oratorio"—at Covent Garden Theatre in 1822, at the Lenten Concerts of Sacred Music. What are we to infer from this? If the performance at the San Carlo "as an Oratorio" was a stage representation, what was it "as such" at Covent Garden? By the ordinary rules of interpretation it must have been a stage representation also. But we know, and the gentleman knows, that it was not. It follows that "as such" cannot mean "as an Oratorio." Then what does it mean? This careful and accurate historian leaves us to guess. Next, observe the statement that Mr. Bochsa's Lenten Concerts were "concerts of sacred music," the insinuation of course being that "Mosè" was not regarded as an Opera. We have not Mr. Bochsa's programme for 1822 at hand, but those for the following Lent are before us, and what sort of "sacred music" do we find in them? We find these things: Rossini's "Donna del Lago," the Irish ditty "Savournah deelish," "Auld Robin Gray," and "Saw ye my wee thing." But we find something else, to wit: Rossini's "Ciro in Babilonia," a work written for the Communal Theatre of Florence, and produced in the Lent of 1812. "Ciro," be it observed, runs "on all fours" with "Mosè." Both have scriptural stories; both were composed for Lenten use; and both might be described as "Oratorios" in the Italian sense of the term. But how did the, no doubt, "reckless" musical historians of 1823 look upon "Ciro"? Here is what one of them said about it: "'Cyrus' is a mere commonplace Opera; as such it might have that 'brilliant success' which is said to attend all novelties in the present day. But, somehow or other, these brilliantly successful novelties often die very suddenly and are immediately forgotten. Such is the fate of 'Cyrus' as an Oratorio, such its fate would be as an Opera." So then this scriptural musical drama, an exact counterpart of "Mosè," was an Opera in English eyes, and only became an Oratorio when performed off the stage. It is clear that the gentleman who writes on music for the Athenæum plunged himself into difficulties when he confounded the Italian meaning of "Oratorio" with the English, and tried to palm both upon us as the same thing. "Mosè" might properly enough have been called an "Oratorio" by the composer's countrymen, but so to style it in English, leaving the work to be accepted "as such" in the English sense, is an abuse of terms.

Let us look a little farther into the Athenæum article. Rossini, we are told, was not, any more than Méhul, "merely a secular operatic writer." As far as we know nobody ever said he was, but that is not the point. How is the assertion sustained? Simply by observing that Rossini once played an organ at Pesaro and was taught by a man who inherited Padre Martini's library. With all humility, we fail to see how these facts bear on the question of the master's sacred gifts. But what can possibly be the meaning of this sentence?—"The first Opera of the composer of 'Guillaume Tell' was represented at the San Mosè Theatre, in Venice, in 1810, and this suggested to Rossini the setting of his Oratorio at Naples in 1818." Are we to infer that the "Oratorio" was a sort of graceful compliment to the theatre wherein the master began his operatic career? If so, the fact is certainly curious. The gentleman goes on to tell us that because Rossini had written more than twenty operas between 1810 and 1818, he gladly embraced the opportunity of composing an "Oratorio" and thus resuming his ecclesiastical style. He used to say this, it seems, to his friends in Paris, with what a twinkle of the eye we can well imagine. As for the "ecclesiastical style" prior to 1810, where is the evidence of it? We certainly do not find the evidence in the Cantata, "Il Pianto d'Armonia," the Orchestral Symphony, or the String Quartett, which are the only previous compositions in the published list of his works. Next we come upon this observation, "The audiences at the 'Mosè' (sic) were dressed in black as a recognition of the sacred drama, which was revived," &c. Here it is obvious that the term "sacred drama" is used in a specific sense and refers to "Mosè," and we are therefore to believe that the Neapolitans donned mourning in recognition of the solemnity of the Oratorio. The matter is ingeniously put, but of course we all know that black was generally worn during Lent, and had no more reference to "Mosè" than it had to the man in the moon. We might follow up the Athenæum article much further, but enough has been said to show with what propriety the gentleman who wrote it can take upon himself to say, "Really the recklessness with which musical history is often treated in this country is too bad."

In the recently published "Supplément" to the "Biographie Universelle des Musiciens" there is, of course, a long notice of Helmholtz. As there are no initials attached, we suppose that the Editor, M. Arthur Pougin, assumes the responsibility of the remarks contained in that article. After telling us very rightly that the most important part of the labours of Helmholtz relates to his theory of quality of tone, and giving us a very excellent summary of the question quoted from an article by M. Gustave Bertrand in the Revue Moderne of January, 1868, the writer proceeds in this strain: "The misfortune is that M. Helmholtz was not content with the valuable discovery he had made, but was anxious to found upon it a whole system of music which might serve as a basis for a pretended new theory of harmony. That aim was beyond his mission. Falling back on the errors of Rameau—who was at least a musician—he had the pretension to find in the series of harmonics a species of natural harmony, the principle of which is, however, long since condemned. M. Helmholtz has not escaped the ordinary failing of scientific men, who not only endeavour to mix up music with acoustics, but to teach musicians their own art and substitute algebraical calculations for the delicate testimony of the ear." Surely the criticism we have just quoted from the "Supplément" will in some future edition require emendation. It is scarcely exact as a representation of facts; putting aside individual appreciation of the technical value of the musical system of Helmholtz as far as it goes. It is quite true that Helmholtz presents his scientific theories as a new groundwork for a musical system; but if he enters more into technical details than is usual with physicists he apologises for the intrusion. "Here," he says, "I close my work. It appears to me I have carried it as far as the physiological properties of sensation, of hearing, exercise a direct influence on the construction of a musical system." ("Sensations of Tone," p. 577.) Many other quotations could be given to prove that Helmholtz had not the pretension to erect on his discoveries a "whole system of music" or "new theory of harmony" in the technical sense. It is also true that his theory of consonance induced him to lean towards some of the doctrines of Rameau, who, as M. Pougin says, "was at least a musician," and therefore responsible for his own "errors;" but so far from Helmholtz "finding in the harmonics a species of natural harmony," he takes occasion to remind us that if Rameau was right enough in appealing to nature for pleasing triads, she could have provided him with other combinations, that were anything but agreeable, as harmony. M. Pougin has failed to perceive that the whole gist of the discoveries of Helmholtz tend to prove that the series of harmonics cannot be taken as a paradigm of harmony, but only of timbre; which depends not merely on the particular distribution of the sounds, but on their relative intensities. The latter condition cannot be recognised in technical harmony. Finally, so far from Helmholtz endeavouring to substitute "calculation" for the dictates of the "ear," he tells us over and over again that the scale itself is a question of æsthetics. Moreover, he alone of all scientists has explained to us why it is that arithmetic as it has been hitherto applied fails; and why the mere ratio of an interval is only a concomitant and not a cause of consonance or dissonance. The inaccuracy of the article on so important a subject is unfortunate, not only because the "Biographie Universelle" is the best of its kind, but because it has provided the materials for so many notices and biographies, and is likely to be well fingered by the compilers of many dictionaries to come. Independently of the generally erroneous view of the teaching of Helmholtz, the whole tone of the article in the "Supplément" reminds us of a recent remark of Mr. Lewes, that "the artist is quite willing to accept the chemist's methodised experience of chemical facts, but refuses to listen to the chemist theorising about Art." We are also told by the same authority that the difference between common knowledge and science is the difference between measuring by a foot-rule and by trigonometry. That is all very well; but in justice to the artist we must say that as it is his business to deal with general effects, whilst the scientist has to deal with accuracy in particular facts, it frequently happens that in Art questions there is something like an exchange of weapons, and it is the scientist who then flourishes in our faces the "foot-rule." Hence some of the "dread and dislike of science."

How much spontaneous charity is called forth from the general public by the calamities which periodically occur and are placed prominently before us through the medium of the press it is unnecessary to enlarge upon. All those who generously exert themselves in cases of sudden emergency to procure funds for the sufferers by any accident can almost calculate with certainty upon a truly gratifying result for their labours. But it is good also that attention should be drawn to the many acts of charity bestowed by musical artists upon their brethren who either are less fortunate in obtaining a high rank in public favour, or who, having once attained an exalted position, have been reduced to comparative poverty. Hundreds of such instances are now within our knowledge; but it will be sufficient, in proof of the truth of our assertion, to cite the late successful concert for the testimonial to Signor Mario—when the greatest artists volunteered their valuable services; and one, unable to attend, from indisposition, substantially atoned for his absence by a cheque for a hundred guineas; the performance of the "Messiah," in aid of the Royal Society of Musicians, the principal executants in which, and the Conductor (who is a member of the Society) received not the slightest emolument for a really arduous morning's work; and the concerts, organised by two of the most eminent vocalists, for the benefit of the Hospital for Diseases of the Throat and Chest, and for the "Grosser Kurfürst" fund. It is true that those who purchase tickets for these concerts are indirectly furthering the charitable cause for which they are given; but for their contributions they receive a tangible equivalent, whilst the artist, whose income is ever precarious, from physical causes beyond human control, freely gives the capital he has laboured for without any reward save the consciousness that he has assisted in smoothing the declining years of one whose only claim upon him is that he is an artist and in need of help. A paragraph in our present number details the reasons why one of the most deservedly popular of our public favourites, Mr. John Parry, is now unfortunately brought almost to distress. Surely we may hope that the response to the appeal made on his behalf will afford one more instance of the large-hearted sympathy which, as we have said, seems to bind musical artists into one common brotherhood.

THOSE who can remember the time when the traditional "villain" in a melodrama sent a thrill of horror through the spectators at every speech in which the pent-up feelings of his savage nature were exhibited in all their deformity, or when the protector of female innocence was cheered by the whole audience as he rushed in at the right moment to champion the cause of the heroine by inflicting summary vengeance upon her persecutor, must be astonished to find that when such incidents are now placed upon the stage they either elicit but a moderate share of applause, or are received with subdued, yet very decided, laughter. As it is with our dramatic, so it is with our operatic, audiences. The conventionalities of the musical pieces which were long accepted in this country as "English Operas," became gradually distasteful to those who were beginning to understand the requirements of high-class lyrical works; and entertainments of this kind, fashioned upon a model set by the rules of commerce rather than by the rules of art, no longer made the fame of men whose greatest claim was that they successfully supplied the wants of an uneducated public. Amongst the many necessary ingredients required to form one of these essentially British musical pieces of patchwork may be named the "ballad," two or three of which were regularly looked for and as regularly applauded and encored. By degrees, however, these cut-and-dried specimens of maudlin sentimentality began to be coldly received; and as knowledge in the matter advanced, they were allowed to pass almost without a hand. As long as this change of feeling was confined to the more fashionable portion of the audience, it was found that sufficient support was still accorded to these effusions from what might be termed the "popular" element. But now even this frail prop seems to be removed. In many of the Operas lately brought forward, the "ballads," obviously introduced for mercantile purposes, have utterly failed to produce the intended effect; and when—as occurred during the performance of the most recent of these works—we are reminded by the occupants of the gallery that they don't want any more "shop-songs," it seems about time for our English composers to take the matter into their serious consideration.

IT must not be imagined that the magistrates in Scotland are so careful to secure the peace of the residents that they will not allow even one of the mildest of musical instruments to be played in the streets, for it is evident that the poor Orangeman who was sentenced to fourteen days' imprisonment for performing on the flute in the streets of a burgh near Glasgow, incurred the displeasure of the authorities by selecting for the display of his talents the tune of "Boyne Water." It was unfortunate indeed for the prisoner that the judge before whom he was brought was well acquainted with the air and its political significance, for in an appeal against the sentence which came on in the Supreme Court of Scotland, the Lord Justice Clerk declared that he "did not know the words of 'Boyne Water,' and never knew anybody who did;" that "various words were often put to the same tune," and that the air "might be played in many places in Scotland with the utmost impunity." The Court then quashed the conviction and gave the released prisoner his expenses. Now if it can be accepted as a fact that scarcely any persons are acquainted with the verses to which this tune has been wedded, the truth of the assertion that it can be played in many places in Scotland with impunity can hardly be doubted, for these are of course the very spots where the magistrates—in whom the wisdom is presumed to be concentrated—know nothing about the matter. There is hope, therefore, for the Orangeman, if he is still resolved to persevere in his open-air performance; for, as the Lord Justice Clerk said that he "did not know the words of 'Boyne Water,' and never knew anybody who did," it is not likely that in his next musical essay he will—relying upon the rule laid down by the worthy judge—have the ill luck again to light upon one of the very few exceptions.

WE have already spoken in high terms of the enthusiasm which prompts amateur vocalists to band themselves into choirs for the performance of high-class works; and lovers of music owe a deep debt of gratitude to them for their zealous exertions. But choirs are under the guidance of experienced Conductors, and members are rarely admitted without undergoing a strict examination. Those amateurs, however, who come before us as solo performers, vocalists, or composers, subject themselves to no test of their competence before making an appeal to the public; they can spend their money by hiring rooms and giving concerts, or by publishing compositions, if they feel so inclined; and it is only by attending their concerts or buying their works that we can discover how small are their claims to artistic support. That this is constantly going on around us we need scarcely remind those who are in the world of music; and critics who would fain speak the plain truth find it indeed a hard task to shape their remarks so as not to wound the feelings of those amateurs who come forward as classical executants, or send their works for review "with the best compliments of the composer." The time may come when such aspirants for fame will have to submit the exhibition of their powers to a recognised tribunal before venturing into public; but meantime they must not be surprised if accredited judges do not award even faint praise to crude executants at a concert, the expenses of giving which are beyond the means of professional artists, or refuse to notice compositions with placidity which have been "supervised" by a practised hand, "for a consideration."

SOME time ago, in Paris, a German went to the Opera to hear "Der Freischütz," but the Opera was so cut and patched up with portions of other works that, maintaining it was not "Der Freischütz," he entered an action against the management, and recovered the sum he had paid for admission. Until some such spirited individual is found to bring the lessees of our Italian Opera-houses in England to their senses, we fear that there is little hope of effecting any reformation in similar abuses. At a recent representation of Massé's "Paul and Virginia," for example, at the Royal Italian Opera, after M. Maurel had sang his first song, not only the music of his part, but the part itself, was taken bodily out of the Opera, and this without the slightest notice to the audience. At the same establishment "William Tell" concluded a short time since with the third act; and we know that the "Huguenots" is constantly treated in a like manner. From our own observation we know that (even supposing omissions of this kind are sometimes announced in the papers) the audience usually appear to know nothing of the matter, many persons remaining in their places, libretto in hand, until the boxkeeper politely informs them that they are about to put out the lights. Surely if, regardless of the composer's intention, Operas are thus constantly mutilated, the boxkeeper should not be entrusted with the unpleasant duty of communicating the fact. It would be infinitely better that a regularly appointed official should appear on the stage when the curtain falls for the evening, and put an end to all conjecture upon the subject by saying, "Ladies and gentlemen, it is all over."

WE have often wondered whether the programmes of "Court Concerts" in England are ever read by Germans; and, if so, whether they imagine that they represent the state of musical culture amongst us, or are merely dressed up, like the made-dishes at the Royal table, to suit the appetite of the guests. If they have sufficient knowledge of the rapid strides which high-class music is making with the people in this country, we may reasonably indulge a hope that they charitably take the latter view of the matter; but, presuming that the caterers for the Royal Concerts peruse the musical programmes of similar performances in Germany, how must they, or should they, feel humiliated. Here, for example, is what is termed a portion of the menu of a state banquet, given in Berlin on the 13th ult.:—

1. Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis" ... ... Gluck.
2. Introduction and Wedding Chorus to "Lohengrin" ... ... Wagner.
3. Symphony, No. 13, in G major ... ... Haydn.
4. "Zwei Ungarische Tänze" ... ... Brahms.
5. Serenade ... ... Haydn.
6. Overture to "Don Giovanni" ... ... Mozart.

It is true that in the menu which preceded this feast of sound we have the conventional works of the Court-cooks duly represented, and even a compliment to England in a potage de Windsor; but Germans are in earnest when music begins; and we know not which most to admire in this selection, the quality of the compositions or the fact of the nationality of the composers. When may we hope to see a programme like this at a "state banquet" in England?

AN advertisement in the Daily Chronicle or Clerkenwell News clearly shows that those who desire to raise the status of organists, about which so much has recently been said, should immediately turn their attention to Nova Scotia. Suppressing merely the address where applications are to be sent (for we do not wish to aid in giving publicity to this tempting offer) we print the announcement precisely as it appeared:—

WANTED for a Church in Nova Scotia, a YOUNG MAN to Play the Organ. He might also get employment in a shop or otherwise to increase his salary, which at the first would only be £10 per year, but if satisfactory it would likely be increased after the first year. Apply, &c.

The paltry sum proffered by way of salary is so deliberate an insult to anybody competent to fulfil the duties of organist that we can scarcely wonder at the hint that the person who accepts it "might also get employment in a shop or otherwise." There may be many individuals serving in shops which we daily visit with artistic tendencies beyond their station; but surely if any one were desirous of obtaining an organist's situation at £10 a year, he need not go so far as Nova Scotia to procure it, even with the chance of the salary being "increased after the first year."

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

M. BIZET'S Opera, "Carmen," which has already earned a high reputation in France, was produced on the 22nd ult. before an exceptionally demonstrative audience, and with a cast in every respect qualified to do full justice to the merits of the work. We have had so many weak Operas lately placed before us unsuccessfully reflecting the style of composers, many of whom have only made a name by more successfully reflecting the style of others, that it is quite refreshing to listen to music which possesses sufficient individuality to challenge criticism on its own account. We cannot say that "Carmen" grows upon us as it advances; for undoubtedly the best writing, from an artistic point of view, is in the second act; but throughout the Opera the music so appropriately colours the varied incidents with which the exciting story abounds, and the instrumentation is so rich and sympathetic—if this term may be applied to sound—that the attention can never for a moment flag. The libretto, founded by MM. Meilhac and Halévy on M. Prosper Mérimée's novel, is excellently laid out for a musical setting, and one of the great features in the work is the successful manner in which the composer has caught the spirit of the Spanish and Bohemian music, and the fidelity with which he illustrates

TO CHORAL SOCIETIES.

ORCHESTRAL PARTS.

Since the reduction in the price of music in 1849, by Mr. J. A. NOVELLO, Choral Societies have so rapidly grown up and developed that works requiring full orchestral accompaniments are now, rather as a rule than an exception, included in their public performances. Hitherto, however, the price of band parts has been so high that, instead of purchasing, it has been the custom to hire them whenever a composition demanding such aid has been given. In order to obviate the necessity of this, Messrs. NOVELLO, EWER & Co. have decided that in future all Orchestral Parts shall be marked at the uniform rate of thus enabling Institutions to form a permanent Library for the Orchestra, as well as for the Choir, at a small additional outlay.

SIXPENCE PER SHEET,

IN PAPER BOARDS.

The Works comprised in the above-mentioned series are now issued in paper boards, with cloth backs and gilt lettering, the price in each case being Sixpence above that of the edition in paper covers.

Pianoforte and Harmonium Accompaniments.

To obviate the difficulty frequently experienced by Country Choral Societies, many of which are unable to procure the assistance of an orchestra for the performance of complete works, Messrs. NOVELLO, EWER & Co. contemplate publishing an arrangement of the Orchestral Accompaniments of many popular works for Pianoforte and Harmonium.

The first of this series,

STERNDALE BENNETT'S MAY QUEEN,

arranged by J. LEMMENS, is now published, folio size, in paper covers, price 7s. 6d.

the gipsy revels and the busy lifelike scenes in the mountains and before the entrance to the bull-ring at Seville. The whole action of the story takes place in Spain. A coquettish gipsy (Carmen), in a fit of passion, stabs a fellow-workwoman, and, exerting her fascinations upon a young officer (Don José) whose duty it is to convey her to prison, he allows her to escape and follows her to the mountains. She then falls in love with a bullfighter (Escamillo); but Don José—who has been temporarily weaned from his gipsy amour by a peasant girl (Michaela), who brings to him a letter from his mother—jealous of his rival, suddenly appears upon the scene, and, during Escamillo's absence at a bullfight, in a paroxysm of rage at her refusal to fly with him, stabs Carmen to the heart. It certainly may seem strange that, having so tragic an ending, "Carmen" should be called a "Comic Opera;" but we presume that the many light and cheerful scenes which run through the work—the denouement indeed being the only really sombre incident—sufficiently justify the title; and, after all, perhaps the French "Opéra Comique" is not precisely what we understand in England as a "Comic Opera." The principal musical point of interest in the first act is a highly dramatic duet for Carmen and Don José, the themes of which, however, although well expressing the words, have not the power of arresting the attention. In the second act the whole strength of the composer is shown. It opens with a true "Chanson Bohême" for Carmen (with castanet accompaniment), the instrumentation to which is charming throughout. Escamillo's song too, although not remarkably original, has a most melodious subject, and was so finely sung by Signor Del Puente as to be enthusiastically encored. Then comes the gem of the Opera, a Quintett, "Abbiamo in vista un bel' affare," the varied and masterly writing in which seemed thoroughly appreciated by the audience, the applause almost justifying a repetition of the entire piece. The air for Carmen, throughout which she dances to an accompaniment of castanets, although received with comparative coldness, is full of dramatic effect, the trumpet call in the distance combining most skilfully with the voice and orchestra in the concluding portion. The duet between Don José and Carmen, "Voglio dansar pel tuo piacer," has many beautiful and even striking passages (the instrumentation too being full of variety of colour); and the solo for the tenor was so exquisitely given by Signor Campanini that he was compelled to repeat it. In the third act we have a well-written concerted piece, a delicate and melodious solo for Michaela (rendered so charmingly by Mdlle. Alwina Valleria as to elicit the warmest applause), and a finale, the bustle and excitement of which were most faithfully reflected in the music. There is little in the last act save the exciting and really dramatic duet between Don José and Carmen, which takes place before the entrance to the "Plaza del Toros," an excellent effect being gained by the chorus descriptive of the triumph of the bullfighter Escamillo mingling with the impassioned passages for the hero and heroine. We have incidentally mentioned the fine singing of some of the principal vocalists in this Opera; but a special mark of recognition must be given, before we close our notice, of the superb rendering of the most exacting pieces in the work by Mdlle. Minnie Hauk and Signor Campanini. In the part of Carmen, both as a singer and an actress, Mdlle. Hauk far transcended all her former efforts, giving us a true and unexaggerated representation of the light-hearted gipsy girl, remorseless and utterly careless of the wounds she inflicts upon others in the pursuit of her pleasure; and Signor Campanini has shown even his warmest admirers that, at least in this country, he has not, until his assumption of this part, developed the full extent of his exceptional powers. Too much praise cannot be awarded for the manner in which the Opera has been placed upon the stage. The scenery, costumes, and groupings are excellent throughout; and the enthusiasm of the audience—evidenced unmistakably in the course of the Opera, and at the conclusion by a triple recall of the two principal characters—appeared, unlike that of many "first nights" we could mention, both spontaneous and universal. The return of the favourite vocalists, Madame Gerster and Madame Trebelli, has been warmly welcomed by the subscribers; and the first appearance of Mdlle. Eugénie Pappenheim, as Valentina, in "Les Huguenots," may be chronicled as a real success, her voice and style being excellently suited for the passionate music assigned to Meyerbeer's heroine; but as she is announced to appear as Leonora, in "Fidelio"—too late for notice in our present number—we reserve any decisive verdict upon her claims to occupy the exalted position to which she aspires until we have heard her in a part so fully testing her powers.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

M. VICTOR MASSÉ's Opera, "Paul et Virginie," translated into Italian, was produced at this establishment on the 1st ult., and achieved a success, mainly owing to the excellent singing of Mdlle. Albani, in the part of the heroine, the picturesqueness of the scenery, and the simple interest of the story. We are by no means inclined to affirm that the music is trivial or even commonplace; but the mixture of schools with which this touching narrative is coloured would lead us to the supposition of its being written by three or four distinct composers. That M. Massé is now a French Wagner—whatever he might have been in the earlier part of his career—we should distinctly affirm, were we not constantly reminded in his new Opera of Meyerbeer, Gounod, and Verdi; and this we regret the more, because many portions of the work, where he seems to have thought for himself, prove beyond doubt that he possesses a vein of melody, a good knowledge of dramatic effect, and an admirable command of the resources of an orchestra. The "Overture" should have been termed a "Prelude," its want of coherence, and the constant changes of key, time, and character, utterly preventing our accepting it for what it professes to be. The music in the early part of the first act, although generally appropriate to the situations—especially a love duet for Paul and Virginia—has little to arrest the attention; but in the scene which follows—the plantation of M. De Sainte-Croix—we have some highly dramatic writing, a song in G minor for the runaway slave Méala (full of wild character), a song (also in a minor key) for a negro boy, the music of the "Bamboula" (a dance of the slaves), and many portions of the finale to the act, being thoroughly deserving of the enthusiastic applause which they received. The gem of the second act is a long and elaborate duet for the hero and heroine, which, despite many reminiscences, may be pronounced a remarkable piece of writing, the latter portion, in which the two sing a strongly marked phrase in octaves, although exciting the audience to the most powerful demonstrations of approbation, being by no means the best part of the composition. As one of the grand successes of the evening—more, however, owing to the singer than the composer—we must also mention the air for Virginia, the slow portion of which was given with exquisite expression by Mdlle. Albani, and the concluding phrases, consisting of the most brilliant roulades and a prolonged shake, with a finished execution which elicited the loudest applause. In the third act a song for the slave Méala created a marked impression; and, chiefly owing to the excellent declamation of M. Capoul, in the part of the hero, a great portion of the somewhat tedious soliloquy in which Paul sees Virginia in a vision (which is represented at the back) was also received with much favour. We have only incidentally dwelt upon some of the more salient portions of the Opera; but, although containing a variety of styles, there is sufficient life in the music throughout to prevent any sense of weariness with the listeners. An apology on the score of indisposition was circulated in the house for M. Maurel (who played the mulatto slave Domingo) on the first evening, and much of his music was consequently cut out; but on the repetition of the Opera, his solos, especially one of much dramatic importance in the first act, were received with the warmest applause. The delicate and refined acting of Mdlle. Albani, as well as her perfect vocalisation, would have produced less effect upon the audience had she not been so ably supported by M. Capoul, who in the part of Paul has very materially advanced his reputation. Madame Schalchi too, as Méala, gave the whole of her somewhat difficult music with a thorough appreciation of the author's meaning; and Signor Carbone sang at least with characteristic power the solos of the planter, Sainte-Croix.

The few choruses in the Opera were well sung; and the magnificence with which the work is placed upon the stage gave, as we have already said, an importance to it which can scarcely be claimed for its purely musical worth.

The principal début during the month has been that of Mdlle Cepeda, who in the arduous part of the heroine in "Lucrezia Borgia," gave us the impression that she was a good, but scarcely a great singer. It is true that she had to contend against reminiscences which could not but militate against her success; but the fact of her choosing this character showed that she challenged the public verdict fearlessly, and she has nobody therefore but herself to blame for the result. As Valentina in "Les Huguenots," however, she has fully shown us that she is a singer of the highest rank—especially in the great Duet with Raoul—and we only regret that she did not make her début in a part so admirably suited for her. About the first appearance of Mdlle. Mantilla nothing need be said, as, after creating a very fair effect upon the audience as the Indian Queen in "L'Africaine" and Amelia in "Un Ballo in Maschera,' her name was withdrawn from the bills. Meyerbeer's "Prophète," with Madame Schalchi as Fides, has been a great success, and "Semiramide," with Madame Patti as the heroine, is announced. "Alma," an Italian version of Flotow's "L'Incantatrice," is also promised; but the season will only last until about the middle of the present month.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

THE instrumental soloists at the seventh Concert, on the 12th ult., were Mr. Alfred Jaell (pianoforte) and M. Wieniawski (violin), the former giving a skilful rendering of Beethoven's Concerto in E flat, and the latter performing a Concerto of his own composition abounding in difficulties, which were surmounted with an ease which elicited the warmest applause. In a musical point of view the "Romance" is the best of the three movements; but the "Finale" is effectively written both for the principal instrument and the orchestra. Miss Emma C. Thursby, who created so favourable an impression at the last concert, again proved her claim to rank amongst the foremost of our vocalists, her singing of Mozart's Scena and Aria, "Ma, che vi fece, o stelle," and "Sperai vicino il lido," being remarkable, not only for certainty of execution, but for a truthful expression which augurs well for her future career. The orchestral works were Mr. Cusins's clever Overture, "Les Travailleurs de la Mer," Haydn's Symphony in D (No. 7 of the Saloman set), and Mendelssohn's Music to the "Midsummer Night's Dream," the effect of which was of course lessened by the omission of the vocal portion. Mr. W. G. Cusins conducted, as usual.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

THE orchestral concert of the students of this institution given at St. James's Hall on the 19th ult., included four compositions of decided interest, by the pupils—a Concert Overture in F minor, by Henry Löhr, containing much clear and well-defined writing; a Psalm for soprano solo and chorus, by A. G. Thomas, a remarkable specimen of the result of a sound and healthy system of training in the highest school of sacred art, reflecting the utmost credit both upon the young composer and his instructor; the last two movements of a Symphony in D minor, by Miss Oliveria Prescott, which show that this earnest and energetic student is rapidly adding to the reputation she has already acquired at the public performances of the Academy; and the first movement of a Symphony in C by Tobias Matthay, the reception of which was as warm as well merited. Special praise must be awarded to Miss Nancy Evans for her excellent and artistic performance of the first movement of Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in G; the other pianists—Miss Margaret Bucknall, in Weber's Concertstück, and Miss Shapley, in Mendelssohn's Rondo Brillante in B minor—also evincing much talent. Amongst the vocalists Miss Marian Williams distinguished herself by her careful and sympathetic singing of the solo portion of Mr. Thomas's Psalm, Mrs. Irene Ware gave a sacred song by Randegger with good expression, and the finale to the first act of "Don Giovanni" was well rendered by Misses Ada Patterson, Hallowell, and Clara Samuell; Messrs. Seligman, Hutchinson, Brereton, and Jarratt. Mr. Walter Macfarren was, as usual, a highly efficient Conductor.

MR. OLIVER KING'S CONCERT.

ENGLISH musical people, sharing with their countrymen generally the national tendency to grumble, often complain of a dearth of talent. They say that among the rising generation they vainly look for any indication of special ability, and, when forecasting the future, they prophesy the continued reign of that which is dull and mediocre. It is to be desired that such persons would, while so far indulging a constitutional humour, be quick to see and ready to help the young artists who really do from time to time make their appearance, too many of them in search of support and encouragement never to be gained. It is wonderful what good may be done in these cases by a kind word or a practical display of sympathy. The artistic temperament is naturally sensitive, or it would not be artistic; and in many cases, no doubt, coldness and indifference on the part of those who are able to render substantial aid to struggling talent causes a sense of depression and hopelessness, the effect of which lasts through life. The first struggle of an artist to appear before the public is a crisis, and a "lift" then becomes of inestimable value. He may turn out to be worth little, but no harm is done, because he will inevitably find his proper level. But he may prove to be worth much, and in that case the value of early help cannot be exaggerated. These remarks are suggested by the début—for such it was—of a young composer and pianist, Mr. Oliver King, at a concert given by himself in the Steinway Hall, on the 5th ult. We are glad to be able to add that Mr. King did not appeal without result for necessary encouragement. The concert was well attended; whatever deserved applause in the performance of the works produced, or in the works themselves, received it, and the bénéficiaire must have felt stimulated to increased exertions, in order that the hopes obviously excited by past efforts may not end in disappointment. Mr. King appeared in the double capacity already indicated, and, both as pianist and composer gave his supporters an opportunity of estimating alike his progress and his prospects. He played, for example, Bach's Prelude and Fugue in C sharp major, Chopin's Ballade in A flat, Grieg's "Humoresken," and the "Waldesrauchen' of Liszt—a sufficiently comprehensive and varied choice for the purpose in view. His performance was in all respects satisfactory, and met with the general approval of critical hearers, not only on account of the executive skill shown, but because of the high intelligence and artistic feeling which guided the young musician. The precise rank to be ultimately held among pianists by Mr. King it would, perhaps, be premature to forecast, but a result satisfactory to reasonable ambition lies in his own hands, and from all that we can judge, he is not likely to let it slip. Mr. King was warmly applauded after each piece, but the most earnest congratulations were properly reserved for a performance of some works from his own pen, viz., three "Miniatures," respectively entitled Berceuse, Meditation, and Barcarole, together with a "Poëme Symphonique," illustrative of "Tam O Shanter." These pieces should, of course, be judged as what they are—the productions of youth; and, so looked at, any evidence of that in music which is equivalent to Radicalism in politics, excites no surprise and has little significance. Youth is always disposed to be revolutionary, and only experience of life brings caution and sobriety of view. What really challenges special notice in Mr. King's productions is the excellence of their workmanship, the brightness of their fancy, and their truth of expression. They show clearly enough that the young man is not a mere parrot, imitative of what has been dinned into his ears, but that he has really something of his own to tell us, combined with the requisite ability of expression. This is all we need insist upon at the outset of a career, and where it is shown we may extend encouragement with a confident expectation of adequate return. The "Poëme Symphonique" was particularly well received by Mr. King's audience, for reasons not unconnected with the subject, but the "Miniatures" commended themselves to good judges as equally indicative of most promising gifts. The bénéficiaire was ably assisted by Herr Kummer, as solo violinist, and by Madame Antoinette Sterling and Miss Mulholland as vocalists. Herr Kummer played admirably and did credit to his great master, Joachim; Madame Sterling made a "hit" with a charming song by Mr. King, "Oh, mother dear, good night;" and Miss Mulholland, thanks to an agreeable voice and sympathetic style, won general approbation in Coenen's musicianly song, "Lovely Spring." Mr. Randegger conducted with his usual ability.

MADAME VIARD-LOUIS'S CONCERT.

THE fourth of this series of Concerts was given at St. James's Hall on the afternoon of May 28, the orchestral pieces being, as usual, the most attractive portions of the programme. The selection, although including excellent compositions in themselves, was scarcely so satisfactory as that at the preceding Concerts; for Beethoven's "Choral Symphony," with the choral portion omitted, is somewhat disappointing to really musical listeners; and, save for its abstract beauty, the Serenade from Spohr's Symphony, "The Power of Sound" (a mere fragment from a great work), can hardly be welcomed in a concert of such classical pretensions. Madame Viard-Louis's pianoforte performances were ambitious in their intention, consisting of Weber's "Concertstück" and Mendelssohn's Capriccio in E major; but as we know not whether she seeks impartial criticism, we prefer rather to record than to comment upon her share in the programme. Max Bruch's Violin Concerto (Op. 26) was well played by Herr Kummer, a Romance for Horn was effectively rendered by M. Stennebruggen, and a deservedly favourable reception was accorded to a clever Gavotte for strings by the Conductor of the Concert, Mr. Weist Hill. The vocalists were Mdlle. Christiani and Signor Foli.

DR. HANS VON BÜLOW'S RECITALS.

THE two Recitals given at St. James's Hall during the past month by this eminent pianist have been amongst the principal attractions of the season; for even those who, like ourselves, take exception to his readings of many of the classical works, cannot but admit his possession of the most marvellous artistic powers. Amongst the best of his performances may be mentioned the selections from Bach, more especially Liszt's transcription of the Organ Prelude and Fugue in B minor, all of which were played with a clearness and intelligence which sufficiently proved his reverence for the works of this great master; and that he can shake off his eccentricities of style at will may be evidenced by his calm and unpretentious rendering of Schubert's melodious Impromptu in G (No. 3, Op. 90). His conception of the works of Beethoven is remarkable for originality; and his performance of this composer's Sonatas is perhaps therefore a more decisive exhibition of what his devout admirers term "individuality" than was displayed in any other of the many pieces he selected for his programme. The Sonata in C minor (Op. 3), at his second Recital, may be cited as a prominent illustration of the truth of our remarks; but we are bound to record that the overwhelming applause with which it was greeted will tend rather to confirm than to lessen that confidence in himself which we believe to be a necessity with an artist who, like Dr. Von Bülow, continues to reproduce from memory at any moment before a public audience such a multiplicity of works in such an infinite variety of styles.

THE MARIO BENEFIT CONCERT.

IT might be expected that, whatever the cause, the news that Signor Mario—one of the most deservedly popular of our operatic tenors—was in want would be sufficient to secure the services of a large number of eminent artists in his behalf, and that the Concert given on May 29 at St. James's Hall. for the purpose of raising a fund for his benefit, would be largely attended. We are glad to record that both these anticipations were fully realised; for Madame Nilsson, Madame Trebelli, Mdlle. Clervaux, Miss Annie Butterworth, Signor Foli, Mr. Santley, and the London Vocal Union gave their valuable talents in aid of the cause; Mr. Sims Reeves, who was unfortunately prevented by indisposition from attending, generously sent a cheque for 100 guineas, and the hall was crowded in every part by a thoroughly sympathetic audience. The programme was admirably chosen; and it is almost needless to say that Madame Nilsson, who made her only public appearance in London on the occasion, was received with a cordiality which must have convinced her how thoroughly her good feeling towards this artistic testimonial was appreciated. Sir Julius Benedict, Mr. Sidney Naylor, and Signor Pinsuti were the accompanists. We understand that the gross receipts of the Concert amounted to £1,150, exclusive of the sum contributed by Mr. Sims Reeves.

MILITARY SERVICE AT ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL.

FOLLOWING somewhat closely upon the Festival of the Sons of the Clergy, in St. Paul's Cathedral, came a service of a peculiarly interesting, and, we believe we may add, unique character. Four military bands, namely, those of the Royal Artillery, the Royal Engineers, the Coldstream Guards, and the Grenadier Guards, took part in a Festival Service in aid of the Royal School for Daughters of Officers of the Army, on the afternoon of Tuesday the 28th of May.

Some time before 3.30, the hour appointed for the commencement of the service, the Cathedral was crowded to overflowing, the congregation extending from the very steps of the altar to the arch of the western door, and filling the transepts and galleries. The clergy seated, the slow movement from Mendelssohn's C minor Symphony, and a Larghetto movement, "O Lord my God," by Lefébure-Wely, were played by the bands, under the conductorship of Messrs. Smythe and Dan Godfrey, as opening voluntaries. Had doubt existed, as it may possibly have done in some minds, especially among those acquainted with the peculiar acoustic properties of St. Paul's, as to the success of the introduction of military bands into the sacred edifice, the idea being beyond question a bold one, such doubt must have been speedily set at rest by the first voluntary; the enormous volume of sound being only equalled in its breadth and equality by the purity of tone of each class of instruments.

It was, however, in the Service proper (i.e. the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis) that the greater amount of interest centred, they having been composed specially for the occasion, and, as regards their scoring, being an absolute novelty in cathedral music. Mr. George C. Martin, the sub-organist of the cathedral, who had been invited to write a setting of the Canticles, performed his task in a manner worthy both of himself and of the Festival for which he was writing, as might have been expected, for his name is a sufficient guarantee for the conscientious discharge of any duties which he undertakes. We have spoken from time to time, in these columns, of works from his pen, and only regret that in the present instance space does not avail to speak critically of the whole of the service. The effect was exceedingly good, and must have been gratifying to the composer; for ourselves, we hope that it may not be long before we have an opportunity of hearing the composition again, under similar circumstances.

The Anthem, which, like the Service, was conducted by Dr. Stainer, consisted of the two final numbers of Sullivan's "Te Deum," written for the Festival held at the Crystal Palace in 1872, in celebration of the recovery of the Prince of Wales. The sermon, an appeal by Bishop Claughton for the funds of the Charity, was followed by the War March from "Athalie," played during the collection of the offertory, and after this, immediately before the conclusion of the service, came the "Hallelujah Chorus," unavoidably transposed, by the way, into E flat, a change not particularly grateful, we should imagine, to the vocalists, more especially the soprano.

It is to be hoped that the result of the Festival may have been as successful from a financial as it undoubtedly was from an artistic point of view; for the Charity is a good one, and well deserves support for its own sake. Now also it has a double claim upon the lovers of cathedral music, as it has shown not only with what solemn effect may be employed a combination of instruments hitherto unheard of in connection with divine service, and how greatly they enhance the grandeur which can never fail to attach to a solemn choral festival in a vast building before a crowded congregation; but also will, we believe, have served to point out to composers of military and other music how great a field entirely untouched lies open to them, and thereby give an impetus to a neglected branch of their art. Hitherto the composers and arrangers of military band music have, no doubt owing to a lack of opportunity or demand in the opposite direction, given their attention almost exclusively, and that with great success, to the secular division of the art, and the popular idea associated with military music is beyond doubt a secular one. The highest lesson, therefore, that such a festival as the present can teach is, that talents are never better used than when employed in the praise of Him whose gift they are and who alone can bestow them, and whose Own all Art itself is, and to whom all that is good and pure in Art of right belongs.

 A press of matter compels us to postpone the continuation of "The Great Composers" until our next number.

THE arrangements for the Worcester Musical Festival, which will commence on the 10th September, and continue on the three following days, are now completed. At the Cathedral on the first morning there will be a Grand Choral Service; Dettingen Te Deum (Handel); Jubilate in D (Purcell); Cantata, "Blessing and Glory" (Bach); and in the evening, "The Creation" Part 1 (Haydn); "Requiem Mass" (Mozart); "Hymn of Praise" (Mendelssohn). On the second morning "Elijah" will be given; on the third Dr. Armes's Oratorio "Hezekiah," "Hear my Prayer" (Mendelssohn), and "The Last Judgment" (Spohr); on the fourth "The Messiah;" and on the same evening there will be a Choral Service in the Cathedral, consisting of "Magnificat" and "Nunc dimittis" (Sir F. Ouseley), and an Anthem composed expressly for the Festival by Dr. Stainer. On the opening morning a sermon will be preached by the Lord Bishop of the diocese. The miscellaneous concerts in the Shire Hall will take place on the evenings of the second and third days of the Festival. The principal vocalists are Mdlle. Albani, Miss Anna Williams, Miss Mary Davies, Madame Patey, Miss Bertha Griffiths, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr Guy, Mr. Wadmore, and Signor Foli. Mr. C. H. Lloyd will preside at the organ during the performances in the Cathedral, and Mr. Colborne, Mus. Bac., at the early morning services. The solo instrumentalists are—violin, M. Sainton; pianoforte, Miss Done, and Mr. Done will conduct. Every well-wisher to the Three Choir Festivals will, we are certain, be glad to hear that the long-pending dispute on the method of conducting these meetings has had so satisfactory a termination.

THE Grosvenor Choral Society gave an excellent performance of Mendelssohn's "Athalie" at the seventy-sixth monthly Concert on the 21st ult., at the Grosvenor Hall, with a full band and chorus, consisting of 130 performers. The soloists were Miss Louie Wood, R.A.M., Miss M. Turner, L.A.M., and Miss Lizzie Turner, the latter being very successful in her rendering of the contralto music. The band gave great satisfaction, especially in the Overture and the "War March of the Priests." The Rev. Canon Fleming, B.D., the President of the Society, read the lyrics. In the second part of the programme a new Cantata, "Hallowe'en," by J. G. Callcott, words by Julia Goddard, was performed for the first time. The work, which was very favourably received, consists of five numbers: No. 1, "The Fading Year," Chorus with tenor and bass Soli; No. 2, "Burning the Nuts," Chorus for ladies; No. 3, "Lesbia," contralto Solo and Chorus; No. 4 (encored), "The Mirror," Scena for soprano; No. 5, Recitative for tenor, unaccompanied Quartett (encored), and Chorus. The soloists—Miss Josephine Pulham, Miss Lizzie Turner, Mr. A. Lawrence Fryer, and Mr. Henry Baker—gave the music allotted to them in an effective manner. Mr. J. G. Callcott conducted throughout, and received the congratulations of a very crowded audience. Miss Trust presided at the harp.

WE regret very much to hear that Mr. John Parry, through circumstances entirely beyond his control, has been reduced almost to poverty. An old friend, a solicitor, to whom he intrusted the whole of his savings, has recently died; and although interest for the money has been duly received by Mr. Parry for many years, the principal, it appears, has never been invested as he had been led to suppose it had; so that it is feared that at the final settlement of the deceased's estate scarcely a fraction of the debt can possibly be paid. A fund is now being raised on behalf of Mr. Parry, which we sincerely hope may substantially prove the public appreciation of the services of so gifted and accomplished an artist. The following gentlemen have kindly offered to receive subscriptions: The Rev. Canon Burney, St. Mark's Vicarage, Surbiton; W. P. Frith, Esq., R.A., 7, Pembridge Villas, Bayswater; George H. Milford, Esq., Hillside, Surbiton; John B. Monckton, Esq., Town Clerk of London, 44, Wimpole Street, W.; Henry Shrubsole, Esq., Mayor of Kingston-on-Thames; Liston Young, Esq., South Bank, Surbiton; Thomas Chappell, Esq., 50, New Bond Street, W.; and T. German Reed, Esq., Oakfield, Balham.

A GRAND Opera Concert, at which the principal artists of Her Majesty's Opera appeared, was given on the 26th ult., in the Dome, Brighton, under the direction of Mr. George Watts. The performers were Mdlles. Minnie Hauk, Hélène Crosmond, Valleria, and Tremelli; Signori Campanini, Bettini, and Del Puente, M. Thierry and Herr Behrens; solo violin, M. Victor Buziau; solo pianoforte, Mr. Willem Coenen; conductor, Signor Bisaccia. The programme contained over twenty items selected from the works of the popular composers, and included many of the gems from favourite Operas, all of which were rendered with that artistic finish and excellence which was to be expected from performers of such eminence in the musical profession. We believe that this is the first occasion upon which a Brighton audience has had an opportunity of hearing so large and talented a company of operatic vocalists, and Mr. Watts is to be congratulated upon the success which has been achieved.

ASCENSION DAY was observed at Westminster Abbey with a special service in aid of the Clergy Orphan Schools. A band and chorus of 180, under the direction of Dr. Bridge (Dr. Stainer being at the organ), performed a selection from Mendelssohn's "Elijah," the latter portion of which Oratorio is particularly suitable to the services on Ascension Day. The Solos were given by the boys and vicars-choral of Westminster Abbey, Messrs. Hilton and Bell taking the bass, and Messrs. Carter and Kearton (the latter a most valuable and recent addition to the Abbey Choir) the tenor Solos. The rendering of "Lift thine eyes," and the Solos by the boys, were exceedingly good. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis was the setting in G, with orchestral accompaniments, by Dr. Bridge, performed at the Caxton Celebration last year. There was a crowded congregation, including the Princess of Wales, and a large collection was made in aid of the Charity.

ON Tuesday evening, May 28, a Concert was given by the City, Hoxton and Stepney divisions of the London Vocal Union, in the Town Hall, Shoreditch, when about 250 of the members were located in the new orchestra. Mr. George Wells conducted. The Concert commenced with the "Macbeth" music, which was given with spirit and precision, a portion of it being encored. A selection from Wells's Cantata, "Peace and War," followed. The Solo "'Tis sweet to stroll at early eve" was tastefully rendered by Miss Lillian Barrett and encored; the same compliment being paid to Miss Marian Burke for the contralto Solo "When will battles cease?" which she sang with great feeling. Mr. Robinson was also well received. The second part was miscellaneous. The Part-songs and Choruses were given with great care.

A SUCCESSFUL Concert was given at Hawkstone Hall (adjoining Christ Church), Westminster Road, on Tuesday, May 28, under the direction of Mr. Frederick G. Edwards, organist and director of the choir of the church. The artists were Madame Florence Lancia, Miss Mary Davies, and Mr. George Whillier, vocalists; Mdlle. Gabrielle Vaillant, violin, and Mr. Edwards and his pupil, Master Hogarth, pianoforte. The Christ Church Choir numbering nearly sixty voices, sang several Choruses and Part-songs in a highly creditable manner. One of the chief features of the Concert was a new setting of the Twenty-Third Psalm, for female voices, with pianoforte accompaniment, composed by Mr. Edwards. Mr. F. Beckley, assistant organist, was an efficient accompanist.

MDLLE. IDA HENRY gave her Annual Concert at the Royal Academy of Music, on the 3rd ult., when an excellent programme was provided, among the most attractive items in which were the pianoforte performances of the bénéficiaire, who, especially in Mendelssohn's Caprice in B flat minor (No. 3, Op. 33), and a Prelude and Toccata by Lachner, elicited warm and well-deserved applause. Mdlle. Henry also took the pianoforte part, with equal success, in several concerted pieces, in which she was ably assisted by MM. Straus, Heimendahl, Zerbini, and Daubert. The vocalists were Madame Sophie Löwe and Mdlle. Gaetano; and the accompanists Mr. Zerbini and Herr Frantzen.

THE St. George's Glee Union gave its 113th monthly Concert at the Pimlico Rooms on Friday the 7th ult., the programme being of a miscellaneous character. The soloists were Miss Kate Hardy, Madame Marie Belval, and Mr. Thomas, all of whom were highly successful. Mr. F. R. Kinkee played Chopin's "Mazurka" (Op. 30), and "La Cascade" (Pauer) in a masterly manner, and also accompanied with judgment. Among the Part-songs, Mendelssohn's "Vintage Song," for male voices, "Silent Night" (Barnby), and Mr. G. W. Martin's prize Glee, "The merry month of June," were exceedingly well given. Messrs. Garside and Joseph Monday conducted.

THE stimulus given to the musical department of Aske's School for Girls, at Hatcham, since the earnest and eloquent speech of Professor Macfarren at the award of scholarships in the Institution, has already produced good results. At an afternoon performance by the pupils of the music-classes on the 31st of May, under the Head Music Mistress, Miss Macirone, a very large amount of talent was exhibited, both in the instrumental and vocal department; and the applause from a numerous and highly appreciative audience must have been most gratifying to the young students, as well as to the many excellent teachers who have so zealously laboured in the cause.

THE South Norwood Musical Society concluded its season on the 3rd ult. with a performance of an Oratorio entitled "Jesus," composed by its Conductor, Dr. W. J. Westbrook, as an exercise for his degree, and previously sung in the Chapel of Queen's College, Cambridge, only. The work is short, having but sixteen movements, and abounds in flowing melody. The Solos, for bass and soprano, were sung by Mr. Alfred Caink and Miss Jessie Royd; members of the Society singing an Octet and a Trio for ladies' voices. The performance was generally excellent, and the composer received a most enthusiastic greeting at its close.

AN Evening Concert was given in St. James's Hall on May 30th, by Mr. Faulkner Leigh, to a crowded audience—the artists engaged being Mesdames Annie Sinclair, Mary Davies, Annie Butterworth, and Madame Patey; Messrs. Faulkner Leigh, Maybrick, Walter Bolton, and Thurley Beale; solo violin, Madame Varley-Liebe. The Conductors were Sir Julius Benedict, Signori Mazzoni and Visetti, and Mr. W. Ganz.

MR. EDWARD PLATER gave an excellent Concert at St. George's Hall on the 24th ult., the principal vocalists being Mdlle. Minnie Hauk and Madame Trebelli; and the instrumentalists, Mr. Henry Bird (pianoforte), Mr. Lazarus (clarinet), and Mr. Albert (violoncello). A feature in the concert was the singing of several Glees, Madrigals, and Part-songs, by Mr. Edward Plater's "Glee Union," all of which elicited warm and well-deserved applause.

A MORNING Concert was given by Madame Sainton-Dolby on the 24th ult., at Steinway Hall, when Costa's Oratorio "Naaman" was performed. The soprano and contralto Solos were sung by the ladies of Madame Sainton's Vocal Academy, the tenor and bass parts being intrusted to Mr. Faulkner Leigh and Mr. Edward Wharton. M. Sainton conducted, and Messrs. Thouless and Lindsay Sloper presided at the pianoforte. The hall was crowded.

THE Norwich Musical Festival will, as we announced in our April number, commence on Tuesday, October 15, the Monday evening concert being suppressed. Lord Suffield proposes to invite the Prince and Princess of Wales to pass the festival week at his seat at Gunton; and, should this invitation be accepted, it is expected that both the Prince and Princess will be present at the performances.

AN Evening Concert, in aid of the funds of the local Rifle Corps, was given in the Drill Hall, Crouch End, on Wednesday, the 19th ult. The artists engaged were Miss Hardy (soprano) and Mr. Faulkner Leigh (tenor); solo violin, Mr. Jacoby, of the Royal Italian Opera. The hall was very crowded.

REVIEWS.

The Life of Mozart; including his Correspondence. By Edward Holmes. A new edition, with notes, by Ebenezer Prout. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

MR. HOLMES, in his preface to the original edition of this book, written in 1845, says, "The only biographical notice of Mozart in English is a translation from the French of Bombet (M. Beyle), itself a translation from the German of Schlictegroll." Since that time many circumstances have come to light respecting the composer, the two most reliable authorities being Otto Jahn's "Mozart," the second and revised edition of which was published at Leipsic in 1867, and Von Köchel's "Thematic Catalogue," issued in 1862. These works, however, have added to, but by no means superseded, Holmes's "Life," which has so thoroughly taken its place amongst the standard biographies of our great composers, that even those thoroughly acquainted with the more recent books already mentioned, have been constantly inquiring when a new edition of our countryman's earnest and carefully compiled work was to be published. Mr. Ebenezer Prout, who has undertaken the editorship of the book, has materially increased its value by supplying any information derived from Jahn in foot-notes, which are kept distinct throughout from those of Mr. Holmes. The text of the author has been reverently left untouched; and it is no slight testimonial to the worth of the work to assert—as the editor does in his preface—that the volume has been carefully collated with Jahn's book "with a result which reflects the highest credit on Mr. Holmes's accuracy." As so much more of the history of the "Requiem" is now known than was the case when Mr. Holmes wrote, a summary of the conclusions arrived at by the principal authorities on the subject has been given in the Appendix; and a Catalogue of the complete works of the composer, compiled from Köchel, has also been added. No more need be said to draw the attention of the musical student to this valuable publication. Had the book been merely reprinted, we are convinced that every lover of Mozart's works would have possessed himself of so faithful a record of the composer's career; but the judicious editing of Mr. Prout has invested it with an interest which cannot fail to materially increase its popularity.

Third Mass in A. (Coronation Mass.) Composed for the Coronation of King Charles X. By L. Cherubini. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

WHEN Charles X. became King of France in 1825, Lesueur and Cherubini, by virtue of the office they held as Court musicians, had to compose the music for the coronation ceremony; and this Mass, though performed on the occasion, and regarded by artists as a model of devotional feeling and purity of style, affords one of the many instances of the neglect with which music written for a special purpose is too often treated. Many years ago the firm which now issues this composition precisely as Cherubini wrote it—for three voices—published it with a fourth part added by Haydn Corri; and although undoubtedly in performance this conventional form came more gratefully upon the ear of a conventional audience, as the time has now arrived when the composer's original intention is considered paramount, this octavo edition of the work will, we hope, draw attention to its many beauties and insure its general acceptance. It would be impossible in this brief notice to dwell upon the points of interest in this Mass; the varied and appropriate setting of the "Credo," with the deeply pathetic "Crucifixus," the truly devotional

"Sanctus," and the "O Salutaris" (which we should recommend to be sung as a trio, rather than a chorus), will sufficiently speak for themselves to the hearts of the listeners. All we can do is earnestly to commend the composition to the notice of those who have the direction of choirs; and to express a hope that we may shortly hear it in public, with the accompaniment of an orchestra competent to do justice to the charming instrumental colouring which throws such a rich glow over one of the finest of Cherubini's sacred works.

Moses in Egypt. An Oratorio. The English version by Arthur Matthison. The music composed by G. A. Rossini. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS edition of Rossini's work is published, not as the composer wrote it, but as arranged for performance by the Sacred Harmonic Society, and therefore, of course, with many cuts, and with some alterations which, for representation in the Oratorio form, appear to us extremely judicious. There can be no question that the composition (whether sacred or not) has made its mark as abstract music; and its repetition next season will be anxiously looked forward to. In our notice of the performance of the Oratorio we incidentally mentioned the excellence of the English version, and a closer acquaintance with it has proved the justice of our remarks. The task was an extremely difficult one; and throughout the work Mr. Matthison has shown not only that he is a skilful translator, but a sympathetic artist.

Lyrical Illustrations of Modern English Poets. A Collection of Songs, for Soprano, Contralto, Tenor, and Bass Voices. Composed by John Barnett.
[Hutchings and Romer.]

REMEMBERING that when John Francis Barnett first became known as a composer he was mentioned as the "nephew of John Barnett," and that now we hear John Barnett called "the uncle of John Francis Barnett" it seems necessary to remind the present generation of the status in the profession held by the elder artist at a time when English music was but struggling to assert its real power in this country. The republication of these beautiful illustrations of the British poets, therefore, is well timed, for it will prove that, in an age of musical decadence, an English musician had the courage to issue a collection of vocal pieces appealing exclusively to artists and highly educated amateurs; and that, presuming National Opera to be not altogether a myth, we have still living amongst us a composer who is ready, and we hope willing, to continue a career so successfully inaugurated by "The Mountain Sylph," "Fair Rosamond," and "Farinelli." At least, we know of one Opera by this writer, "Kathleen," which has never yet been heard, but which we have every reason to believe is perfectly ready for the stage. In the advertisement to the first edition of the songs before us, Mr. Barnett says that he did not at first publish them, although urgently persuaded to do so by his friends, "because the work abounded in mechanical difficulties;" but since this time the art has so advanced that this objection can, we think, no longer apply. True it is that in every piece the instrument is as important as the voice; but the pianoforte part, although demanding both skill and care, lies well under the hands throughout; and amateurs will, we are certain, feel a pride in overcoming difficulties in so good a cause. The tenor song, "Queen Mab," was scored by the composer for Braham to sing at a Philharmonic Concert (Mr. Barnett tells us, in his "Fore-words"); but although forwarded to the Directors, with a recommendation from the great tenor, "it was returned almost immediately, unopened." This was of course disappointing to a young artist endeavouring to make his way; but we regret that it should have made him lock up other compositions which were intended to form a second volume, for he had already received the highest encouragement from musicians quite as competent to judge of his works as the Directors of the Philharmonic, and he had only to await his time for due recognition. Amongst the songs contained in this volume we must especially award praise to the following, not only for their abstract musical value, but for their sympathy with the words they illustrate; the Canzonet for tenor or soprano, "I arise from dreams of thee" (which, however, we should certainly recommend only for a tenor), the short Canzonet for tenor, "My faint spirit," the Scena for tenor, "Darkness" (a fine composition), the Canzonet for tenor or soprano, "That song again," and the Scena for mezzo-soprano, "The Cloud." All the pieces are, however, the work of a poetical and sympathetic artist; and we earnestly recommend them to the attention of those who do not too deeply sympathise with "Royalty" songs. We accept this volume with additional pleasure because we hope it may be regarded as an earnest that Mr. Barnett is again about to step forth into the world of art, from which he can now but ill be spared.

The Canticles and Psalter, Festival and Ferial. Pointed and adapted to the Gregorian Tones by James B. Gray, B.D., Rector of Crick, Northamptonshire.

The Psalms, Canticles, and the Athanasian Creed. Pointed for chanting by Rev. L. S. Tuckwell, M.A., and J. Stainer, M.A., Mus. Doc.
[Oxford: W. R. Bowden, 59, High Street.]

JUDGING from the number of carefully arranged Psalters which are now available, the Psalm-singing in our churches should be in a fair way to become well-nigh perfect. The two Psalters under notice are very excellent and commendable, though they differ widely in character. Each gives lucid rules for chanting in the preface, which should leave no doubt in the minds of the choristers as to the intentions of the editors. In the former, the Tones are given at the head of each Psalm, being printed in modern notation. This, we think, is a step in the right direction. Nothing whatever is gained by adhering to the old stave and what may be termed black-letter notes. Certainly, to many, the old staves and clefs, &c., are a source of very great perplexity; while the form in which the above tones are printed is understood by all musicians. The general appearance of the pointing is much the same as those of the modern Anglican school; the emphasised words are printed in large capitals, while that part of the verse which is sung to the termination of the chant is clearly divided in the printing.

Of the Magdalen Psalter little need be said, as it does not lay claim to many special characteristics. It has long enjoyed popularity, and is used in many churches where the musical part of the service is carefully rendered. The names of the editors will be sufficient guarantee for the good taste of the accentuation, &c.

Te Deum in E flat. By Henry Gadsby. (No. 36 of the Parish Choir Book.) [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS short and simple setting of the "Te Deum" is evidently designed for choirs of comparatively limited ability. From the first bar to the last there is no polyphonic writing; the voices move together, either in unison or in full harmony, throughout. The music, though very simple, is both interesting and effective; the close being especially good. Mr. Gadsby shows in this "Te Deum" that it is possible for a skilful musician to write what is perfectly easy to sing, without at the same time writing rubbish.

Jerusalem. Solo from "Gallia." Composed by Ch. Gounod. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

M. GOUNOD'S masterly work—written for the opening of the International Exhibition of 1871, and performed at the Royal Albert Hall on that occasion—has been so rarely heard since then in this country that we cordially welcome this highly dramatic song, now published for the first time apart from the Cantata, not only on account of its intrinsic merit, but because it may be the means of directing attention to the composition of which it forms one of the most prominent features. Those who were present when "Gallia" was produced must well recollect the extraordinary effect of the sudden change from minor to major upon the word "Jerusalem" in this solo; the triplet accompaniment of stringed instruments lending an additional charm to the pathetic appeal for his country which seemed to come direct from the heart of the composer. In its present form there can be little doubt that soprano singers will gladly avail themselves of so thoroughly representative a piece; for in the pianoforte accompaniment the effects of the score are as far as possible retained. The wailing movement in A minor, with which it opens, acquires additional pathos from the accompanying staccato chords; and the impassioned triplets to which we have already alluded are so well distributed between the hands as to convey a very good idea of the fulness of the original instrumentation. Both in public and in private this solo has now a fair chance of attaining the popularity it deserves.

A Guide to the Local Examinations in Elementary Musical Knowledge of Trinity College, London. By Frederic Clarke. [W. Reeves.]

THE author of this useful little treatise is an honorary life member of the College, and honorary local Secretary for the Gloucester District; and being well acquainted, therefore, with the manner in which the examinations at the College are conducted, every reliance may be placed upon the soundness of his advice. We are glad to find that, although he recommends certain works for study, the necessity of engaging a competent master is positively insisted upon, especially for those who intend to be senior candidates. His remarks upon the method of working are invaluable. "Think and reason," he says: "try to account for everything you learn. If you are not clear on any particular point, do not leave it until you are master of it. In this way, even if you seem to progress slowly, you are learning to be thorough; otherwise you will be inaccurate, and a few skilfully put questions may speedily reveal how superficial your knowledge is." In the observations addressed to "juniors" he clearly points out the kind of questions that will be asked, and counsels the pupils not to be taken by surprise. So good are his rules for impressing musical notation upon the mind that, as he says, "no artificial aid occurs to us with reference to the crotchet and quaver rests," we willingly present him with the following method: commence writing the letter Q for the quaver rest, and the letter C for the crotchet rest, and the pupil need never trouble himself about the matter again. We particularly recommend for attentive perusal the "Hints for answering the Paper" at the examinations; for very often even clever students, by some oversight or slight act of carelessness, scarcely do themselves justice. At the end of the book we have some of last year's papers, given for both the senior and junior divisions, with some specimen answers, which will be found extremely useful as guides for those unaccustomed to write down replies to questions without the possibility of reference to any work. As accuracy here is of the utmost importance, we are certain that Mr. Clarke will thank us for pointing out the following errors. At page 38 it is stated that Mendelssohn's first Oratorio, "St. Paul," "was produced at Birmingham in 1837." The fact is that the first performance of the work in this country was on Friday morning, October 7, 1836, at the Musical Festival at St. Peter's Church, Liverpool, the Conductor being Sir George Smart. Then at page 41, an example of a diminished third is given from F♯, although in the paper to which it refers it is especially stated that it must be taken from F♮. At page 6, Appoggiatura is spelt with one g; and the melody to be barred, on the same page, is afterwards given in 3-2 time, ending with a bar containing a dotted minim, a mistake which would certainly puzzle the most accomplished candidate for the "honours section." These slips of the pen might be easily remedied in a future edition; and that we think the book worthy of a second issue may be gathered from the fact of our having so carefully examined such minute details as we have drawn attention to.

Singing. An Essay. By Frederic Penna. [Tinsley Brothers.]

THE author of this essay tells us that in writing it he had two objects in view—"First, to render some service to the listener at a concert at which English is sung; Second, to give aid to the vocal student;" and we are bound to say that he has carried out both these objects in a highly satisfactory manner. We have had so many treatises upon the art of producing the voice, with coloured illustrations of the vocal organs, that it is really a relief to find a master treating only of the intellectual aspect of the art; and we congratulate Mr. Penna upon the successful fulfilment of his intention not to have a "single musical note" in his book. His remarks upon "tone-colour," "accent," and "oratorio singing" show the result of much thought on the subjects; and in the practical illustrations of the theories he advocates he is, as a rule, extremely happy. We can find space for but one extract. Speaking of "tone-colour," he says: "It has often been said that a sentiment is half expressed by the tone assumed. We know the actuating emotions of a speaker almost as much by the tone of his voice as by the words he uses. . . . How essential then it is to cultivate this colour of voice; and especially so when there is an intention to give expression to artificial sentiments!" With all this we agree; but can scarcely indorse the opinion thus oracularly given forth: "If the reader think he must be a good musician in order to be a good singer, let him at once dispel the illusion." It is assuredly possible to become a singer without being an accomplished musician; but we have not yet met the good singer who has merely a superficial knowledge of music.

FOREIGN NOTES.

AFTER having been repeatedly postponed, the inauguration of the official Concerts of the Paris International Exhibition took place on the 6th ult. in the new hall erected for the purpose, after the design of MM. Davioud and Bourdais, which is capable of accommodating 4,500 spectators and 500 executants, and the acoustic arrangements of which are said to be absolutely perfect. The programme of the opening performance, which consisted entirely of works by French composers, will be found among our usual Concert notices, as well as those of a few other concerts incidental to the Exhibition, which may be of special interest. It is difficult, if not impossible, however, to make anything like a fair selection under present circumstances, as it may be safely asserted that the musical life stirring at this moment in the French capital is entirely unprecedented in the annals of International Exhibitions. The following are the names of the members forming the International Jury for musical competition: England, Dr. John Stainer; United States, F. A. Post; Spain, M. S. Fuertes; Austro-Hungary, Dr. Hanslick and Franz Liszt; Switzerland, Oscar Hegar; Belgium, M. Gevaert; France, Le Couppey, Gustave Chouquet, I. Armingaud, M. Reber, and M. Vervoitte; all of whom are now assembled. Among the collections of musical instruments exhibited, that of MM. Kraus, père et fils, of Florence, occupies a prominent place. It consists of most interesting specimens, both ancient and modern, of stringed instruments, spinets, and clavecins by Cristofori and others. Among modern inventions in the improvement of musical instruments, the pianoforte constructed by MM. Comettant and Mangeot frères, attracts general attention. The novelty in the instrument in question consists in a double keyboard, the scales of which ascend in opposite directions, so that the bass of the one proximates the treble of the other. The advantages of this arrangement are at once seen. It obviates the necessity of a separate fingering for each hand; no longer condemned to play a distinct part, the hands of the performer command with absolute freedom a field of seven octaves. The use, moreover, of the improved instrument for the purpose of reproducing orchestral effects need hardly be pointed out. M. Zarebski, the young Polish pianist, has been the first to master, after two months' assiduous practice, the novel manipulations required for the double keyboard, producing most surprising results at a performance recently given in the presence of a distinguished audience of professors and amateurs.

M. Gounod's new Opera "Polyeucte" will not be performed at the Grand-Opéra until some time in September next. At the Opéra-Comique the alternate representations of "L'Etoile du Nord," "Les Diamants de la Couronne," and "Psyché" continue to attract large audiences. The Théâtre-Italien has closed its season of Opera with Verdi's "Aïda;" the resuscitated Théâtre Lyrique, on the other hand, was to have reopened its doors on the 20th ult. During the past season the receipts of the Paris Grand-Opéra amounted to 2,950,797 francs, those of the Théâtre-Français to 1,748,189 francs.

After a most successful campaign at the Royal Theatre of Lisbon, the French troupe of lyrical artists, under the direction of M. Constantin, have returned to the French capital. The Opera most in favour with the Portuguese audience has been M. Ambroise Thomas's "Mignon."

The publishing firm of Schott, in Bruxelles, are about to issue an interesting work in four volumes, entitled, "Histoire du Théâtre Français en Belgique depuis son origine jusqu'á nos jours" from the pen of M. Frédéric Faber.

The Royal Opera House at Berlin was closed for the usual summer vacation on the 14th ult. with a performance of "Fidelio." According to a statistical notice contained in the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung, 223 performances of opera have taken place at that institution during the ten months from the 24th of August last, not including dramas with incidental music, such as Weber's "Preciosa," &c. In numerical order, Richard Wagner ranks first with thirty-three representations of five works; next comes Mozart, with twenty-nine representations of six works; then follow the names of Verdi, Meyerbeer, and Brüll, with nineteen, eighteen, and seventeen performances respectively. Weber's operas were heard on eleven occasions; Beethoven's only operatic work on seven; Gluck's name appears on the list three times; that of Cherubini twice. Only two novelties have been produced during the period named, viz., Ignaz Brüll's "Der Landfriede" and Richard Wüerst's "Die Offiziere der Kaiserin."

The first performance at Munich last month of Herr Wagner's "Siegfried" is said to have been highly successful. Herr Vogel, as the representative of the athletic hero, and Madame Vogel, in the character of Brünnhilde, are specially mentioned as having acquitted themselves of an exceptionally difficult task with great ability. At the same theatre of the Bavarian capital the annual private performances, at which the singular-minded king forms the sole audience, have recommenced. On those occasions the house is brilliantly illuminated, as on a gala-night, and directly His Majesty enters the royal box, the performance of either tragedy, comedy, or opera commences, there being not even a servant admitted to disturb the solitude of the royal listener.

Herr Max Bruch has, it is stated, accepted the post of director of the Stern'sche Gesangverein at Berlin, in the room of Herr Julius Stockhausen, whose eminent talent has been secured for the newly founded Hoch'sche Conservatorium at Frankfort, under the direction of Herr Joachim Raff, which is to be opened in September next.

The town council of Leipzig have unanimously elected Dr. W. Rust, of Berlin, for the vacant post of organist at St. Thomas's Church.

We read in a letter from Halle of the great impression produced by a first performance of a Symphony in B minor from the pen of a lady, Mdlle. Emilie Mayer. The work in question is said to bear evidence of original power and thoroughly musicianlike workmanship; and the fact is the more worthy of notice, since the successful competition of lady composers with the opposite sex in the higher spheres of the art remains, at all events at present, but an isolated achievement.

To the list of German Operatic institutions which have undertaken the performance of parts of Herr Wagner's Tetralogy, must now be added that of Brunswick, where "Rheingold" and "Walküre" are in course of preparation. The anniversary of the poet-composer's birth (May 22) was celebrated by appropriate musical performances on the part of the numerous Wagner Societies all over Germany.

Some few weeks ago Herr Hans von Bülow gave what he termed—probably in reminiscence of his periodical visits to this country—a "Pianoforte Recital" at the town of Dresden. The fact has roused the ire of a purist correspondent of the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, who protests against the introduction of more foreign terms into German concert programmes, especially when emanating from the language of the "most unmusical of all civilised nations." By way of illustration of the latter, by no means novel, characterisation as regards this country, the same journal contains a detailed report of the annual public examinations recently held at the Leipzig Conservatorium, which literally teems with the names of English pupils who have attained special excellence in various departments of the institution. Although facts speak for themselves, it is the peculiar privilege of prejudice not to listen to their teaching.

A recent number of the Allgemeine Deutsche Musik Zeitung contains an interesting article on the "History of the Bâton de Mésure," in which the writer traces the first introduction into the chief music-cultivating countries of this comparatively modern insigne of the orchestral leader. We also notice in No. 23 of the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, under the heading of "Zur Beethoven Literatur," Herr Nohl's very temperate reply to Mr. Thayer's recently published critical observations respecting some phases in the life of Beethoven, as represented in Herr Nohl's biography of the great composer.

According to an announcement made in the Leipzig Signale, the projected Mozart Festival at Salzburg will not be held this year.

The annual Music Festival of the Lower Rhine took place on the 9th ult. at Düsseldorf, under the direction of Herr Joachim, with a programme, the chief features of which have already been announced in these columns. On the third day of the festival, which, as usual, was devoted chiefly to the display of individual talent, Herr Joachim played a Concerto in A minor, by Viotti, and Madame Joachim sang the Scena from "Demetrius," composed by her husband; a Cantata for chorus and orchestra by Julius Tausch, the Düsseldorf musikdirector, entitled "Germanenzug," formed likewise part of the programme on the occasion.

At the Imperial Opera of Vienna, Wagner's "Tannhäuser" was recently performed in its original form, i.e. without any of the modifications which the composer himself eventually introduced into the score of the work.

The Neue Freie Presse contains the announcement that Herr Johann Strauss, a widower since the last two months, is about to be married to a young singer, Mdlle. Angelica Dittrich, a pupil of Proch.

M. Massenet's Opera, "Le Roi de Lahore," will be placed on the répertoire of the Munich Theatre during next season.

A new Comic Opera in three acts, from the pen of Theodor Rehbaum, and entitled "Don Pablo," is in course of preparation at Dresden.

Lauro Rossi, one of the most distinguished savants of Italy, has, it is stated, resigned his post of Director of the Conservatoire at Naples.

At the Theatre dal Verme of Milan a new Opera by Signor Augusto Moroder, entitled "Gabriella Candiano," was recently produced, without, however, realising the great expectations which the work had excited. Signor Moroder is a pupil of the maestro, Lauro Rossi, of Naples.

The first complete performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah" took place a few weeks ago at New York, the work having been taken in hand by the Oratorio Society of that city.

We have to record the death of Franz von Holstein, the successful composer of several operas, an artist universally esteemed in Germany. He died at the age of fifty-two.

The death is also announced at Berlin of Franz Espagne, during twenty years chief librarian of the musical section of the Royal Library, which is indebted to his knowledge and zeal for numerous most valuable additions. He has also lent valuable aid to the standard editions of the works of Bach, Mozart, and Beethoven, published at Leipzig. He was only fifty years of age.

We subjoin, as usual, the programmes of Concerts recently given at some of the leading institutions abroad:—

Paris.—First Concert Officiel of the Exhibition (June 6): Part I. of "Le Désert" (Félicien David); Cantata, "Les Noces de Prométhée" (Saint-Saëns); Danse Bohémienne from "La Jolie Fille de Perth" (Bizet); Fragments from "Sapho" (Louis Lacombe); Overture and Chorus from "La Déesse et le Berger" (J. Duprato); Septett and March from "Les Troyens à Carthage" (Berlioz); vocal soli. First Exhibition Concert of Chamber Music (June 7): Quintett No. 12 (Onslow); Thême with variations (Massenet); Concerto for Viola (Garcin); Allegretto and Andantino for stringed instruments (Lalo); Trio for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello (Reber). Second Exhibition Concert of Chamber Music (June 14): Quartett in E flat (Cherubini); Trio for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello (Widor); Quartett No. 5, for stringed instruments (A. Morel). Second Concert Officiel (June 18): Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" (Lalo); Fragments from "L'Arlesienne" (Bizet); Symphony in C (Gouvy); Idylle et Danse des Satyres (Destribaud); Fragments from "Eucharis" (Deldevez); Overture to "Zampa" (Hérold). First Concert of the Orchestra of La Scala (June 19): Symphony in C (Foroni); "Contemplation" and Scherzo (Catalini); Overture to "Guarany" (Gomes); Gavotte for stringed instruments (Bazzini); Overture to "Promessi Sposi" (Ponchielli); Overture, "Coriolan" (Beethoven); Funeral March from "Amleto" (Faccio); Overture to "Vespri Siciliani" (Verdi); Overture to "Carnaval Romain" (Berlioz); Overture to "Siége de Corinth" (Rossini). Third Exhibition Concert of Chamber Music (June 21): Quartett for strings, Op. 56 (Gouvy); Suite for flute and pianoforte (Madame de Grandval); Trio, Op. 17 (A. de Castillon).

Leipzig.—Concert of the Riedel'scher Verein (June 2): Präludium in B minor (Bach); "Stabat Mater" (Palestrina); Air for violin (Goldmark); 137th Psalm (Liszt); 117th Psalm (R. Franz); &c. Conservatorium (June 6): Quartett in F (Schumann); Sonata in G for violin (Beethoven); Sonata for pianoforte (Schumann); vocal soli.

Berlin.—Concert of the Sternsche Gesangverein (Thanksgiving for the preservation of the life of the Emperor, May 26): March and Chorus from the "Ruins of Athens" (Beethoven); Duet, "The Lord is a Man of War" (Handel); Dettingen Te Deum (Handel).

CORRESPONDENCE.

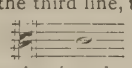
THE TENOR CLEF.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

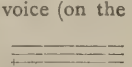
SIR,—A fatal objection to Mr. Whitaker's somewhat ingenious suggestion in your last issue is that it entirely falsifies that foundation of Pitch Notation, the "Great Stave of Eleven Lines," the middle line of which bears unalterably the note C; i.e.—

Used for the tenor voice, it is customary and convenient (seeing that the notes of this voice occur chiefly on and around this line) to place this note C on the fourth of five lines taken arbitrarily from the "Great Stave," thus:—

for the alto voice, on the third line, thus:—



and for the soprano voice (on the Continent at least), on the first line, thus:—



In each case, however, this note C is one and the same as to pitch, and it would certainly be incorrect to state that it ever occupies a different position on the stave: its position is always the same, but the number of lines above or below it may be altered according to the requirements of the part. Mr. Whitaker's suggestion makes this note C occur in the place which B must occupy, and involves confusion of the most hopeless kind. If, however, Mr. Whitaker means that the notes are to read as though in the G clef, only sounding an octave lower, then the method suggested, I believe by a Mr. Oliphant, some time ago will probably be preferred, seeing that it does not involve the falsification of the Great Stave. Mr. Oliphant's plan was that two G clefs be written in place of one; i.e.— and these are to be understood as lowering the notes one octave compared with their pitch under one such clef. As regards the general aspect of this subject of clefs (on which much ignorance and misconception exists), it appears, I think, as unreasonable for a tenor chorus singer to make objection to the use of a clef whereby the notes of his part can best be read in their true position, as it would be for, say, a viola-player to reject the C clef in which his part is written, because he is desirous of concealing his want of proper education by the adoption of some such makeshift as that your correspondent advocates.

There is just as much necessity for, and justification of, the existence and use of the C clef as there is for the G (treble), or the F (bass), unless indeed a confusing number of ledger-lines above or below these last-mentioned clefs be preferred; or resort be had to another undesirable alternative, viz., the placing of more or less lines above and below the G or the F clef, thus making an apparent but not real alteration of the position of these two notes on their respective staves. Doubtless, however, this latter plan would prove so perplexing to the majority of persons that they would wisely prefer the labour of learning the C clef.

Starting with a clear comprehension of the "Great Stave," few persons of average intelligence will find a knowledge of the C clef more difficult to acquire than either the G or the F clef, and probably the time consumed in seeking ineffective substitutes like that under discussion, would be better spent in attaining a knowledge of the real thing, which being true in principle will, without doubt, in the long run be found the most effective in practice, and will amply repay the hours of labour spent in its acquisition.—Yours faithfully, K. N.

SCOTCH REELS, &c.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—The perusal of Mrs. Maclagan's interesting letter concerning Reels and Strathspeys incites me to mention the local tradition of Speyside as to the origin of the famous airs "Tullochgorm" and the Reel of "Tulloch." When I was last there, in 1870, I learned that their composer was one Dallas, whose violin was preserved in a farmhouse in the parish of Duthil (included in Strathspey), where the tombs are of the chiefs of the Grants, the Strathspey clan. Mr. Salaman was probably thinking of Grantown, of late years become a northern sanatorium, when he referred to a town or village called Strathspey. Tullochgorm (blue knoll or eminence) is a farm near the Broomhill Station of the Highland Railway. Tulloch is the designation of some rising ground in the direction of the mountain Cairn Gorm.—I am, sir, your obedient servant,

Kensington, June 12, 1878. A. J. HIPKINS.

"GOD SAVE THE KING."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—I see from the very able article in this month's MUSICAL TIMES, on "God save the King," Mr. Cummings refers to a book "The Muse's Delight," and states that this book was published by John Sadler, at Liverpool, in the year 1754. I do not doubt the accuracy of this statement, but if it is correct there is a strange coincidence, as I have in my possession, in capital condition, a copy of

"The Muse's Delight, an accurate Collection of English and Italian Songs, Cantatas, and Duetts, set to Music for the Harpsichord, Violin, German Flute, &c., with Instructions for the Voice, Violin, Harpsichord or Spinnet, German Flute, Common Flute, Hautboy, French Horn, Bassoon, & Bass Violin; also a Compleat Musical Dictionary, and upwards of Four Hundred English, Irish, & Scots Songs, without the Music. London: Printed by Henry Purcell, at Handel's Head, in Wood Street, M,DCC,LIV."

The title-page, of which the above is a copy, is in red and black letters alternate.

I am inclined to think that this is the book to which Mr. Cummings refers, as it is not likely that two editions of this work would be published in the same year, one in London the other in Liverpool. In the copy in my possession there is no composer's name to the air "God save great George ye King," or rather as it is headed "A Loyal Song for two Voices," although to almost every other song in the book the "setter" or composer's name is added.

In the same book there is, amongst others, a loyal song entitled "The State of Little Britain," set by Mr. Carey. This, I presume, is the Mr. Henry Carey for whom his son, according to Mr. Cummings, claimed the authorship.

The song I mention—"The State of Little Britain"—is quite unique in its way. The first verse is as follows:—

Britons where is your great magnanimity?
Where's your boasted courage flown?
Quite perverted to pusilanimity,
Scarce to call your souls your own.

This may or may not be written by the same hand as "God save the King." There is certainly a great comparison in style, although in the last verse of the above song the words are—

Gracious gods to assist exurgitate,
Stretch forth your vindictive hand;
Make oppressors their plunder regurgitate,
And preserve a sinking land.

This smacks a little of—

Confound their politics,
Frustrate their knavish tricks, &c.

I am, sir, yours, &c., HENRY MILLER.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

 Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will greatly oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music pages are always stereotyped, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

MUS. BAC.—The University of London has lately published regulations for the Degrees of Bachelor and Doctor in Music; but no such degrees have as yet been conferred. The Examiners, we believe, are not yet appointed. As to the hood, we can give you no information: possibly the Registrar of the University may be able to enlighten you. An article on this subject appears in our present number.

FRED. R. GREENWOOD.—Space will not allow us to print our correspondent's letter; but we may say that pianists differ as to the manner of playing both the appoggiatura and the acciaccatura. We are inclined to agree with Mr. Greenwood in the rules he lays down; and even those who dissent from these views, and advance a theory of their own, are continually compelled to make exceptions.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

BECKENHAM.—A very successful Concert was given in Christ Church Lecture Hall by the Beckenham Tonic Sol-fa Association on Thursday evening, the 6th ult. The programme consisted of part-songs, songs, duets, &c. The solo vocalists were Miss Chatfield, Miss Longford, Miss Barnes, and Messrs. Jeal, G. Clarke, Privett, and Barker. Mr. W. Barnaby, director of the class, conducted, and Mr. J. Jenkins presided at the pianoforte.

BEDFORD.—On the evening of Ascension Day (May 30) full Choral Service was held in Holy Trinity Church, and for the first time in the town an orchestra was used with the organ to accompany the service. The Anthem was Mendelssohn's Lauda Sion, and after the sermon (which was preached by the Rev. H. A. Cotton, Minor Canon of Westminster) Handel's "Lift up your heads" was sung. The music was rendered with very great effect, the choir and band numbering 160. Mr. Ford presided at the organ, and Mr. P. H. Diemer conducted. The chants and hymns were heartily joined in by the large congregation.——The Amateur Musical Society gave its second Concert of the twelfth season, on Tuesday the 4th ult. The first part included Gade's Spring's Message and Mendelssohn's Walpurgis Night, both of which were given with much effect. The choir sang Spring's Message with great refinement, and the difficult Walpurgis Night made a very great impression; the band and chorus thoroughly entering into the spirit of the composition. The soloists were Miss Hipwell, Mr. Sydney Tower, and Mr. Lewis Thomas. The second part opened with the Overture to Zampa, which was rapturously encored, as was also a part-song "Dewdrops," by the Conductor of the Society, Mr. P. H. Diemer, a flute solo by Mr. Benjamin Wells, and "Non più andrai," sung by Mr. Lewis Thomas. The next work to be performed is Schumann's Paradise and the Peri.

BIRMINGHAM.—Mr. D. F. Davis gave a Concert at the Town Hall, on Tuesday, May 28, the most striking feature of which was the band of harps, twenty-six in number, which was most effective, not only in several pieces, but in accompanying the choir of the Philharmonic Union. Miss Woodley (who took the place of Madame Hersée, absent through illness) and Mr. Vernon Rigby were highly successful in their vocal solos. Mr. John Thomas performed solos, and, with Mr. Davis, a duet for harps. The concert was conducted by Dr. Heap. There was a large and appreciative audience, many items in the programme being encored.——The famous American band of Mr. Gilmore gave a series of Promenade Concerts, at Curzon Hall, on Monday and Tuesday the 3rd and 4th ult. The finest performances were Liszt's Rhapsodie Hongroise, No. 2, and the Overtures, Oberon, Der Freischütz, and the Leonora, No. 3, the latter affording an opportunity for displaying the fine clarionet playing of the band. Solos for various instruments were also given, and vocal pieces by Miss Lilian Norton, who created a favourable impression. Immense enthusiasm was aroused at the last concert, when the National airs, "God save the Queen," "Rule Britannia," "Yankee Doodle," and "Auld lang syne," were played by the band standing up and the audience joining in chorus.——Dr. Sullivan's comic Opera, the Sorcerer, had a successful run of twelve nights at the Prince of Wales's Theatre, from the 10th ult.

BRISTOL.—On Monday the 27th of May the last of the series of Monday Popular Concerts was given in the Colston Hall, the audience being larger than on any previous occasion, many being unable to find seats. The principal items in the programme were the Overtures to Alphonso and Estrella (Schubert) and William Tell (Rossini), and Mozart's Grand Double Concerto for two pianofortes and orchestra in E flat; the piano parts in the latter being rendered by Mr. and Mrs. J. L. Roeckel. Mr. Henry Guy was the vocalist, Mr. A. W. Waite leader of the band, and Mr. George Riseley conducted.——On Monday the 3rd ult. the Bristol and Clifton Orchestral Society gave a complimentary Concert to their Conductor, Mr. George Riseley, at the Colston Hall, when an excellent programme was rendered by the band, which consisted of about seventy performers. Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony, Sterndale Bennett's Fantasia Overture, Paradise and the Peri, Weber's Overture to Der Freischütz, a Minuet and Trio composed expressly for the occasion by Mr. E. Prout and dedicated to Mr. Riseley, were amongst the principal items. Mr. Walter Macfarren conducted his own Overture "Pastoral," a work which was received with marked favour. Mr. Barton McGuckin was the vocalist, and sang Handel's "Deeper and deeper still," "Waft her angels," and "Thou shall dash them," in splendid style. Mr. George Riseley conducted, and received a most gratifying reception from a large and fashionable audience.——On Thursday the 6th ult. Gilmore's famous American band gave two Concerts in the Colston Hall. The programme was similar to that provided at other places, and it is only necessary to say that the performance of the band was evidently most thoroughly enjoyed, the applause after some of the pieces being most enthusiastic. There were large audiences at both Concerts.——On Monday the 17th ult. two Concerts were given in the Colston Hall by the Welsh Choir, which accompanied Dr. Parry to Cambridge, on the occasion of his being invested with the degree of Mus. Doc. The principal items were the Sacred Exercise, Jerusalem, composed by Dr Parry for his degree, and a Welsh Opera, Blodwen, in three acts, also composed by Dr. Parry. Besides these pieces a miscellaneous selection of music was performed. The Concert was highly satisfactory, Dr. Parry's Opera being warmly received. The vocalists were Miss Hattie Davies, Miss Griffiths, Miss Eleanor Rees, Eos Morlais, Mr. R. C. Jenkins, and Mr. Lucas Williams. Dr. Parry conducted.

CHICHESTER.—The first invitation Concert of the new Musical Society was given on the 13th ult. before a large audience. The choral numbers were rendered with delicacy and precision, reflecting the greatest credit on the Conductor, Mr T. E. Aylward. The first part of the programme consisted of Spohr's God, Thou art great, Haydn's Motett Insanæ et vanæ, and Mendelssohn's Hymn, Hear my prayer; the second of part-songs. The soloists were Miss Saidie Singleton (R.A.M.), Miss Brandram, Rev. J. Horan, Mr. H. W. Dodd, Mr. J. W. Turner, and Mr. Duncan Hume accompanist and solo pianoforte. Miss Singleton sang the Solo, with Chorus, "Thou Earth, waft sweet incense," with delicacy and refinement, and gave an intelligent rendering of "Hear my prayer." Mr. Hume's interpretation of Mendelssohn's Fantasia in A minor was much appreciated. At the close of the evening, the Bishop, in a brief speech, proposed a vote of thanks to Mr. Aylward.

CLIFTON.—On Tuesday, May 28, a performance of Handel's Samson was given by the Bristol Handel Society in the Victoria Rooms. This is the second Concert given by the Society during the present season, and the improvement noticeable in the choral portion was most marked. The principal vocalists were Miss Jessie Royd, Miss Margaret Hancock, Mr Harper Kearton, and Mr. Merrick. The Choruses were sung by the Handel Society Choir and the accompaniments were played by the band, of which Mr. J. O. Brooke was leader. Mr. Dinelli Skelding presided at the organ, and Mr. A. Whitaker, the founder of the Society, conducted.

DERBY.—A Military Concert was given in the Royal Drill Hall on Friday, the 7th ult., by the band of the 1st Derbyshire Militia, under the conductorship of Mr. McCarthy, bandmaster. The orchestral portions of the programme were well rendered by the band. The vocalists were Mr. F. Simons and Mr. Field Baldwin, both of whom were highly successful. Mrs. Field Baldwin presided at the pianoforte.

ERITH.—A Musical Competition for amateurs was held at the Public Hall on Monday the 17th ult. Prizes were given for sight singing, sight playing, quartett singing at sight, answers and questions in harmony, &c.—for all of which a great number of competitors presented themselves. There was very close and excellent competition in several classes. The judges were Mr. C. Warwick Jordan, Mus. Bac., Oxon, Mr. G. C. Martin, Mus. Bac., Oxon., and Mr. Richard Lemaire, to all of whom a hearty vote of thanks was accorded by the large audience.

GRAYS.—A Concert for the benefit of the Grays Elementary Schools was given by the Grays and Orsett Choral Society, on the 6th ult., under the able direction of the Society's Conductor, Mr. Henry Regaldi. The programme was varied and well chosen. A feature of the evening was the choral music, which was exceedingly well sung; and several of the vocal Solos were encored.

HAMILTON, CANADA.—Barnby's Cantata, Rebekah, was performed in the Mechanics' Hall, on Tuesday, May 20, with a choir of thirty-eight voices, accompanied by pianoforte, harmonium, first and second violin, two violas, two violoncellos, and flute. The solos were given by Mrs. Caldwell (Rebekah), Mr. Egan (Eliezer), and Mr. Mitchell (Isaac); and the performance was conducted by Mr. J. E. P. Aldous. The Cantata was rendered exceedingly well in every respect, the choruses being sung throughout with the utmost precision and effect.

HOLBURN.—On the 21st ult. a Recital of sacred music was given by Mr. W. H. Richmond, organist, St. Paul's Cathedral Church, Dundee, on the harmonium which has just been introduced into the Established Holburn Church, Aberdeen. It is an extremely handsome instrument in oak, and was supplied by the well-known local firm of D. and J. Macbeth, Union Street, being manufactured by Trayser, of Stuttgart. The harmonium, which will doubtless be of great utility in the church, has seven sets of reeds—two acting on the upper manual, three on the lower manual, and two on the pedals—which are sixteen feet and eight feet respectively. The programme of music performed consisted of a selection from the Hymn of Praise (Mendelssohn), "Le Reveil des Anges Priere" (Lamothe), Rossini's "Reminiscence du Stabat Mater," a Kyrie and Gloria from Mozart, a slow movement from Haydn, and an Andante of Mr. Richmond's own composition. All these pieces were excellently rendered, and at intervals between the solos, a large choir, led by Mr. Ewing, the Precentor of the Church, sang, with good effect, Anthems by Greene, Wilton, Kent, and others. Mr. Richmond accompanied on the harmonium. The pastor of the church (Rev. Mr. M'Clymont) presided.

HONLEY.—On Whit Sunday the Annual Festival in connection with St. Mary's Church took place. The morning and evening sermons were preached by the Rev. W. Laycock, and the afternoon by the Rev. G. R. Wareing. The evening service was opened by the singing of the Hymn, "Saviour, blessed Saviour," to Professor Oakeley's tune "Edina." The Proper Psalms were sung to Ouseley and Barnby in E, the Magnificat to Grégorian Chants; and the Nunc dimittis to Brown in G. The choir, which numbered about 100 voices, gave an excellent rendering of Tallis Trimnell's "The Lord is King." The versicles and other portions of the service were performed with much precision, reflecting great credit on Mr. J. C. Beaumont, the organist and choirmaster. His voluntaries were Andante in G (Smart), Andante from the Quartett in D (Mozart), and "War March" (Mendelssohn).

KIDDERMINSTER.—Handel's Oratorio, Samson, was performed by the members of the Choral Society on the 4th ult. in the Town Hall. Mr. Fitzgerald conducted, Mr. W. Taylor presided at the organ, and Mr. W. E. Wadely at the piano. The Overture was well played by the orchestra, and the Choruses were performed with a crispness, precision, and evenness of power which showed admirable training. Mrs. Glover-Eaton, Miss N. Bailey, Mr. Beach, Mr. Cotton, and Mr. Muston were the solo vocalists.

NEWCASTLE.—A Miscellaneous Concert by Mr. Rea's choir, and Organ Recital by Mr. Rea, were given in the Town Hall on the 6th ult. The programme comprised portions of Macfarren's Cantata, the Lady of the Lake, which was composed expressly for the Glasgow choral and orchestral concerts, and produced there with great success in November. The Coronach, "He is gone," and the "Soldier's rest" Chorus were admirably rendered; selections were also given from Smart's Bride of Dunkerron. Mr. Rea contributed, as organ solos, the Overtures to Oberon and Der Freischütz, a pianoforte solo, Fantasia on themes from Verdi's Rigoletto by Liszt, and was joined in an organ duet by Mr. Alderson, who also played the accompaniments. An adagio movement for violin and organ, by Gustav Merkel, was performed by Mr. Kinnear and Mr. Rea. The vocalists were Miss Harrison, Mr. Mace, and Mr. Armstrong.

NORWICH.—The members of the Norfolk and Norwich Musical Union gave their fourteenth Concert in St. Andrew's Hall on Wednesday evening, May 29. The Concert commenced with Weber's Jubilee Cantata, the Praise of Jehovah, in which the leading parts were taken by Miss Constance Herring, Miss Burton, Mr. H. J. Minns, and Mr. Smith (bass). They were well supported by the choir and band, under the able direction of Dr Bunnett, and the Cantata was given in a surprisingly satisfactory way for an amateur Society. The second part opened with Mendelssohn's Overture to Athalie by the band, followed by a selection of favourite pieces.

OXFORD.—Dr. Corfe, the veteran Choragus of the University, gave a Concert of Vocal and Instrumental Music in the Sheldonian Theatre on May 29. The programme was selected from the works of Handel and Mendelssohn, and consisted of the Cantata, To the Sons of Art, and the "Bacchus Chorus" from Antigone, by the latter composer, the former contributing his Largo, Organ Concerto, No. 1, and the Ode on St. Cecilia's Day. The soloists were Miss Davies and Mr. Robson, and the chorus and band were carefully selected, the result being one of the best performances heard in Oxford for many years ——The Philharmonic Society gave a Concert in the same place on the 24th ult. The first part consisted of a Festival March by Herr Henschel, conducted by the composer; a Part-Song by Eaton Faning; and Mozart's Fantasia in F minor for Organ. The second part was Randegger's Fridolin, also conducted by the composer. The performance was extremely good.——Innumerable Concerts have been given by the various Colleges during the Commemoration, but the only one that demands notice was that by Queen's College on the 21st ult. As usual at this College, a complete Cantata was given, with full orchestra—on this occasion the First Walpurgis Night. Among the other chief items in a programme of remarkable interest were songs by Franz and Brahms; a too seldom heard Overture by Mozart, "Der Schauspiel Director;" and a beautiful excerpt from Purcell's little known Opera, Dido and Æneas. The College possesses in Messrs. St. Patrick, Anstice, and Tuckwell three most efficient soloists, and the chorus and band were alike excellent. The contrast between this and the performances of somewhat hackneyed part-songs forming the staple of other College programmes was most refreshing.

PORTOBELLO.—An excellent Concert was given by the Portobello Free Church Musical Association on the 21st ult. in the Town Hall. There was a very efficient orchestra, Mr. H. S. Smart presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. G. W. Lingard at the harmonium. The first part of the programme consisted of Mozart's First Mass (in C), a favourite work with choral societies, the choruses in which were rendered with excellent effect, and the soloists showing abilities, both in voice and execution, of a very high order. The "Agnus Dei," and "Dona nobis" were especially well rendered. Cowen's Cantata, the Rose Maiden, was afterwards performed, and received with the warmest applause. Mr. Boyack was an efficient Conductor.

SHERBORNE.—The third season of the Musical Union was brought to a successful termination by two Concerts, given in the Town Hall on the 5th and 6th ult. Handel's Serenata, Acis and Galatea, formed the first part of the programme, the Solos in which were ably sustained by Mrs. R. Ensor, Mr. W. Monk, Mr. G. F. Stokes, and Mr. Parker. Mr. Louis N. Parker conducted.

SOUTHSEA.—On the 17th ult. an excellent Concert was given at the Portland Hall, by Her Majesty's Opera Company, represented by Mdlle. Marimon, Mdlle. Parodi, Mdlle. Hélène Crosmond, Miss Cummings, Signor Bettini, Signor Del Puente, and Herr Behrens, who gave a selection of vocal music with marked success. Great disappointment was felt at the absence of Mdlle. Valleria, Signor Campanini, and Signor Foli, who had been advertised to appear.

SURBITON.—The members of the Surbiton Choral Society gave their second invitation Concert on May 28, at St. Mark's Schools. Miss Whitehouse and Miss Russell rendered their solos with great taste, and were deservedly encored; and the choruses, especially "Here by Babylon's wave" (Gounod), were, on the whole, carefully interpreted. Mr. Röst's piano solo was enthusiastically re-demanded. In the second part a pianoforte duet by Mr. Röst and Miss Amy Gordon formed one of the most agreeable portions of the concert. The remainder of the programme consisted of the principal portions of Barnett's Cantata, the Ancient Mariner. The recitatives and solos were well sung by Miss Whitehouse, Miss Howell, Mr. Loxley, and Mr. Ball. The efforts of Mr. Röst, in connection with this Society, have been recognised by the presentation of a very handsome carved ivory bâton, subscribed for by the members. Mr. Brooke was a highly efficient accompanist.

SWANSEA.—The Choral Society announces that the following works will be performed during the coming season: St. John the Baptist (Macfarren); Messiah (Handel); Athalie (Mendelssohn), and the Last Judgment (Spohr). Mr. Silas Evans will conduct as usual.

TAUNTON.—On Friday the 7th ult. Festival Services were held in the Temple Chapel (Wesleyan) to celebrate the opening of the new organ just built by Philpott of Exeter. The organ is a large three-manual instrument of thirty-two stops, besides couplers, and, with its 16-feet front of pure tin pipes, burnished, presents an imposing appearance. The Psalms and Canticles at the morning service were sung to Anglican chants, and the Anthem was Stainer's "Sing a song of praise." Mr. Riseley, of Bristol, presided at the organ, and gave a Recital in the afternoon. Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise was sung at the evening service by a choir of upwards of seventy voices, under the conductorship of Mr. Reginald Barnicott, the chapel choirmaster. The choruses were given with commendable precision, and with careful attention to expression; and the solos were well sung by local amateurs. The organ accompaniment was played by Mr. Riseley with his accustomed skill and taste.

WARMINSTER.—The last Concert of the season was given at the Town Hall on Monday evening, the 3rd ult., by the Choral Society. The first part of the programme consisted entirely of a selection from the works of Handel, including overtures, concertos, airs, and choruses, all of which were well rendered. The second part was devoted to Macfarren's Cantata, May Day, which gave much satisfaction, and certainly reflected great credit, not only on the band and chorus, but upon the newly appointed Conductor, Mr. H. Millington, of Trowbridge, who must have taken much pains in the preparation of the work.

YEOVIL.—On Friday the 21st ult. a Concert was given in the Town Hall by the Wilmington Jubilee Singers, in aid of the Shaw University, Raleigh, North Carolina, under the special patronage of the Mayor of Yeovil (John Curtis, Esq.), many influential clergymen, and other gentlemen. Mrs. Ida Washington was the pianist and soprano. The programme consisted of nearly twenty quaint melodies, sung by these ex-slave vocalists in their dark days of bondage, all of which were thoroughly appreciated by the audience, several pieces being encored. The chanting of the "Lord's Prayer" was simply beautiful, and "Steal away to Jesus" was admirably rendered. The great feature of the Concert, however, was Mrs. Ida Washington's solos, which received a perfect ovation in each instance, particularly "Sweet Spirit, hear my prayer." Mr. Bozon, who guaranteed the company a certain sum, has a balance in hand which is intended for the Yeovil Hospital. The management was left entirely in the hands of Mr. Charles Bridges (Yeovil), and reflects upon him the greatest credit.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. J. E. Beare, Organist and Choirmaster to the Abbey, Romsey.—Mr. A. Orlando Steed, Organist and Director of the Choir to the Church of the Holy Trinity, Beckenham, S.E.—Mr. Chas. J. King, Organist and Choirmaster to Hinckley Parish Church.—Mr. Fredk. Edwin Barnes, late of S. Margaret's Church, Liverpool, to Montreal Cathedral.—Mr. William Taylor, to St. Matthew's, New Kent Road.

CHOIR APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. Edward Stroud, Choirmaster to St. Stephen's Church, North Bow, E.—Mr. Edwin Stevens, tenor (Trinity College, London), Choirmaster to West Ham Parish Church.

A DICTIONARY OF

MUSICAL TERMS

EDITED BY

J. STAINER, M.A., MUS. DOC.,
Magd. Coll., Oxford,

AND

W. A. BARRETT, MUS. BAC.,
St. Mary Hall, Oxford.

The following Gentlemen have contributed to this Work :—

BOSANQUET, R. H. M., Esq., M.A., Fellow of St. John's College, Oxford.
BULLEY, J., Esq., M.A., Magdalen College, Oxford.
CHAMPNEYS, F., Esq., B.M., M.A., M.R.C.S., of St. Bartholomew's Hospital, late Radcliffe Travelling Fellow of the University of Oxford.
CHAPPELL, W., Esq., F.S.A.
DONKIN, A. E., Esq., M.A., F.R.A.S., Fellow of Exeter College, Oxford.
ELLIS, A. J., Esq., B.A., F.R.S., F.S.A., F.C.P.S., F.C.P., Trinity College, Cambridge.
GADSBY, HENRY, Esq.
HELMORE, Rev. T., M.A.
HULLAH, JOHN, Esq.
MCNAUGHT, W. G., Esq.
MONK, W. H., Esq.

"Among articles which, though not absolutely indispensable in a Musical Dictionary, are well worth reading as treated in the Dictionary edited by Dr. Stainer and Mr. Barrett, may be mentioned 'applause' and 'dedication.' Indeed, apart from its high value as a work of reference, the Dictionary is interesting throughout."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"The 'Dictionary of Musical Terms,' by Dr. Stainer and Mr. Barrett, comes to supply the deficiency just at the time when people are waking up to the advantages of accuracy in all sorts of arts, and it is most welcome. Its title gives a very humble idea of its importance, suggesting rather dry definitions or technical explanations than what it really contains. The definitions and explanations are all there, and their multitude is truly astonishing, even the most out-of-the-way words receiving consideration; but besides this there is a great quantity of valuable essays, not only by the editors, but also by men well known to the public for successful labours in the field of music and acoustics, such as Mr. Hullah and Mr. Ellis, the translator of Helmholtz, and Mr. William Chappell and Mr. Helmore."—The Academy.

"A 'Dictionary of Musical Terms,' by Dr. Stainer and Mr. Barrett (Novello, Ewer and Co.), deserves especial mention, as the first attempt to supply the English reader with something that is not a limited glossary of technical words, but an encyclopædic book of reference on matters musical, such as German and Italian students have for some time been fortunate enough to possess."—The Graphic.

"In addition to this, the editors have derived information from many other equally good sources, so that the work is as trustworthy as it is complete, and professional and amateur musicians will alike owe a debt of gratitude to Dr. Stainer and Mr. Barrett for one of the most useful musical works ever produced."—Standard.

"It is the general character and tone of the volume that concerns general amateurs, who, at a little cost of time, can obtain from this volume information on theoretical and scientific subjects, without having to wade through complex works. The Dictionary displays careful research generally, and it is also imbued with an impartial spirit, which goes far to beget confidence in the writers. The book is illustrated with diagrams of instrumental workmanship, and is printed in very large and clear type."—The Athenæum.

MUSIC PRIMERS

EDITED BY

DR. STAINER.

In issuing this series of Music Primers the Editor sees with pleasure the realisation of a desire he has long felt, to place in the hands of teachers and students of music a set of educational works of a high standard at a price so low as to render them attainable by all.

The growing interest in music generally, and rapid spread of its study, so very evident in this country, render it of the utmost importance that the student's first steps in every branch should be directed with skill and based on sound principles. The Editor has kept this object steadily in view, and he believes that each one of these Primers will prove to be as carefully constructed in detail as it is comprehensive in design.

Such a result would have been impossible but for the hearty support and sympathy of those authors, men of known ability in their special branches of art, who have embodied the results of their long and valuable experience in their respective contributions.

While gratefully acknowledging the kindness of these gentlemen, the Editor cannot but express a hope that the Primers may prove as useful to the public, and as beneficial to art, as both authors and publishers have endeavoured to make them.

(NEW SERIES)

A COLLECTION OF GLEES AND PART-SONGS FOR MALE VOICES.

NOTWITHSTANDING the popularity of the ORPHEUS in its former shape, it is believed that its issue in separate Voice Parts is scarcely in accordance with the present taste; it is therefore the intention of Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co. to publish a New Series of this favourite Collection, in which every composition will appear in the popular Octavo form, in single numbers printed in Vocal Score, with a carefully revised Pianoforte Accompaniment. In many instances the translation of the words will also undergo revision.

The ORPHEUS will now consist exclusively of Part-Music for

MALE VOICES ONLY.

The whole of the original Series, with a few unimportant exceptions, will be published in the new form, and new compositions by the best composers will be added from time to time, as well as a number of pieces which have become popular in other forms or in other Collections. The Part-Songs for Mixed Voices hitherto contained in the Series will in future appear in the "Part-Song Book."

The whole of the compositions by Mendelssohn, until now included in the ORPHEUS, will be issued as a separate publication, forming a complete collection of his Part-Songs.

18, WIGMORE STREET, LONDON, W.

ON THE THREE YEARS' SYSTEM.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' GOLD MEDAL PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

SIR JULIUS BENEDICT. { "This most ingenious and valuable invention cannot fail to meet with success."
SYDNEY SMITH. "The touch is absolute perfection."
BRINLEY RICHARDS. { "A very clever and useful invention, and likely to be extensively adopted."

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' SHORT IRON GRAND PIANOS. Six feet six inches in length, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action. Price, 105 to 115 Guineas.

"The tone of the Grand now referred to possessed all the qualities that a good piano ought to have, and in touch and action was perfect. The sweet and silvery quality of the upper octaves was worthy of special admiration."—The Era.

"Sir Julius Benedict played his well-known composition, 'Where the Bee sucks,' on one of Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons' Grand Pianos, with the recently patented improvements, which enabled him to produce the sustained tones with great variety of effect in the light and shade of tones, especially so when extreme delicacy of touch is required."—Court Journal.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' SHORT IRON GRAND PIANOS. Six feet six inches in length, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action. Price, 105 to 115 Guineas.

"Admirable repetition, perfect sostenuto, and luscious tone of the instrument fully justified the performer's choice."—Sunday Times.

"Magnificent, grand, the air telling out with almost vocal clearness and sweetness to the bell-like treble arpeggio accompaniment, which contrasted excellently with the extraordinary power produced in the forte passages."—Illustrated Sporting and Dramatic News.

"An immense improvement in arpeggios. The rapid passages in the upper register, the beautiful flute-like tone, and quick and perfect repetition, were very effective."—Figaro.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' CONCERT IRON GRAND PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

"Sir Julius Benedict, now seldom heard as a soloist, delighted the public once more by his arrangement of 'Where the Bee sucks.' He played upon a new Patent Grand by Brinsmead, possessing a remarkably loud and clear tone."—Echo.

"The upright Iron Grand Piano, with sostenente sounding-board, the mechanism produces the obvious result of a fuller and richer tone."—Morning Advertiser.

"Every means are adopted to insure the production of perfect instruments."—The Orchestra.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' SHORT IRON GRAND PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action

"Where all the pianos go to seems somewhat of a mystery, for a really good instrument will last a lifetime: and yet every year thousands are made by each of the great London manufacturers, while the numbers made by the 200 or more smaller firms must represent an enormous number in the course of each year. The improvements made in English pianos have caused this trade rapidly to increase, until one pianoforte manufactory after another has been built to supply the growing demand. One of the largest of these, lately erected by Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons, of Wigmore Street, covers nearly an acre of ground in the Grafton Road, Kentish Town, and is intended to accommodate 300 workmen. These works alone can supply 3,000 pianos annually, and there are at least three manufactories in London capable of making an equal number."—Illustrated London News.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' GOLD MEDAL PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

"A metal bridge of a peculiar form is used to produce the treble, and a much finer tone is produced than if a wooden bridge were used."—Morning Post.

"A perfect check, great power, and quick repetition."—Times of India.

"Produces a better quality of tone, greater durability, the new pat ... perfect repetition, with a check (never before attained), with the certainty of the instrument never blocking."—Land and Water.

"Beautiful, light, and elastic touch, and an instant repetition."—Globe.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' GOLD MEDAL PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

"The softest touch is sufficient to secure a reply, the touch and facility of repetition are really perfect."—Belgravia.

"The advantages fully justify the term 'Perfect' Check Repeater Action."—John Bull.

"The touch is very sure, light, and elastic."—Musical Times.

"This invention is simplicity itself."—The Queen.

"The latest and greatest improvements in the pianoforte."—City Press.

TESTIMONIAL.

"Barrow Street, Quorndon, near Loughborough,
"July 16, 1877.

"Sir,—It is now over two years since I purchased a set of your pedals and action for pianofortes. After having thoroughly tested them and used them regularly for so long a period I have no hesitation in saying that they are a most decided success, and at the same time advise every organ student who wishes to become proficient in the art of pedalling to procure a set of them at once.

"I remain, Sir, yours truly,
"To Mr. J. Hamilton." "J. J. CALLIS.

WARD'S
ROYAL PIANOFORTE AND HARMONIUM LAMP,
FOR PROVIDING A CENTRAL & DIRECT LIGHT FOR THE PERFORMER.

The inconvenience of the present mode of lighting a performer at a pianoforte or harmonium by means of sconces fitted at the extremities of the instrument has long been a subject of complaint. The requirement is a central light to fall direct upon the music-book. This can be obtained by using Thomas Ward's Royal Pianoforte Lamp, which can be fitted to any form of instrument without defacing the same. Vocalists also will thus find a convenience which does not exist in other modes of lighting.

Prospectuses post-free.

AUGUST 1, 1878.

THE LONDON MUSICAL SEASON.

By HENRY C. LUNN.

THAT "Italian Opera" in this country has now become simply "Opera in Italian" may be proved not only by the fact of a large number of the works performed at our fashionable establishments being German and French, but by the appearance of these Operas in the bills with their original titles—an admission of the absurdity of tampering with words indelibly associated with music which we should have thought would be a death-blow to the old-world notion that Italian is the only language suited for vocal utterance. The truth is that Italy retained her power over the lyrical drama long after she had ceased to exert any real influence upon its progress; and if Opera is ever to be emancipated from its thraldom in England it must be by the voice of those who, throwing aside tradition, are resolved to assert the fact that half the eloquence of a composer is lost when he speaks not in the language to which his music was written. With those who allow themselves to think, it has long been known that our exclusive Italian Opera-houses at the present time occupy precisely the position that our exclusive Patent Theatres occupied in the past time. The drama was certainly to be seen at other places—of an inferior quality of course, and at correspondingly inferior prices of admission—but the stock five-act tragedies and comedies, which had been so long accepted by the public as to be given every year with almost the same cast, belonged by right to those establishments the aristocratic nature of which was made apparent to the public by the same means employed at our Italian Opera-houses, the presence of military sentries at the doors. In one respect however, monotonous as was the répertoire at these theatres, the works given were much more satisfactory than many of those performed at the Italian Opera-houses, for they were placed before us as their authors wrote them. "Hamlet," for example, was Shakespeare's "Hamlet," but "Fidelio" in its Italian dress is not Beethoven's "Fidelio;" and it is a proof how custom can sanction so glaring an absurdity that anybody can be found to accept it as such. Fashion has done much to confine lyrical art within its own narrow boundaries; but there can be little doubt that the days of Italian Opera, as we have hitherto understood it, are now numbered, for during the past season on some of the most attractive nights the attendance has been but scanty; all the novelties produced have been originally written to French words; and a prima donna whose name was at one time sufficient to fill every stall in the house has been actually in London without an engagement. Another sign of the times is the modest manner in which the operatic prospectuses have been recently issued. The lessees mean to do scarcely anything new, and they say so. This is of course as it should be, but we cannot but believe that these bald programmes of the season's doings must tell seriously upon the subscription list. All the works named "from which selections will be made" have been given season after season until the listless holders of boxes and stalls begin to think that they should like to hear something not quite so familiar between the pauses in their conversation; for even the excitement of a début, with the attendant bouquet-throwing and wearisome "callings-on," palls upon the pampered appetite by the frequency of its occurrence.

As faithful chroniclers of facts we are, however, bound to record that the usual season at both our Italian Opera-houses has been fairly satisfactory to the subscribers. Mr. Gye, who is becoming quite a veteran lessee, as a rule keeps perfect faith with his patrons, for any announcement at the Royal Italian Opera is rarely altered without a very sufficient reason. At the early part of the season the illness of several new vocalists caused such a confusion in his arrangements that it was impossible to tell, even when an Opera had been rehearsed and was ready for the stage, whether it could be done; but when he got into fair working order with a company that could be depended upon—for well-tried singers seldom disappoint the public—he sailed steadily on to the end of his voyage, keeping free from any undue excitement on his journey, and fairly earning the good opinion of those who had on so many former occasions intrusted themselves to his guidance. "Two at least" of the works named in the prospectus were promised, and two have been done; but why, considering that Madame Patti was available for the principal character, "Carmen" was not produced is one of those mysteries which we cannot attempt to unravel. Victor Massé's "Paul et Virginie," although perhaps scarcely worth the trouble of careful preparation, contains some pleasing music; and with the characteristic scenery and picturesque groupings which the story demands, may perhaps be occasionally welcomed; but Flotow's "Alma" is not only musically feeble, but destitute of any attractive quality, save the singing and acting of the principal artists, the appreciation of whose efforts in so hopeless a cause was amply manifested even by those who perfectly agreed with us in our opinion of the Opera as a work of art. With the exception of Mdlle. Cepeda, the new comers have produced but little effect, and we may probably never hear their names again. The old favourites, Madame Patti and Mdlle. Albani, have been the real attractions of the season; and both have, if possible, advanced in public favour. Madame Patti's Semiramide somewhat took the audience by surprise, for it developed this artist's powers in a walk of the art which she has scarcely before ventured upon in this country; and Mdlle. Albani, not only by her charming acting and singing as the heroine in Wagner's "Lohengrin," but as Virginia, in Massé's Opera already mentioned, has now thoroughly secured her position as one of the first artists on the lyric stage. Madame Scalchi, too, as Fides, in Meyerbeer's "Prophète," although not a Viardot Garcia, sang well and intelligently, and in other parts during the season has also been highly successful. Signor Gayarré, although a mannerist and a singer who does not grow upon us, invariably secures the good opinion of the majority, but M. Capoul has in our opinion been the tenor of the season. Both the orchestra and chorus have exhibited decided marks of improvement since last year. As Conductors, Signori Vianesi and Bevignani have been highly efficient; but the plan of dividing so important an office is a bad one.

At Her Majesty's Opera the loss of Madame Christine Nilsson and M. Faure has been seriously felt; but Mr. Mapleson has certainly done all he possibly could tosupply their places. Madame Etelka Gerster, who made a highly favourable impression last season, has materially added to her reputation; creating a marked effect, more especially as the heroines in "Lucia" and "La Sonnambula," and evidencing a decided advancement both as an actress and a singer. The engagement of Mdlle. Minnie Hauk has proved an extraordinary success; Bizet's Opera, "Carmen," affording her an opportunity of displaying her highest qualities; indeed, we have not for many years seen so excellent an assumption upon the lyric stage as this clever artist gives us of the coquettish, cold-hearted, and fascinating gipsy; and there can be little doubt, if Mdlle. Hauk continue a member of the company, that "Carmen" will be one of the most attractive works in the répertoire of next season. Little need be said of Mdlle. Mathilde Wilde, who made but a feeble impression as Valentine in "Les Huguenots;" but Mdlle. Tremelli, who had a most enthusiastic reception on her début in the small part of the Caprajo in "Dinorah," has fully established herself as one of the best of our operatic contralti. Mdlle. Eugénie Pappenheim, who made her first appearance as Valentine in "Les Huguenots," has scarcely advanced in public favour by her performance of Leonora in "Fidelio;" but with the vivid recollection of the late Mdlle. Titiens in the same part, it would be difficult indeed for any artist to establish herself as a worthy successor. Mdlle. Alwina Valleria's valuable services during the season deserve the warmest recognition. In every part she has been thoroughly efficient, and in "Carmen" especially elicited so much genuine applause by her purity of style and facile vocalisation as to make the small character of Michaela quite a feature in the Opera. Again, Mdlle. Marimon has had comparatively little to do; but she has always been well received, and always perfectly satisfied the most critical listeners both by her singing and acting. It is possible, therefore, that there may be too many prime donne in the establishment for all to have a perfectly fair hearing during the season. Madame Trebelli came somewhat late in the season, but her services have been most important; and warm commendation is due to Mdlle. Bauermeister, not only for her talent, but for her readiness on all occasions of sudden emergency. Of Signor Campanini's vocal and histrionic powers as displayed in "Carmen" we cannot speak too highly; and Signori Fancelli and Bettini have, as usual, much strengthened the tenor department, Signor Del Puente being also a valuable member of the company. We have had few novelties during the season; but the production of Bizet's "Carmen" covers a multitude of sins of omission. We are equally at a loss to know why we have not had Gounod's "Mirella," and why we have had Marchetti's "Ruy Blas" and Balfe's "Il Talismano." Certainly the public cared not for the last two Operas; but then perhaps the artists did, and we know that lessees are more ruled by their vocalists than their subscribers. Under the steady bâton of Sir Michael Costa the orchestra has always been ready and efficient; and although we could wish that both band and chorus would be occasionally more subdued, we bear willing testimony to the generally excellent manner in which the Operas have been prepared.

The Crystal Palace Concerts steadily maintain their high reputation for the rendering of instrumental music, but the choir still leaves much to be desired. As we have often said, this department ought to be placed under the sole direction of an experienced choirmaster, whose duty it should be to rehearse the works performed. It is true that compositions demanding choral executants need not be given; but the Sydenham concerts have now taken so high a place in public estimation that we should be extremely sorry to see this course pursued, especially as so enterprising a Conductor as Mr. Manns would scarcely feel satisfied in totally excluding choral music from his répertoire. During the last season many works of German writers have been given for the first time, some of which we could well have spared; but in proof that English composers are not forgotten, we may instance the performance of Mr. Ebenezer Prout's new Symphony, Professor Macfarren's "Lady of the Lake," and Mr. J. L. Hatton's sacred drama, "Hezekiah."

The Philharmonic Society seems to have had enough of "novelties" during the last season, for not only have the programmes this year been selected from works long sealed with public approval, but the morning concerts have been abolished, and the time of commencement has been restored to eight o'clock. There can of course be no reason why this Association should be pushed forward with the times, if a sufficient subscription can be secured to defray the expenses on the old principle of merely providing eight good concerts during the season; but as the conservative supporters drop off, the Directors must not be astonished if the gaps thus left should not be as readily filled up as they could wish.

The Sacred Harmonic Society has given an excellent performance of a work which, more from the character of the libretto than that of the music, has been permitted to fall almost into oblivion. We care not whether Rossini may have called "Mosè in Egitto," when it was originally produced, an Oratorio or a Biblical Opera; but certainly a composition acted upon the stage with dresses and scenery is not an Oratorio, even if the audience, as it is alleged, wore black; and assuredly the secular colouring of the incidents does not at all favour the notion. So much of the music, however, is in the master's best style that we willingly accept the work under any title which may allow of its representation by an institution pledged to the rendering of sacred compositions, and we shall cordially welcome its reappearance in the prospectus of next season. Sir Michael Costa deserves the warmest praise for the manner in which he must have worked to achieve such a highly satisfactory result; and if a little energy were shown in the production of works by living composers, the Society would more firmly enlist the sympathies of the musical world in its annual performances.

Considering that only three concerts were given this season by the Bach Choir, it is highly creditable to the members, as well as to the energetic Conductor, Mr. Otto Goldschmidt, that so many interesting works were performed. Of course Bach's Mass in B minor occupied one concert, but the same composer's "Magnificat" and "Christmas Oratorio"—with Mr. Ebenezer Prout's excellent additional accompaniments—were welcome items in the programme of a Society especially organised to place the great master's best works before an English public. Amongst the other compositions given may be mentioned Schumann's "New Year's Song" (which produced such an effect as to warrant its repetition at the following concert), Purcell's six-part Anthem, "O God, Thou hast cast us out," Brahms's "Schicksalslied," and Dr. Wesley's Anthem, "O Lord, Thou art my God," all of which were comparative novelties. The manner in which these works were rendered fully sustained the high reputation of a Choir which we trust has now grown into an institution of the country.

It seems strange that at the concerts of an amateur one of the finest orchestras ever heard in this country should have been brought together. Such, however, is the undoubted fact; for Madame Viard-Louis, of whom we before knew nothing, determined not only that she would make a name as a performer, but that she would engage the first instrumental artists to accompany her; and then, having so perfect a band at her disposal, she resolved to employ their talents in the rendering of classical works. Whether she has achieved her first object we care not here to discuss, for most music-lovers would fain deal gently with the failings of one who, on condition of occupying but a small portion of the concert herself, provides so excellent a programme. Yet, as we hear that she contemplates a more extended series of performances in the future, we venture to express a hope that she may at least take the advice of some judicious musical friends as to what she may be justified in selecting for the exhibition of her powers; for we should be sorry if anything were to prevent concerts of so excellent a character receiving all the patronage they unquestionably deserve.

The Monday Popular Concerts have been slightly shorn of their usual attraction by the absence of some of those artists annually looked forward to at these performances; but they have been well supported, and we trust, next season, will thoroughly recover the reputation they have so legitimately earned. Amongst the Choral Concerts may be mentioned those by Mr. Henry Leslie, which, although bringing forward but few novelties, were as cordially welcomed as ever; the Concerts of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society, under the able direction of Mr. Barnby, who deserves every credit for introducing Professor Macfarren's new Oratorio, "Joseph," to the London public; and the performances of the Borough of Hackney Choral Association, which, under the conductorship of Mr. Ebenezer Prout, have in a brief period become as remarkable for instrumental as for choral excellence. Herr Hermann Franke, whose Chamber Concerts at the Royal Academy of Music have been amongst the best of the season, Mr. Charles Hallé, Mr. Walter Bache, and many others have made their annual appeals with their usual success; but the number of what may be termed "benefit concerts" is sensibly diminishing, a sign let us hope that the love for entire works is replacing that for those heterogeneous scraps which made up the fasionable musical entertainments of former days.

The New Philharmonic Concerts have shown a life which cannot but give them a high claim to public patronage. Many works have been performed during the season of the greatest interest, and we shall be glad to see a continuation of that activity which alone can secure attention in the present day. It would be well, however, if the system of having two Conductors were abolished; for however efficient may be the instrumentalists engaged, it is quite impossible for them to serve two masters. A good word, too, must be said for the "Musical Union," which, under the direction of its indefatigable founder, still prospers, in spite of the old-world aristocratic air which surrounds it. A classical programme is always provided at these concerts; and we are glad to find that the majority of the surviving subscribers annually rally round a veteran artist who has so long and so successfully served them.

At the Alexandra Palace music has been an attractive feature during the season, several concerts, with well-selected programmes, having been given; but the excellent organisation of the band under Mr. Weist Hill has not been forgotten, and it will be long before the musical entertainments here will recover the prestige they obtained under the supervision of the late Conductor.

In art, as in politics, there is the tendency to promote party spirit by ranging into opposing factions those of different modes of thought; and in music it seems understood that persons who desire to hear a work as the composer did not write it, are resolved to do battle with those who, ranking both a composition and its author beyond the executant, have been opprobriously termed "purists." Whether the principal portion of the "tuition of the future" may consist of selecting a recognised work and, by carefully guarding a pupil against following the author's text, teaching him how not to play it, we cannot say; but certainly, if we may judge from much that we have heard of a certain modern style of performance, various editions of celebrated pieces patted up by German artists, and adaptations of delicate chamber compositions for huge concert-rooms, we may reasonably conclude that those who set this fashion either utterly disregard what the composer intended, or fancy that they know his meaning better than he did himself. In our summary of last year's musical season we called attention to the effect of Herr Rubinstein's eccentric performances; and we may perhaps accept it as a healthy sign that his non-appearance during the present year seems to have been scarcely noticed, although it is true that Dr. Hans von Bülow—a milder disciple of the "sensational" school—has appeared, and been received with that graceful recognition of his marvellous powers which even the "purists" must willingly accord.

We are glad to find that the vexatious questions of copyright raised by the "Copyright and Performing Right Protection Society," through the now well-known agent of the Association, Mr. Harry Wall, are at last virtually brought to an end; and, as it seems highly probable that those who hold a legal right over works will be able to see after their own interests for the future, it is to be hoped that both the Society and its energetic Secretary may be enabled to retire into that seclusion which by their exertions they have so legitimately earned.

It will be seen, in passing through our records of the principal musical events, that the present season has been unusually barren of results. We read a great deal about this being attributable to the migration of the Court during the best part of the year; but this is no place to disguise the fact that the Court has nothing whatever to do with it. Those who watch the progress of music in this country have been long aware that royalty, if it have any effect at all upon the art, rather retards than advances it. It is possible that a few extra tickets may be sold when it is advertised that Princes and Princesses will be present at a concert; but everybody knows that these royal personages generously go to be looked at, and that those who purchase seats go to look at them. True it is that, through personal influence, the "Royal Box" at the Albert Hall is occasionally graced by its legitimate occupants when the composition of an Englishman is performed; but when is the work of any British composer commanded at a "State Concert?" when are our native executants heard at Buckingham Palace? or, indeed, can a single instance be cited of a successful modern sacred work, written by one who seeks rather the appreciation of artists than the countenance of Princes, ever having been performed by request before those noble patrons of the art who in certain quarters are said to gladden by their presence, or blight by their absence, the London Musical Season? We should be glad, indeed, if these truths were taken to heart, for we cannot but believe that, if the great works in art were adequately rendered and placed before intelligent amateurs, there would be no reason for seeking aristocratic supporters. The Italian Opera may continue to represent music to the fashionable world—and the absence of a Court will no doubt have much effect upon the fortunes of the lessees of these establishments—but let us not misrepresent the truth, and cover our want of energy by complaining of want of patronage. The taste for the highest musical art in this country has been the growth of, and will continue to be nurtured by, the people. Let us strive, therefore, to strengthen the love for good works amongst those whose "patronage" is a sign of appreciation; for we may rest assured that when great names are not really useful in a cause, it is a waste of energy to endeavour to procure them for the sake of being ornamental.

BRITISH MUSICAL ART IN PARIS.

(By our Special Correspondent.)

In a recent number of the Musical Times appeared an epitome of the arrangements made for an international display of musical art in connection with the French Exhibition. I need not, therefore, tell how and why it came to pass that, on the 17th, 18th, and 20th ult., English music (and other) was performed by English artists (and other) at the Palace of the Trocadéro. Reference to the epitome in question is easy, and my present business amounts to no more than the task of describing what sort of figure our compatriots made in the French capital, and what kind of impression our music seemed to produce.

But there are one or two preliminaries to deal with and dismiss before reaching the main issue. The reader has doubtless observed the little parenthesis just above, and is curious to know its exact force. I will tell him. The music performed was not, as he rightly infers, all English music, nor were the artists engaged all English people. But why not? As to the first fact, it may be pointed out that none of the nationalities as yet represented have confined themselves to native compositions. The Italians, for example, played works by Beethoven and Berlioz; so that it was no departure from the general scheme, and no necessary confession of weakness, for our own representatives to draw upon Handel and Mendelssohn. Moreover, two out of the three programmes were exclusively English, and the proportion of foreign art in the third was not large enough to provoke the hostility of any reasonable critic. As regards the artists, my reader will have in mind the fact that when the French authorities discovered how difficult it was, in some cases, for the representatives of foreign nations to bring an orchestra, they proffered the services of the band officially connected with the Exhibition. Of this advantage, our own people, I much regret to say, were compelled to avail themselves. England might and should have sent over an orchestra—that of the Philharmonic, or the more splendid one organised by Mr. Weist Hill for Madame Louis' concerts—but as, through lukewarmness and want of enterprise she did not, it became necessary to accept the generous offer of France, or limit the display to purely vocal music. Every patriotic amateur must regret this; but, on the other hand, there is cause for rejoicing in that England escaped the great danger and deep humiliation of not being represented at all. The escape was a narrow one. But for a fortuitous combination of favourable circumstances, such as the willingness of a large number of ladies and gentlemen to make the necessary sacrifice of time, and the readiness of others to guarantee pecuniary means, our country's muse would have been silent on the Trocadéro, and our country's name made a by-word and a mocking. It is all very well to say that the representation of British musical art was unworthy. That is a matter of opinion and not of fact. Unworthy it may have been as regards its limited scope, but as far as it went it was the opposite; and none have been readier to admit this than the intelligent French critics and amateurs who attended every performance, and followed the proceedings with unflagging interest. Let us give credit, therefore, to Mr. Arthur Sullivan, our official mouthpiece with the French authorities, and to Mr. Henry Leslie, the leader of the choir engaged, for all they did, and did so well, to sustain the honour of their country. They cannot be blamed for what was left undone, nor should any sin of omission not theirs take away from the virtue of actual achievement.

The first Concert, as already intimated, took place on Wednesday, July 17, and was by far the most important of the series, for the sufficient reason that it alone combined the French orchestra and the English choir. It alone, moreover, excited a manifest interest, and brought together a host of distinguished people, including the Prince of Wales (who had travelled to Paris expressly to be present), Lord Lyons, M. Gambetta, the Duchess of Magenta, M. Halanzier, M. Lamoureux, M. Gounod, and many other notables. The large hall, however, was by no means full, the boxes especially showing a "beggarly array" of vacant chairs. Some ingenious reasons were assigned for the abstention of so large a part of the beau monde; and guesses ranged even as far as Cyprus, the occupation of that island by Great Britain having, it was thought, offended the national pride. But the real explanation lies in the fact that the great world of Paris—or, rather, the major part of it—had left the town to provincials and foreigners, and could no more than the famous bird of Sir Boyle Roche be in two places at once. Even as it was the hall had a sufficiently brilliant appearance, and moved the reporter of the Figaro to something like enthusiasm. "Never," wrote that impressionable gentlemen, "had the immense salle des fêtes contained so many people. True, it was not full, but probably we shall never see it full on any occasion. From the pit to the tribunes, on all sides, one saw the charming Englishwomen, young girls in great numbers—a collection of the most ravishing missess (sic) of which it is possible to dream. All that Paris still retains of Paris society was scattered about the boxes and the amphitheatre." But French eyes were not so pleased by what they saw upon the stage. A Frenchman, on any and every occasion of ceremony, puts himself into evening dress, no matter what the hour of the day; and the ladies of French choirs never appear save in uniform. Imagine, then, their surprise when the English singers, male and female alike, came upon the platform in ordinary walking attire, and remained there to be gazed at—another strange custom—during the whole of the Concert. With reference to this matter the Figaro said: "We remarked that nobody was in evening dress, and that the female choristers wore what pleased them without any kind of uniformity. It appears that in London the dress-coat is essentially a garment for evening use, and that never, on any account, is it put on during the day. Moreover, when the men are not in full dress the women do not make a fresh toilette. But it must be said that the executants of to-day were a little too negligent in the matter of attire." The Gaulois, on its part, was so shocked that it could not pursue the subject. It remarked: "I had almost forgotten to say that the French public experienced some surprise at seeing the female singers in walking dress, and the men in morning-coats, remain on the platform the whole time, after the fashion of artists at certain café concerts. It appears that this is the English custom. We will not discuss it." The French journalists were at full liberty to express astonishment, but saw that they ought to stop short there. Not one was illogical enough to complain that the English custom had been followed. These were English Concerts, and half their value, under the special circumstances, depended upon their being given in the English manner. The French discerned this, but not so our compatriots. Taking the remarks of the journals as censure, they made at the last Concert a feeble attempt to conciliate native taste by removing the ladies' bonnets, and putting over their shoulders a coloured scarf like that worn at the Albert Hall. The effect, even to the eye, was not happy, while it must have excited the ridicule of the very men whose observations had caused the change.

Coming to the programme of the opening Concert, I cannot do better, looking at its historic character, than give the full text:—

Ouverture, "Chevy Chace," G. A. Macfarren. Trio, "Falstaff" (W. Balfe), chanté par Misses Robertson, de Fonblanque et F. Robertson. Solo et chœur, "Viens si tu l'oses," "King Arthur," Henry Purcell. Solo par M. Barton McGuckin Concerto en Fa mineur, pour piano et orchestre (W. Sterndale Bennett), exécuté par Mme Arabella Goddard.

Motet pour double chœur, "In exitu Israël," Samuel Vesley. Fragments de l'Oratorio "Immanuel" (Henry Leslie), récitatif et quatuor par Misses Robertson et F. Robertson, MM. Barton McGuckin et Wadmore. Motet "Hosanna au fils de David," Orlando Gibbons. Scène et air de l'oratorio "The Light of the World" (Arthur Sullivan), solos par MM. Mudie-Bolingbroke et Joseph Maas.

Intermezzo pour Orchestre, "Lay of the Last Minstrel," J. F. Barnett. Part-Song. "Doucement et sans bruit," J. Barnby. Madrigal, "Ma gentille fillette" (Thomas Morley). Trio, "Maritana" (M. V. Wallace), par Miss Robertson, MM. Barton Mc Guckin et Wadmore. Ouvertura di ballo, "l'Ouverture du bal," Arthur Sullivan.

"God Save the Queen."

Of course it is easy to find fault with the selection, and to say that this, that, or the other piece was not so worthy of a hearing as this, that, or the other among the thousands excluded. Speaking for myself, there are some that I should not have chosen, and every one of my readers would be perfectly ready to say the same if asked. But the matter should be looked at from a practical point of view, and estimated not so much according to what was desirable as with reference to what was possible. Here was a choir with a spécialité for unaccompanied vocal music joined to a French orchestra wholly strange to the art it had to illustrate, and here were certain young English soloists of limited experience and by no means universal capacity. With these materials Messrs. Sullivan and Leslie had to work as best they could; and I, for one, decline to complain because the result was not that which might have been secured under happier conditions. It is easy, also, to urge that the soloists just referred to were not representative of English vocal skill. Truly they were not, nor would they themselves assert the affirmative. But here again it was a question of half a loaf or none at all—a question settled by proverbial philosophy long ago. Mr. Sullivan would have hailed with delight the co-operation of Mr. Sims Reeves and Mr. Santley, while Mr. Leslie would have rejoiced beyond measure at the advent of Madame Lemmens and Madame Patey. These artists being impossible, and others of like standing equally out of reach, for reasons not difficult to surmise, recourse was had to the young people whose names are given above. That they did not disgrace themselves or their country will fully appear, and so far was their selection justified.

The Concert began with "God save the Queen," and, as the French have no National Anthem, this prelude attracted much notice. Its performance was thus described in the Figaro: "M. Sullivan has his eye fixed upon the Prince of Wales's box—four boxes joined in one, and adorned with garlands of roses. Suddenly the door opens, His Royal Highness enters accompanied by his suite. Then the musicians make ready, the choristers rise, everybody in the Hall rises also, and the orchestra performs the English National Hymn. One must see this, one must hear the same 'God save the Queen' repeated with like ceremonial, at the close of the Concert, but executed then by instruments, voices, and organ, to comprehend the prestige of the Anthem which unites in the same sentiment the welfare of the Queen and of the country." The Gaulois remarked: "Every English fête begins and ends with 'God save the Queen,' and so did this. At the first notes of that fine composition the whole audience rose, and remained standing to the end. The custom is in a high degree worthy of respect, and I believe that the act of faith in the country as personified by its Sovereign had yesterday, in the midst of our International Exhibition, something particularly elevated and striking." The Constitutionnel also thought it "striking;" while the Paris Journal, unable to refrain from a hit at the Republicans, congratulated itself upon the fact that, after the performance, not one among the thousands present was idiot enough to call for the "Marseillaise." While I am quoting from the French journals it may not be uninteresting to reproduce some of their criticisms upon the music and its performance. I begin with the Figaro, whose representative confessed that he had to deal with the affair in its purely picturesque aspect. This was, no doubt, why as little as possible was said about the music, and as much as possible concerning the troubles of two ladies whose tickets were not quite en règle. The Figaro noticed a couple of items in the programme, "God save the Queen," which came first, and the "Domine salvam fac" from Mr. Sullivan's "Te Deum," which came last, by desire of the Prince of Wales, and in place of the same composer's "Ouvertura di Ballo." All else the lively French print ignored, as perhaps too dull for its pages. But the Paris Journal ventured upon criticism. It said, speaking of English music: "There are fine pages and charming things in that music we know so little." It said of Mr. Sullivan that he represents in England "l'école des jeunes," and styled him the Massenet of his country, and it hoped that another opportunity would be given of hearing the selections from "The Light of the World" and the Ball Overture, which are "works of incontestable merit and power." Unhappily for the critic the Ball Overture was not performed; but still more unfortunate was his confrère of the Gaulois, who actually mistook for it the "Domine salvam," and spoke of the Overture as a "noisy piece for chorus, organ, military band, and orchestra, of which I could not well make out either the idea or its development." No wonder, poor man. He was listening to a religious work and trying to discover something suggestive of dancing. But the Gaulois had a good deal else to say. It found Macfarren's Overture, "Chevy Chace," strongly Mendelssohnian by reason of its melodic form and harmonic texture, while the selections from Balfe and Wallace were "very Italian," Mr. J. F. Barnett's "Lay of the Last Minstrel" was "agreeable," Mr. Barnby's "Sweet and low" "pretty," and so on. Referring to modern English music generally, the critic wrote: "England keeps outside latter-day progress. Messrs. Sullivan and Leslie, for example, though educated and conscientious musicians, show no other desire than to tread in the steps of their predecessors. Their compositions have not enough originality. They write good trios, quartetts, and ensembles; but all want cohesion. The old oratorio, in which the composer knew no other guide than his own fancy for the introduction of choruses and airs, is to-day completely transformed. It is no longer permissible for four persons to sing that which ought to be given to a single voice, as Mr. Leslie makes them do on the words of the angel, 'Take heed, watch and pray.' There are no progressions, no happy modulations, which can revive the dead conventionalities; and I believe that English composers will do well not to ignore principles that have so fundamentally renewed the art." Referring to the performance, the same critic observed: "The chorus which Mr. Leslie directed struck me by its neatness and purity of style. These singers are trained to surmount all the contrapuntal difficulties in the works of old masters. . . . They admirably interpreted the 'In exitu' of Wesley—a work bristling with points to be taken up, with divertissements and other scholastic designs. In this respect the performance had a serious interest for musicians." The soloists were more hardly treated. "Their emission appeared to me constantly either guttural or nasal. But perhaps this was due to their pronunciation. More I do not desire to say of these artists, unless it be that they were seemingly musicians and phrased with great correctness." So much for the Gaulois; and, now, let me turn to La France. The critic of this paper, M. Henri de Lampommeraye, devoted a good deal of space to Mr. Sullivan, describing him as "a man thirty years old, of lively intelligent appearance and sympathetic aspect." "M. Arthur Sullivan," he continued, "has a talent very original, and of a special character, because strongly delighting in piquant contrast. He writes oratorios; and also comic operas, while his songs are on every piano, and there are few homes where nobody sings, 'Sleep, sleep baby' (sic) and 'Once again.'" Concerning the choir we read: "England has sent us a popular choral society know in London by the name of its founder, Henry Leslie. This society is formed, it appears, of middle-class amateurs, who voluntarily range themselves under Mr. Leslie's banners. Their ensemble is perfect; one feels that these choralists are accustomed to sing side by side; they move well together, and their chief leads them with confidence. A chorus of Purcell, a part-song of Barnby, and a madrigal of Morley, were marvellously sung, all the nuances being observed to perfection." Concerning the soloists M. de Lampommeraye was less enthusiastic, simply pointing out that they seemed less anxious to display their virtuosity than to render with care the true expression of the music in hand. M. Hostein, the critic of the Constitutionnel, entered a good deal into particulars, and avoided general remarks. The Overture of Marfarren (sic) he dismissed with four words—"Phrases short and inconsiderable;" after which he incontinently fell into a grievous error, speaking of Sir Sterndale Bennett's Concerto as having been written in 1808—before the author was born. M. Hostein, however, had discernment enough to say that the work might have been written yesterday. Again, he told his readers that S. Wesley's Motett, "In exitu Israel," was composed in 1765, and spoke of Leslie's Quartett, "Take heed, watch and pray," as being a part of it, and as, though melancholy and humble, wanting religious inspiration. On the other hand, the music from "The Light of the World" gave M. Hostein the "best opinion" of Mr. Sullivan's Oratorio; but the critic seems to have mistaken that composer's "Domine salvam" for a triumphal march. At any rate he so styled it, and fell into almost as serious a mistake as his brother of the Gaulois. M. Hostein treated the soloists impartially. In one case they sang with more correctness than fire, and in another "M. Barton" (the French journalists were shy of the tenor's patronymic) displayed a voice without sufficient character. But, per contra, Mr. Joseph Maas "charmed the public by the feeling and the pure tenor notes with which he rendered the air, 'Refrain thy voice from weeping.'" Mr. Maas, we are told, did more than this; he "accomplished a veritable wonder by making harmonious to French ears that terrible English language which is regarded as so little favourable to singing." The choir, however, was not less successful in achieving this great feat. "Equally musical," continued M. Hostein, "was that language when the chorus murmured 'Swet (sic) and low,' with which one charms to sleep an infant." Finally, M. Hostein had a word to say about Mdme. Anabella Goudard (sic), whom he described as a pianist of the first order and as deserving of the applause she received.

I have quoted these French opinions at such length not only because they gratify a natural desire to know what was thought of our representatives in Paris, but because they indicate a sincere friendliness. Any one who reads the articles must see that the writers drew upon their courtesy in order to be agreeable, for, past question, both they and the French public generally were either puzzled or bored by the character of the entertainment provided. Such music as that of Orlando Gibbons and Samuel Wesley went high over their heads, and had for them no more interest than a mathematical problem has for people who are ignorant of mathematics. Besides, the effect of the whole was too sombre and melancholy for Gallic tastes. The critic of La France felt this, and good-naturedly tried to make the best of it by saying: "The concert was very interesting for those who love to study, to compare, and to learn. I will not pretend that it was gay and lively, but it was not intended for amusement, and we, of a truth, are too much disposed in France to expect amusement in all things." A very sensible observation this of La France, but it did not occur to everybody, and more than one journal asked whether it was worth while to endure so much ennui for the sake of learning so little. Nobody, of course, is surprised at a result which was as reasonably certain beforehand as that the sun will rise to-morrow. Nor, indeed, does failure to suit French taste imply non-success as regards the main object in view. Our people crossed the Channel to exhibit English art, and this they well achieved within their means. If the French did not greatly like it, we are all at liberty to say, "So much the worse for the French."

My own remarks upon the opening Concert shall be brief, as indeed they may well be, considering how familiar the singing of Mr. Leslie's Choir is to the readers of this journal. The main point to insist upon is that English choristers were splendidly represented by the 130 voices engaged, and that the palm of European excellence was fairly challenged. I may have listened with partial ears, but the rendering of most of the unaccompanied vocal pieces, especially those requiring great delicacy and sentiment, seemed to me as near perfection as possible; and whether it was "Sweet and low" with its tenderness, or "My bonny lass" with its gaiety, nothing appeared wanting. So thought the audience, as regards these two pieces at all events, for they encored the Madrigal and applauded the Part-song with enthusiasm. The soloists, one and all, acquitted themselves with as much distinction as could have been expected, and stood in the favourable light of well-trained and agreeable, if not great, singers. Messrs. McGuckin and Maas especially commended themselves to the audience, as did Mrs. Mudie-Bolingbroke by the depth and power of her contralto, and Miss Robertson by the brightness and agility of her soprano. Concerning the French orchestra, I would speak with due regard for the fact that its members were engaged upon strange and, perhaps, unsympathetic music, under the beat of an unknown conductor. These were not favourable circumstances, and they may explain certain shortcomings, such as a want of precision and even a seeming lack of intelligence. That the orchestra is a good one, those who have heard it play French music under the familiar direction of M. Colonne all agree, but the English concert would have largely gained from the co-operation of an English band; and I must once more express regret that there was not sufficient enterprise on this side of the Channel to secure so important and even essential an advantage. With regard to our representative pianist we may indulge in any measure of self-congratulation. Madame Arabella Goddard, not being a machine, does not play always alike, but she never had happier moments than those spent on the French platform. She was "all herself" and in the best possible "form." Imagine, then, with what certainty and brilliance she played the quick movements in Sterndale Bennett's beautiful work, and with what enchanting effect the Barcarole stole from under her fingers. Nothing could have been better; and when the English amateurs present rapturously applauded their champion it was with something of the defiance shortly before expressed in Purcell's "Come, if you dare."

A word in praise of the joint Conductors, Messrs. Sullivan and Leslie, who both acquitted themselves well, and a simple mention of the fact that M. Cavaille-Coll's Trocadéro organ, in an unfinished state, was played for the first time by Mr. John C. Ward, may bring my notice of the Concert to an end.

At this point the French orchestra disappeared from the scene, but the foreign element was not entirely excluded, inasmuch as the second Concert (Thursday, July 18) comprised music of various nationalities, and the performance was assisted by Signor Randegger, who accompanied the songs of his pupils. It was known that the Prince of Wales would again be present in his flower-decked box, but neither royal example nor the satisfaction given on the previous day by the choral singing was powerful enough to attract more than a scanty audience. There was at least one reason for this entirely disconnected from indifference on the part of the public. The heat in Paris was so intense that the idea of braving the rays of the sun and then of sitting for two hours in a possibly crowded hall was more than even courage could entertain. Many a French amateur no doubt said, as he looked into the fiery street, "Le jeu n'en vaut pas la chandelle," and so stayed at home; while even those who had reached the Exhibition proper shrank from the ordeal of crossing the Seine and breasting the Trocadéro hill. It was a burning day—a day whereon to sympathise with a desire to take off one's flesh and sit in one's bones rather than put on broadcloth and mix with a crowd. So the hall had few occupants when Mr. Leslie's choristers took their places on the platform. Here is the programme of the Concert:—

1, Motet, "The Spirit also helpeth us," Bach. 2, Song, "Marguerite," Frederick H. Cowen. 3, Madrigal, "Sir Patrick Spens," R. L. de Pearsall.. 4, Trio, "L'esprit saint pur," H. Leslie. 5, Motet, "Ave Verum," avec orgue, Mozart. 6, Air, "Hâte-toi, Israël," G. F. Haendel. 7, Part-Song, "Le pays silencieux," Alf. Gaul. 8, Hymne, "Entends ma voix," Mendelssohn. 9, Glee, "Les tours couronnées," R. S. S. Stevens. 10, Madrigal, "Dans un vallon," C. Festa. 11, Trio, "Les navigateurs," A. Randegger. 12, Serenade, "A cette heure," Ciro Pinsuti. 13, Madrigal, "Flore," John Wilbye. 14, Song, "La tempête," John Hullah. 15, Madrigal, "Douces fleurs," T. A. Walmisley. 16, "Chant du Chasseur," Julius Benedict. 17, Duo de "L'Eventail," Henry Leslie. 18, Song, "Le pèlerin d'amour," Sir Henry Bishop. 19, Part-Song, "La plage de Dee," G. A. Macfarren. 20, Vielle Mélodie, "La jeune fille de Richmont Hill," James Hook (arrangé pour chœur, par Henry Leslie.)

One might really think that, before drawing up this programme, Mr. Leslie had solemnly apostrophised Melancholy:—

> Come, pensive nun, devout and pure
> Sober, steadfast, and demure,
> All in a robe of darkest grain,
> Flowing with majestic train,
> And sable stole of cypress lawn
> Over thy decent shoulders drawn.
> Come, but keep thy wonted state,
> With even step and musing gait,
> And looks commercing with the skies,
> Thy rapt soul setting in thy eyes.

But we know that Mr. Leslie did nothing of the kind. The conductor simply prepared a fair average programme—one which would have passed in London without observation. If, therefore, Melancholy marked it for its own, the result arose from the fact that our national music and our national taste incline thereto. As a representative programme it was all the better for its subdued expression, and no censure in that respect can fairly be passed upon it. About the merit of the pieces chosen little dispute will arise. Bach's Motett and Mendelssohn's Hymn are far past criticism; the examples of our deceased composers, Pearsall, Stevens, Wilbye, and Walmisley, have, in their way, become classic; while much might be said for the works contributed by Messrs. Cowen, Gaul, Leslie, Hullah, Macfarren, and Sir Julius Benedict. It is no easy matter to decide upon the claims of such a number of pieces as are in the repertory of unaccompanied vocal music; and if it must be admitted that a good deal worth hearing was left out, it must also be granted that that actually heard had some degree or other of merit. The performance was not equal in effect, mainly owing to the acoustics of the hall, which did not permit clearness in rapid passages. For this reason both "Sir Patrick Spens" and Benedict's "Hunting Song" fell somewhat flat; while, on other accounts, the two works requiring organ accompaniment made no particular impression, the choir being best heard alone. The genuine successes were these: first, Mr. Cowen's "Marguerite," in which Mrs. Mudie-Bolingbroke greatly pleased her audience; second, Mr. Gaul's "Silent Land," beautifully sung and much applauded; third, Pinsuti's "In this hour," given to absolute perfection and unanimously encored; fourth, Hullah's "Storm," well sung by Miss De Fonblanque; fifth, Leslie's "Fan" duet, which the Misses Robertson were called upon to repeat; and sixth, Bishop's "Pilgrim of Love," rendered with great energy and power of voice by Mr. Barton McGuckin. To these "The cloud-capp'd towers" might have been added but for an outburst of speech, at a most critical moment, from some one in the Prince's box, towards which everybody turned neglectful of the music. Mr. Maas's solo, "Haste, Israel, haste," accompanied on the pianoforte, was badly chosen; and Miss Robertson helped towards the comparative failure of Mendelssohn's Hymn by singing the solo in an unexpressive manner. On the whole, however, the Concert was an artistic success, and I was gratified to observe that most of the French connoisseurs present, while sitting it out to the end with unflagging interest, were liberal as well as discriminating in their applause.

The third Concert took place on Saturday, July 20, and while purely vocal, like the second, was confined to English music. Again the intense heat made exertion painful, but the managers took care that the hall, heat or no heat, should be better filled. "Paper" was made to fly all over Paris, and an unusual number of those whom our American cousins, with ingenious phraseology, term "dead-heads," braved the tropical weather in order to enjoy a gratuitous privilege. Once more the Prince of Wales was present, although the disappearence of the rose-garlands from his box led to a belief, at first, that the limit of his patronage had been reached; and, altogether, the final display of British art made up by its éclat for what was wanting in the second. I give the programme as before:—

Madrigal, "Comme Vesta descendait," Weelkes. Madrigal, "Coulez, coulez mes larmes," Benet. Part-Song, "Vous avez volé mon amour," W. Macfarren. Song, "Les trois pêcheurs," Hullah. Madrigal, "Chansons gaiement l'amour," J. Barnett. Trio, "Oh! souvenir, doux souvenir," Leslie. Part-Song, "Viens, vis près moi," S. Bennett. Song, "Voyez la gentille alouette," Bishop. Part-Song, "Ave Maria," H. Smart. Song, "L'accord perdu," Sullivan. Madrigal, "Mon amie est belle," Leslie. Part-Song, "Les cloches de la Tour St. Michel," Stewart. Song, "Cœur de chêne," Boyce. Part-Song, "Oh! dors, mon bébé," Sullivan. Irish Melody, "Le jeune ménestrel,"

Moore. Part-Song, "L'amour veille et pleure," J. G. Calcott. Old Song, "Les cerises," C. E. Horn. Song, "J'ai entendu il y a bien des années," Sullivan. Glee, "Belle est la montagne," Goss. Madrigal, "En gagnant ma triste couche," Edwards. Song, "Viens au jardin, Madeleine," Balfe. Part-Song, "Le point du jour," Reay. "God save the Queen."

It will be at once seen that—the exclusion of foreign music excepted, and with it religious works like Bach's Motett and Mendelssohn's Hymn—the third programme closely resembled the second; was open to the same objection, and capable of the same defence. I shall not again anticipate criticism, nor meet it with counter-argument. But it may be said, as bearing fully on the point at issue, that the selection given above met with very considerable approval from the audience, despite the prevalent sombreness of its tone. Whether the French amateurs were getting more accustomed to the style of the music, or whether the music itself was better suited to their tastes, matters little. Enough that the result was as I have said, and that the closing English Concert escaped the miserable conditions often represented by the dying spurt of a damp squib. It is needless to go through the programme item by item after what has been already written, and I shall do no more than put on record the general success of the performance, and indicate those features in it which most largely contributed to the result. The singing of the choir was again all that could be desired, equally in ancient and modern music. "Flow, O my tears," for example, had an exquisite rendering, as had Barnett's "Merrily wake music's measure," Bennett's "Come live with me," Smart's "Ave Maria," a perfect gem, and Sullivan's "Hush thee, my babie," which the audience encored with one voice. But on this occasion the solos and pieces for solo voices ran the choral works hard for first place. Mrs. Mudie-Bolingbroke made another "hit" with the "Three Fishers;" and Miss Fanny Robertson produced so great an impression with Sullivan's "Lost Chord" that the Prince of Wales, who arrived subsequently, demanded a second performance, the reason for which was bravely explained to the audience by Mr. Leslie in a short French speech. Mr. Barton McGuckin's "Minstrel Boy" was another feature of the Concert, as was the "Looking back" of Miss De Fonblanque, and especially the "Come into the garden, Maud," of Mr. Maas, who never sang better, and whose song, though last but one in the programme, was persistently redemanded, and had to be repeated. Thus successfully passed off the Concert; and "God save the Queen," at the first notes of which French as well as English rose to their feet, brought the display of British musical art to an end.

I need add but little to the foregoing ample details. Again I grant that England, with a little extra energy, might have made a better show; but I once more assert that, within its inevitable limits, the show was very good, and one of which we have no need to be ashamed. It is, indeed, the duty of all amateurs to thank Mr. Sullivan and Mr. Leslie for the trouble they took to secure England a representation at all. Those gentlemen, and others their associates, saved our nation from the disgrace of non-appearance, and, not only so, but enabled it to make a respectable figure. Next time perhaps the "unmusical country" will do far better, because wider awake to the fact that its character as a country really musical needs to be asserted in the face of a prejudiced and unbelieving world.

As a fitting supplement to the foregoing, it may be stated that at the International Choral Competition, which took place in the Palace of the Trocadéro, on Tuesday the 23rd ult., a jury, composed of eminent French musicians and artists, unanimously awarded the first prize to the English singers.

THE LITERATURE OF NATIONAL MUSIC.

By Carl Engel.

The reader is undoubtedly aware that the Baltic provinces of Russia are to a great extent inhabited by non-Slavonic races. The most interesting of these, musically regarded, are the Finns. A collection of their songs, entitled "Suomen Kansan Laulantoja Pianolla Soitettavia" (Helsingissa, 1849; oblong 8vo), is edited by Collan and A. Reinholm. The tunes are with a pianoforte accompaniment. Among them are some curious "Runo-songs," which are restricted to the compass of a fifth, and are noted down in 5-4 time. The book contains a representation of the "kantele," the old national musical instrument of the Finns. As the Finnish language is but little known in England, a short abstract of the contents of the instructive preface of this book may assist the student. The editors state that twenty pastoral songs of the Finns were published at Gottland, in the year 1831, and ten songs some years later, by Europaeus. A collection entitled "Kánteletar" is edited principally by Lönnrot, who is also a contributor to the present collection. The costume of the girl playing the "kantele," represented in the frontispiece of the present work, exhibits the old national dress of the Finnish women. There is also a German translation of Finnish Runo-songs, by G. H. von Schröter (Stuttgart, 1834; 8vo), which contains tunes.

Of the popular songs of the Lithuanians there are some German books which may assist the musical student unacquainted with the Lithuanian language. One of these is by L. J. Rhesa (Berlin, 1843; 8vo), and contains a German translation as well as the original words, with a number of tunes given in an appendix; the other is by G. H. F. Nesselmann (Berlin, 1853; 8vo), and likewise has tunes at the end of the volume. The songs of Lithuania are called "Dainos," and this name is also the title of the book by Rhesa.

Proceeding now to Hungary, a country which, it must be remembered, is inhabited by about half-a-dozen different races, we have to consider especially the music of the Magyars, because they are the principal and dominant race of Hungary, and it is their music which is generally meant by the term Hungarian National Music. There are several interesting collections published of the beautiful songs of the Magyars. Gabriel Mátray has especially distinguished himself as an editor of them. His "Magyar Népdalok" (Ofen, 1852; folio), and a supplement to the work (Pesth, 1858; folio), should be known to the student, and will probably be found all the more useful since a German metrical translation of the poetry is printed in juxtaposition to the original Hungarian words. There are certainly many English musicians who may be supposed to be able to read German, though probably but few who understand the Hungarian language. Gabriel Mátray is also the editor of a volume of ancient Hungarian songs, with the airs, dating from the sixteenth century, which was published at the request of the Hungarian Academy (Pesth, 1859; 4to). It contains an historical ballad, composed by Andras Farkas, in the year 1538; nineteen sacred songs, composed during the years 1538-52; a satirical song by Kristóf Ormpruzt, anno 1550; twenty-five historical and other songs, by Sebestyén Tinódi, a famous Hungarian bard, composed during the years 1541-53; and two songs made by the same bard in 1553 and 1554. The preface, written by G. Mátray, gives some account of the cultivation of music in Hungary during the sixteenth century, and especially of the musical notations as exhibited in the manuscripts of that period.

As another editor of interesting Hungarian collections of songs may be noticed Ignac Bognar (100 songs, Pesth, 1853, folio; 50 songs, Pesth, 1858, folio; &c.). J. Freichlinger, in Pesth, has published a set of Hungarian pastoral songs, with pianoforte accompaniment, under the title "Csikós dalai Zongorára." But we must not linger in Hungary, as we have still a long journey before us.

Let us next proceed to Turkey, a country in which the popular music partakes of an Oriental character, and in which musical instruments are in use which are almost identical with those of the Arabs and the Persians. No doubt in the principal towns of Turkey this is somewhat different, at least among the higher classes, whose taste has been more or less modified by the influence of European civilisation. At any rate, it is a well-known fact that the ladies in the harems at Constantinople not unfrequently have a pianoforte in their rooms, although they seldom achieve so much as to be able to play anything from notation. Some insight into the nature of their performance is afforded us by "Lyre Orientale," published in Constantinople in the year 1858. This is certainly one of the most extraordinary music-books ever printed. It contains Turkish songs, and several instrumental pieces, arranged for the pianoforte. The title-page, which is in French as well as in Turkish, informs us that they have been harmonised by Mr. G. Guatelli, "Directeur de la Musique Impériale," assisted by Messrs. Arisdaguès Hohannessian and Gabriel Eramian, two Turkish "Professeurs de Musique" in Constantinople; and the work is dedicated to "A. S. E. Nedjib Pacha, Gouverneur-général de la Musique de S.M.A. le Sultan." What strikes one at a first glance into these pianoforte arrangements is a frequent employment of a rapid repetition of the same note, a method which Thalberg has employed to obtain a sustained though trembling sound. Perhaps the Turkish professors intended to imitate by this tremulousness the admired vibrating tones of their voices; for no doubt they are singers as well as pianists.

Another very remarkable book of Turkish music was published in Vienna about the year 1835, and contains fifty-nine songs of the Mewlewi Dervishes, with a pianoforte accompaniment written by the Abbé Maximilian Stadler. The Mewlewi Dervishes, who have their name from their founder, used to perform their sacred dances in a mosque at Tophané, a suburb of Constantinople. Herr von Hussard, secretary to the Austrian Legation in Constantinople, a great lover of music, often witnessed these dances, or "zikrs," as they are called, which are executed with the musical accompaniments of singing, playing on flutes, and beating of drums; and, with care and perseverance, he succeeded in faithfully rendering the songs in our notation. Having on his return to Vienna placed the manuscript in the hands of the Abbé Stadler, well-known as a musician and as a friend of Mozart, Stadler wrote an accompaniment to the songs, contrived in his usual manner, which would probably have astonished the Dervishes, could they have heard it. At all events, however well acquainted pianoforte-players may be with the so-called "Alberti-bass" and "Murky-bass," so greatly favoured by the Abbé, to the Dervish it might very likely be puzzling. However, as the tunes are separately printed, with the original words and a German translation under them, it matters not greatly how the accompaniment is contrived. The title of the work is "Original-Chöre der Derwische Mewlewi" (Vienna: Pietro Mechetti; oblong folio). I regret that it would take too much space here to give a more detailed description of this curious book. Suffice it, for the right comprehension of the music, to point out that there is said to be a deep and mysterious signification in the sacred evolutions of those fanatics, in which a superior Dervish, seated in the centre, represents the sun, and those moving around him are stars of the planetary system. Also the words of their songs are asserted to have a deep meaning full of profound wisdom. In the German translation they appear rather bombastic and nonsensical; but it is perhaps difficult for an uninitiated European observer to fathom the depth of such Oriental lore.

As regards Greece, many collections of the popular songs of that country have been published in French or in German translations; but only a few of them contain airs in notation. Leopold Schefer has issued a supplement to the "Taschenbuch zum geselligen Vergnügen" (Leipzig, 1823; 12mo), which contains tunes of the modern Greeks; and there is an appendix of similar tunes in "Volksleben der Neugriechen," by D. H. Sanders (Mannheim; 1844, 8vo). Again, G. F. Weitzmann, in his short account of the music of the ancient Greeks (Berlin, 1855; 4to), gives forty popular melodies of the modern Greeks. Here also may attention be drawn to a little collection of new Greek songs edited by Gnéditch, a Russian gentleman (St. Petersburg, 1825). In the preface of this book are pointed out certain resemblances between the popular poetry of the modern Greeks and that of the Russians. Musicians are perhaps more interested in the ecclesiastical music of the Greek Church. On this subject a few statements shall presently be offered, since it appertains to national music properly speaking.

In Italy, the music-publisher B. Girard, of Naples, has earned the thanks of the lovers of National Music by bringing out his "Passatempi Musicali," which consists of a large set of Neapolitan and Sicilian airs of songs and dances, arranged for the pianoforte, and printed in folio. Another "Passatempi Musicali," issued by Rossi and Co., in Rome, comprises about thirty Roman tunes arranged for the pianoforte (folio). Perhaps more easily accessible to the student is "Collezione di Canzonette" &c., with a German translation of the Italian words, by G. W. Teschner (Berlin, oblong folio); or, "Alcuni Canti Populari Toscani," &c., edited by R. Lacy (London: Lonsdale; folio).

In Spain we meet with several collections of Boleros, Fandangos, and similar tunes, published by Martin in Madrid; as, for instance, "Las Castañuelas, coleccion der Bailes y Cantares Nacionales para Piano" (folio, two books). Several Spanish pianists and singers, such as M. S. Allu, Isidoro Hernandez, B. X. Miré, José Rogel, Carrafa, have had their transcriptions of, or rhapsodies on, Spanish national tunes brought out by Martin in Madrid. The Peninsular Melodies, compiled by G[eorge] L[loyd] (London, 1830; folio, two vols.), are genuine Spanish and Portuguese airs, to which poetry by English authors has been substituted for the original words.

In Portugal, F. D. Milcent has published a large volume of "modinhas," as the national songs of that country are called. This publication, which is entitled "Jornal de Modinhas com acompanhamento de Cravo" (Lisbon, folio), dates probably from the end of the last century, when the harpsichord was still in use; for cravo signifies the harpsichord or clavicymbalum, which was also called gravicymbalum; hence probably the Portuguese cravo. Twelve Modinhas with their original words and an English translation, by Madame F. M., appeared in England under the title "Lusitanian Garland" (London: Ewer and Co.; folio).

Of the Basque people, who dwell in the north of Spain and the south-west of France, a collection of songs, with the airs, entitled "Eusculdun anciña anciñaco" &c. (San Sebastian, 1828; small folio), is edited by Francisco Iztueta, and contains a preface written in Spanish. There are also dance-tunes in this publication. It is now scarce; and this is likewise the case with a description of the dances of the Basques in Guipuzcoa, written in the Basque language by Don Juan Ignacio de Iztueta, and entitled "Guipuzcoaco dantza gogoangarrien" &c. (San Sebastian, 1824; 8vo). The Basque language being entirely different from any other European language, and known but to few persons besides those whose mother-tongue it is, the musical student will find it probably advisable to consult "Le Pays Basque" by Francisque-Michel (Paris, 1867; 8vo), which contains a whole chapter on music, and also about half-a-dozen tunes in notation. Moreover, respecting the Basques dwelling on the French side of the Pyrenees, he will find the desired information in "Chants populaires du Pays Basque, paroles et musique originales, recueillis et publiées avec traduction française par J. D. J. Sallaberry" (Bayonne, 1870; royal 8vo), which contains, besides a great number of tunes, a French translation in juxtaposition to the original Basque poetry.

The French, as might be expected from their intelligence and antiquarian taste, have not neglected to investigate the popular legends, tales, and songs of their country. The object of the present survey does not demand a detailed account of the result of their researches. Suffice it to draw attention to the following publications: "Chants et Chansons populaires de la France; nouvelle édition illustrée" (Paris, 1848; royal 8vo, three vols.). "Chansons populaires des Provinces de France; notices par Champfleury; avec accompagnement de piano par J. B. Wekerlin" (Paris, 1860; royal 8vo). "Echos du Temps Passé," par J. B. Wekerlin (Paris, 1856-57; royal 8vo, two vols.). "Chants et Chansons des Provinces de l'Ouest, Poitou, Saintonge, Aunis et Angoumois, avec les airs originaux, recueillis et annotés par Jérome Bujeaud" (Niort, 1866; royal 8vo, two vols.). "Chansons et Airs populaires du Béarn, recueillis par Frédéric Rivarès" (Pau, 1844; royal 8vo). "Poésies populaires de la Lorraine; publication de la Société d'Archéologie Lorraine" (Nancy, 1854; 8vo).

The collections confined to certain districts of France, of which more could be quoted did space permit, are generally the most valuable, since they give new information gathered from personal observation, songs with the tunes written down from the lips of the people, and explanations about the dialect and usages prevailing in the district; while the collections embracing specimens of songs of a whole country are usually compiled from those works, and supply only information obtained at second-hand. In support of this statement may be cited the interesting collection of the songs of Brittany published by Hersart de la Villemarqué, under the title "Barzaz-Breiz" (Paris, 1846; 8vo, two vols). The edition here indicated is the fourth, greatly augmented, and provided with a French translation in addition to the original words. It must be remembered that the people of Brittany, or the French Bretagne, speak a language of their own, which is a Celtic dialect rather resembling the Welsh. However, the musical student, if he cares not for having the original language, may be referred to the English translation of "Barzaz-Breiz" by Tom Taylor (London, 1865; 4to), or to the German translation by Keller and Seckendorff (Tübingen, 1848; 8vo), although these reproductions contain only a small selection of the airs to be found in the comprehensive work of Villemarqué.

We must not leave France before having at least a cursory glance at the interesting French publications of songs of the olden time relating to our inquiry. The "Anthologie Françoise, ou Chansons Choisies depuis le 13e siècle jusqu'à présent" (Paris, 1765; 8vo, three vols.) deserves especial attention. Likewise "La Clef des Chansonniers, ou Recueil des Vaudevilles depuis cent ans et plus, notez et recueillis pour la première fois par J. B. C. Ballard" (Paris, 1717; sm. 8vo, two vols); and "La Clé du Caveau à l'usage de tous les Chansonniers français, des Amateurs, Auteurs, Acteurs du Vaudeville, et de tous les Amis de la Chanson; par C * * * du Caveau Moderne" (Paris, 1811; oblong 12mo). This curious book, which contains nearly nine hundred tunes, might be compared to an English publication, about a hundred years older, called "The Dancing Master." In the beginning of the present century there was still in Paris a musical and literary society, the members of which called themselves "Enfans de Caveau," because they had their meetings at a certain wine-room known as the Caveau.

Considering that the inhabitants of Switzerland consist of several races, we may expect to find with them songs in different languages. In the western cantons of Switzerland French is spoken; in Ticino, Italian; but about three-fourths of the population of Switzerland speak dialects of German, and as these constitute a large majority, it is chiefly their music to which we have to direct our attention. For this purpose may be especially recommended: "Sammlung von Schweizer-Kühreihen und Volksliedern" (Bern, 1818; oblong folio), which contains interesting introductory observations on the "Ranz de Vaches," by G. J. Kuhn and J. R. Wysz. This is the third edition of a successful publication; a fourth edition (Bern, 1826) contains, besides songs, several dance-tunes, and among these are two from the canton of Appenzell, which are given in notation for a violin, a dulcimer, and a bass, precisely as the collector heard them played by the country-people. A combination of these instruments is so rarely found in our scores that it may amuse the student to examine the pieces, which are by no means devoid of spirit and characteristic features. The "Recherches sur les Ranz des Vaches, ou sur les Chansons pastorales des Bergers de la Suisse, avec musique," by G. Tarenne (Paris, 1813; 8vo), contains a number of tunes as they are played on the alphorn in the different cantons of Switzerland. Furthermore, a noteworthy series of "Airs Suisses," with accompaniment of the guitar as well as the pianoforte, has been issued by A. Hegar in Basle.

The Germans have published more collections of national songs than any other nation. Here, again, must be borne in mind that, for the reason already stated, those collections which refer to a certain district of the country are generally the most instructive. It is rather difficult to contrive a satisfactory selection from a great number of publications, many of which are meritorious; to name them all here is out of the question, neither is it desirable. The following names of some of the editors, with an indication of the dates and the names of the places where their works appeared in print, may help to put the inquisitive student on the right track: Kretschmer und Zuccalmaglio (Berlin, 1838-40; 8vo, two vols.); Erk und Irmer (Leipzig, 1843; sm. 8vo); L. Erk, "Deutscher Liederhort" (Berlin, 1856; royal 8vo), Büsching und von der Hagen (Berlin, 1807; poetry, 12mo; music, oblong 8vo); F. Silcher (Tübingen, no date; oblong folio); Pocci, Richter und Scherer (Leipzig, no date; sm. 4to); Philipp Wackernagel "Trösteinsamkeit" (Frankfort-on-Main, 1867; 12mo); &c.

As regards particular districts of Germany, there require to be noticed: "Schlesische Volkslieder," by Hoffman von Fallersleben and E. Richter (Leipzig, 1842; 8vo). This judiciously edited collection of three hundred songs of the country-people in Silesia affords, in my opinion, a suggestive example as to how national songs ought to be published. The tunes are written down as they were gathered from the mouths of the singers, without any additions. The place where each tune was obtained is mentioned. Deviations in the tunes, or what may be called different readings, preferred in certain places, are indicated with small notes. The poetry likewise is carefully treated; and frequent references to other well-known collections—not only German, but also Scandinavian, Slavonic, French, &c., as regards certain characteristics of the songs—greatly enhance the value of the book for study. "Fränkische Volkslieder," by Franz Wilhelm Freiherrn von Ditfurth (Leipzig, 1855; 8vo, two vols.), consists of a large collection of songs, made in the part of Bavaria which constituted the ancient Franconia. The first volume contains 180 sacred songs; and the second and larger volume contains 400 secular songs. They are all noted down in two-part harmony, and the editor says that the people usually sing them in this way. "Oesterreichische Volkslieder," by Tschischka and Schottky (Pesth, 1844; sm. 8vo), is an instructive collection of the songs of the German population of Austria. In an appendix is given an account of the German dialect of the Austrian peasants, with a glossary. Likewise noteworthy are "Die Oesterreichischen Volksweisen," by Anton Ritter von Spaun (Wien, 1845; 8vo); and "Salzburgische Volkslieder," by Maria Vinzenz Süsz (Salzburg, 1865; 8vo). The last-named book possesses an additional interest from the circumstance of the tunes having been collected in and near to the birthplace of Mozart. Some of these songs may have served the great composer as his first initiatory lessons; at all events, it may be surmised, from his acute susceptibility for music, that the simple and impressive popular airs which he heard in his earliest childhood cannot have been without some influence upon his taste and development; and several melodies in his works could be pointed out which corroborate this surmise.

Songs of the Austrian province of Carinthia have been edited by Edmund Freiherr von Herbert (Klagenfurt: Edward Liegel; folio); of Styria, by Carl Fischer (Wien: Diabelli; oblong folio); of the Tyrol, by Paul Schonner (Wien: Diabelli; oblong folio). I. Moscheles is the editor of "The Tyrolese Melodies as sung by the family Rainer" (London: Willis; folio), in which may be seen examples of that peculiar kind of Tyrolese singing in falsetto which they call jodeln, and which is much more effective in their mountains than in a drawing-room.

A little book of German tunes of bygone days, entitled "Lieder und Weisen vergangener Jahrhunderte," compiled by C. F. Becker (Leipzig, 1853; sm. 4to), which is easily obtainable, will provide the musician of an antiquarian turn of mind with some interesting specimens of German popular songs, of the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries. For ascertaining the date of origin and the authorship of a certain number of German popular songs which can thus be traced, the reader may be referred to "Unsere volksthümlichen Lieder," by Hoffmann von Fallersleben (Leipzig, 1869; 8vo). The Germans published as early as in the sixteenth century collections of their national songs, such as "Ein Ausbund guter alter und neuer Liedlein," by George Forster (Nürnberg, 1539), and "Hundert und fünfzehn guter und neuer Liedlein," by Hans Ott (Nürnberg, 1544): nay, it is recorded that Charlemagne, a thousand years ago, caused the popular songs of the Germans to be collected.

The Dutch also have several old song-books of the kind, as, for instance—Camphuysen: "Stichtelijke Rymen" (Amsterdam, 1647; 4to); Starter and Vredeman: "Friesche Lust-Hof" (Amsterdam, 1621; oblong 8vo); Prins: "Medenblicker Scharre-Zoodtje" (Medenblick, 1650; sm. oblong 8vo); Valerius: "Nederlandsche Gedenck-clanck" (Haerlem, 1626; 4to), &c. As these works are now scarce, the musician interested in examining the old Netherlandish tunes may be referred to "Oude Vlaemsche Liederen," by J. F. Willems (Ghent, 1848; royal 8vo), which contains 258 songs, most of them with the airs in notation. In this work is also given a list of the various collections of Flemish and Dutch tunes which have been published, or are known to be extant in manuscript. However, a better edited work is "Chants populaires des Flamands de France, recueillis et publiés avec les mélodies originales, une traduction française, et des notes," by E. de Coussemaker (Ghent, 1856; royal 8vo). Coussemaker is so well known as a learned and discerning musical author that the student will expect, as a matter of course, to find his compilation instructive. Here may also be noticed a recent publication of some songs with their airs, historically interesting, entitled "Twaalf Geuzeliedjes uit de Geusen Liedenboecxkens van 1588 en later, met de oorspronkelijke wijzen waarop ze in den Spaanschen tijd gezongen werden; voor zang en klavier bewerkt en wortelijk toegelicht door Dr. A. D. Loman" (Amsterdam, 1872; royal 8vo).

The Walloons in Belgium speak a curious French dialect. A collection of their songs, with a supplement containing thirty-six airs in notation, is entitled "Choix de Chansons et Poésies Wallonnes, Pays de Liége, par MM. B * * * et D * * * (Liége, 1844; 8vo).

By Joseph Bennett.

No. IV.—BEETHOVEN (continued from page 325).

Once more, and for the fourth time, I ask the reader to go with me through the letters written by Beethoven in the first period of his life. My object now, however, is not a single and definite one—not the tracing of his troubles in purse or person or affections—but rather the seeking out of any opinions or incidents which, though trifling in themselves, have a more or less important bearing upon character. "Life" says the proverbial philosopher, "is made up of trifles." That may or may not be, for the proverbial philosopher, with all his assumption of wisdom, is often wrong; but we know of a truth that the smallest things may throw a flood of light upon a man's nature, just as a surpassing blaze of splendour may proceed from between the points of two insignificant bits of charcoal.

Almost the first letter of the series—that addressed to Frau von Breuning from Vienna in 1793—presents an incident worthy of note. By way of peace-offering (for it will be remembered that the two had fallen out at Bonn) the master composed and sent to the lady some Variations on "Se vuol ballare," and in a postscript he thus refers to them: "The variations are rather difficult to play, especially the shake in the coda; but do not be alarmed at this, being so contrived that you only require to play the shake, and leave out the other notes, which also occur in the violin part. I never would have written it in this way, had

I not occasionally observed that there was a certain individual in Vienna who, when I extemporised the previous evening, not unfrequently wrote down next day many of the peculiarities of my music, adopting them as his own (for instance, the Abbé Gelinek). Concluding, therefore, that some of these things would soon appear, I resolved to anticipate this. Another reason also was to puzzle some of the pianoforte teachers here, many of whom are my mortal foes; so I wished to revenge myself on them in this way, knowing that they would occasionally be asked to play the variations, when these gentlemen would not appear to much advantage."

Thus early Beethoven let it be seen—what appeared later with undisguised plainness—that he was not a man to be trifled with; that he had a strong sense of his rights, and the resolution necessary to assert them. In 1800 we find him again standing up for what was due to him, and in a somewhat curious way. A certain Frau Frank, of Vienna, organised a charity concert, and issued announcements, but without giving the names of the artists who had consented to perform. Beethoven was not going to put up with this. He wished the public to know that there were others besides Frau Frank who had feeling hearts, whereupon he sat down and addressed the "Dear Lady" as follows: "At the second announcement of our concert, you must remind your husband that the public should be made acquainted with the names of those whose talents are to contribute to its success. Such is the custom here; and, indeed, were it not so, what is there to attract a large audience, which is, after all, our chief object? Punto is not a little indignant about the omission, and I must say he has reason to be so; but even before seeing him it was my intention to have reminded you of this, for I can only explain the mistake by great haste or great forgetfulness. Be so good then, dear lady, as to attend to my hint, otherwise you will certainly expose yourself to many annoyances. Being convinced in my own mind, and by others, that I shall not be quite superfluous at this concert, I know that not only I, but also Punto, Simoni, and Galvani, will demand that the public should be apprised of our zeal for this charitable object, otherwise we shall all conclude that we are not wanted." Well done, Master. This was speaking to the point, and letting it be unmistakably known that fashionable charity-mongers were not to use musicians for their purpose, just as though they were at beck and call, without power to refuse when summoned.

A little later Beethoven is found hitting out at the critics of the Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung, who had been treating his music unmercifully. "As for the Leipzig oxen," wrote the irate composer to publisher Hofmeister, "let them talk! They certainly will make no man immortal by their prating, and as little can they deprive of immortality those whom Apollo destines to attain it." On the surface these words indicate a comfortable sort of fatalism which would keep a man serene amid tempests of obloquy. But irritation lies only a little way underneath, and it is notorious that Beethoven had more than the usual musician's allowance of sensitiveness as to what appeared in print regarding his works. But it is also certain that he had more than the usual reason for this. In moments of affected modesty he could write: "The only thing about me that resembles a genius is that my papers are never in very good order;" as a matter of fact, however, no great man ever knew his own worth better or was more prompt to vindicate it. We discover an outcome of this in an announcement made towards the close of 1802. Beethoven's publishers had issued portions of his works in a form other than the original, without stating the fact in a manner likely to guard the public against deception. Forthwith the angry composer, jealous for his music and for himself, came out with the following notice: "I owe it to the public and myself to state that the two Quintetts in C and E flat major—one of these (arranged from a symphony of mine) published by Herr Mollo in Vienna, and the other (taken from my Septett, Op. 20) by Herr Hofmeister in Leipzig—are not original Quintetts, but only versions of the aforesaid works given by the publishers. Arrangements in these days (so fruitful in arrangements) an author will find it vain to contend against; but we may at least justly demand that the fact should be mentioned on the title-page, so as neither to injure the reputation of the author nor to deceive the public. This notice is given to prevent anything of the kind in future." Then came a stroke of business deftly connected with the subject in hand: "I also beg to announce that shortly a new original Quintett in C, Op. 29, will appear at Breitkopf and Härtel's, in Leipzig." Twelve months later the watchful master issued not a "notice" but a "caution," directed against an unscrupulous fellow at Mayence, whom he styled a "piratical engraver," and who had announced an edition of his collected works. The same fierce oversight appears to have been kept, as far as possible, over the performance of his music. No tigress could have been more resentful of harm done to her cubs. In one letter, à propos to "Fidelio," the master says: "Pray try to persuade Herr von Seyfried to direct my Opera (instead of himself), as I wish on this occasion to see and hear it myself from a distance; in this way my patience will at all events not be so severely tried as when I am close enough to hear my music so bungled. I really do believe that it is done on purpose to annoy me! I will say nothing of the wind-instruments, but all pp's cresc., discresc., and all f's and ff's, may as well be struck out of my Opera, for no attention whatever is paid to them. I shall lose all pleasure in composing anything in future, if I am to hear it given thus." But Beethoven's susceptibility with regard to the performance of his works has a more amusing illustration in a letter to Zmeskall. The Scena, "Ah! perfido," was about to be performed, and the master had conceived an idea that it would have no effect if not sung on the concert-platform with some sort of stage appurtenance. So he wrote as follows: "All would go well now if we had only a curtain; without it the Aria will be a failure. I only heard this to-day from S., and it vexes me much. A curtain of any kind will do—even a bed-curtain, or merely a gauze screen, which could be instantly removed. There must be something; for the Aria is in the dramatic style, and better adapted for the stage than for effect in a concert-room. Without a curtain, or something of the sort, the Aria will be devoid of all meaning and ruined! ruined! ruined! . . . A hanging curtain!!!! or the Aria and I will both be hanged to-morrow. Farewell. I embrace you as cordially on this new year as in the old one, with or without a curtain!" When examining the master's later epistles we shall find even more forcible evidence of the respect in which, without what is usually known as conceit, Beethoven held himself and his music; but the extracts above given are proof that he never resembled the men who, after producing their works, leave them as the ostrich leaves its eggs, to the caprice of chance. He followed his compositions in their career with a loving eye, and knew how to draw his sword in their defence when need arose. That the master was not always just in this matter would appear from Mr. Thayer's recent observations upon his quarrel with Mälzl concerning the Battle Symphony; but we have no reason to believe that he wilfully did wrong. Prejudice and passion, acting upon a sensitive nature, could blind him to the right, which, however, he always believed lay before him.

We have just seen how anxious Beethoven was to obtain the credit of charitable intentions, but the letters make it very clear that he really had a feeling heart, and that the extreme susceptibility of his nature resulted in, among other things, genuine compassion for distress. Thus, when Ferdinand Ries, who was a French subject, had to leave Vienna and join Napoleon's army in 1815, his master sent him to the Princess Liechtenstein with a letter couched as follows: "Pray pardon me, illustrious princess, if the bearer of this should cause you an unpleasant surprise. Poor Ries, my scholar, is forced by this unhappy war to shoulder a musket, and must leave this in a few days, being a foreigner. He has nothing, literally nothing, and is obliged to take a long journey. . . . I recommend him to you. . . . A noble-minded man would only have recourse to such measures in the most utter extremity. Confident of this, I send the poor youth to you, in the hope of somewhat improving his circumstances." Ries, it seems, did not deliver the note, and Beethoven, who had done violence to his own pride in order to write it, was naturally angry, but the good intent remained untouched. Again, when Stoll the poet, son of the famous physician, was reduced to great straits, and wished to seek better fortune in Paris, the master wrote to a friend: "Perhaps you might succeed in doing something for a poor unfortunate young man. I allude to Herr Stoll. With many persons the question is whether a man has been ruined by his own fault, or by that of others, but this is not so with either you or me; it is sufficient that Stoll is unfortunate, and looks on a journey to Paris as his sole resource. . . . Now I request you, my dear friend, to speak to Herr v. Neumann, to arrange, if possible, that the courier shall either take Stoll gratis or for a small sum. I am persuaded that, if there is nothing particular against it, you will be glad to interest yourself in poor Stoll." It may be said that in both these cases Beethoven proposed to be generous with other people's means, but such doubtful liberality was not all he possessed. For proof let us turn to his relations with a charity conducted by some nuns at Grätz. Having been asked by a Herr Varenna to write something for a concert on behalf of this charity, Beethoven replied: "If the wish to benefit the poor were not so evident in your letter, I should have felt not a little offended by the offer of payment. From my childhood, whenever my art could be serviceable to poor suffering humanity, I have never allowed any other motive to influence me, and never required anything beyond the heartfelt gratification it always afforded me. With this you will receive an Oratorio, the performance of which occupies half an evening; also an Overture and a Fantasia with chorus. If in your benevolent institution you possess a depôt for such things, I beg you will deposit these three works there as a mark of my sympathy with the destitute; to be considered as their property, and to be given at any concerts intended for their sole benefit." In a second letter we read: "I must assure you that I shall always be disposed to show the warmest zeal in aid of your charity, and I here pledge myself to send you every year works that exist solely in manuscript, or compositions written expressly for this charitable purpose." A third time Beethoven writes: "Select whatever you choose for the concert which I hear you now intend to give, and if you decide on the Chorus and the Overture they shall be forwarded to you at once. For the future concert on behalf of the venerable Ursulines I promise you an entirely new Symphony, and perhaps also a work of some importance for voices; and, as I have now a favourable opportunity, the copying shall not cost you a farthing. My joy would be beyond all bounds if the concert were to be successful, and I could spare you all expense; at all events, take my goodwill for granted. Remember me to the admirable teachers of the children, and say to them that I shed tears of joy at the happy result of my poor goodwill, and that so far as my humble capabilities can serve them they shall always find in me the warmest sympathy." In return for his music the Ursulines sent Beethoven some "dainties," which were thus acknowledged: "I beg you will say all sorts of kind things in my name to the admirable Ursuline ladies, though I did not deserve so much gratitude; indeed it is rather for me to thank Him who enables me to render my art occasionally useful to others. When you next wish to make use of my poor abilities for the benefit of the venerable ladies, you have only to write to me. . . . I only desire and hope that you will not ascribe my anxiety to serve these venerable ladies to a certain degree of vanity or desire for fame, as this would grieve me exceedingly. If these good ladies wish to do me any service in return, I beg they will include me, with their pupils, in their prayers." As the master's benefactions to the charity continued, Varenna hinted at a substantial present in return from some person then living at Grätz. In reply, Beethoven said: "I think I can guess what you mean about a gratuity from a third person. Were I in the same position as formerly, I would at once say 'Beethoven never accepts anything where the benefit of humanity is concerned;' but, owing to my own too great benevolence, I am reduced to a low ebb, the cause of which, however, does not put me to shame, being combined with other circumstances, for which men devoid of honour and principle are alone to blame; so I do not hesitate to say that I would not refuse the contribution of the rich man to whom you allude. . . . If, however, the affair comes to nothing, pray rest assured that I shall be equally disposed to confer the same benefit as last year on my friends, the respected Ursuline ladies, and shall at all times be ready to succour the poor and needy as long as I live." The "third person" doing nothing for Beethoven, 100 florins were forwarded from the convent, greatly to the master's indignation. He wrote: "I received your letter with much pleasure, but with much displeasure the 100 florins allotted to me by our poor convent ladies. In the meantime I will apply part of this sum to pay the copyists—the surplus and the accounts for copying shall be returned. I never accept anything for such a purpose. I thought that, perhaps, the third person to whom you alluded might be the ex-King of Holland, in which case I should have had no scruples in accepting a gratuity from him, who has no doubt taken enough from the Dutch in a less legitimate way, but, as it is, I must decline (though in all friendship) any renewal of the subject." There are no more of these Grätz letters; and no more are needed to establish Beethoven's disinterested sympathy with suffering and distress. In business matters he could be hard enough, but here we see him prodigal in bestowing the fruit of his labours "without money and without price." One more proof is thus afforded of the existence, under his rough and gnarled exterior, of a tender heart and most sympathetic nature. And now let me supplement the foregoing with some lines addressed to Ries when in trouble about money: "I must reproach you for not having had recourse to me long ago. Am I not your true friend? Why did you conceal your necessities from me? No friend of m shall ever be in need as long as I have anything myself. I would have already sent you a small sum, did I not rely on Count Browne; if he fails us then apply at once to your Beethoven."

"GOD SAVE THE KING."

By William H. Cummings.

(Concluded from page 381.)

Grand Dieu, sauvez le Roy!
Grand Dieu, vengez le Roy!
Vive le Roy!
Que toujours glorieux,
Louis victorieux,
Voye ses ennemis,
Toujours soumis,
Grand Dieu, sauvez le Roy!
Vive le Roy.

The tradition (proceeds the Duchess) at St.-Cyr is that the composer Handel, during his visit to the Superior of the House, obtained leave to copy the air and words, which he submitted to George I. as his own composition. Madame de Créqui, in her "Recollections," relates the anecdote in the same manner, and adds that the words were written by Madame Briandon.

Immediately after the publication of the foregoing fabrication certain questions were published, and to this day they remain unanswered, for very evident reasons. Where are the memoirs of the Duchess of Perth? Who sold them, and who bought them?

Lully died in 1687, a year before the fictitious singing by the "noble damsels;" and as to Handel, the story is so absurd that it is almost a waste of time to consider the imputation that he stole the air. He was the most eminent composer in London when "God save the King" was produced at the theatres; his friend and amanuensis being the John Christopher Smith who testified that he believed "God save the King" was the work of Henry Carey. There is abundant evidence in print that Handel gave frequent proof of his loyalty to the royal family by the exercise of his genius. We find in the Daily Advertiser, November 28, 1743:—

Yesterday his Majesty was at the Chapel Royal, St. James's, and heard a sermon by the Rev. Dr. Thomas, when the new Te Deum and the following Anthem, both set by Mr. Handel on his Majesty's safe arrival, were perform'd before the royal family, "The King shall rejoice in thy strength, O Lord." &c.

Again, in the Daily Advertiser, September 12, 1744, we read:—

At the Green House at Windsor, this day, a grand concert, to conclude with the Coronation Anthem of "God save the King."

This doubtless meant the grand anthem composed by Handel for the Coronation of George II., 1727: "Zadock the priest and Nathan the prophet anointed Solomon King, and all the people rejoiced and said, God save the King, long live the King, may the King live for ever! Amen. Alleluja."

Later on we find Handel composing a national song with the express intention of catching the popular ear. In the General Advertiser, November 14, 1745, we see advertisements of the performance at Drury Lane Theatre of "A Chorus Song, set by Mr. Handel for the Gentlemen Volunteers of the City of London, to be sung by Mr. Lowe and others." I could easily enlarge upon Handel's loyal work as a composer, but it is not necessary here.

There have been many stanch champions on behalf of a claim that the tune of "God save the King" had a Scottish origin. Dr. Mackay, in the London Scottish Journal, August 11, 1877, has expressed his "conviction that the composition was written to give expression to the loyalty of the Jacobites, and their ...s for the restoration of James VIII. of Scotland, ...her of Prince Charles Edward." The latest ...y of these views appeared in the Times of the ...ebruary last, as follows:—

"GOD SAVE THE KING."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "TIMES."

Sir,—Like everything that is excellent, the air and original verses of "God Save the King" are both Scotch.

In an account of the Highland Society of London, drawn up at the desire of the Society by Sir John Sinclair, of Ulbster, and published in 1813, his Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex being then President of the Society, I find the following:—

"Some account of the celebrated air of 'God Save the King' and copy of the original verses to which it was sung.

"It cannot now be decisively ascertained who was the composer of this celebrated air, or whether it was of Scotch or English or German extraction. It seems indeed to have been a compilation, for a part of the air is to be found in a collection of Scotch music published at Aberdeen in the reign of William and Mary; but, to whomsoever the air may be attributed, there is every reason to believe that the original words to which that air was sung were Scotch and composed in favour of the House of Stuart. Indeed the author of this account (Sir John Sinclair) had an opportunity of copying the following verses, supposed to be the original ones, from an inscription cut in glass on an old drinking-cup still preserved at Fingask Castle, in the Carse of Gowrie, North Britain, the seat of P. Murray Threipland, Esq., whose family were distinguished by their attachment to the House of Stuart:—

"God save the King. I pray
"God bless the King. I pray
"God save the King.

"Send him victorious,*
"Happy, and glorious,
"Soon to reign over us,
"God save the King.

"God bless the Prince of Wales,
"The true-born Prince of Wales,†
"Sent us by Thee.

"Grant us one favour more,
"The King for to restore,
"As Thou hast done before
"The Familie.
"Amen.

"* 'Send him victorious' is retained in the modern version, and is evidently more applicable to the Stuart than to the Hanoverian family.

"† From this line it would appear that these verses must have been written either about the time of, or rather before, the Rebellion in 1715."

It would be interesting to get hold of a copy of the collection of Scotch music published at Aberdeen in the reign of William and Mary in which a part of the air is to be found. Also, if possible, to learn the date when these lines were inscribed on the old drinking-cup, which were copied previous to 1813 by Sir John Sinclair.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

February 25. D. Forrest.

This account of the drinking-glass appeared, word for word, in Richard Clark's book (1822), page 37, and was there given as an extract from The Gentleman's Magazine. But, of course, inscriptions on drinking-glasses are valueless unless we can positively affix a date to them. The drinking-glass may be old, but the inscription may be modern. The recent traveller who found the lines "Try Warren's Blacking" painted or cut on the sides of the Great Pyramid did not immediately come to the conclusion that it was a contemporaneous work of the Pharaohs. When we have to consider the music published at Aberdeen we deal with something tangible, and those who are desirous of seeing the book can do so at the British Museum. It is entitled, "Songs and Fancies to three, four, or five parts; both apt for Voices and Viols. With a brief Introduction to Musick, as it is taught in the Musick School of Aberdeen. Printed in Aberdeen by John Forbes. 1682." There were three editions of the book published, 1662, 1666, and 1682. But, as I have only seen the last named, I cannot affirm what music the earlier editions contained. Although printed in Scotland, it by no means follows that its contents are Scotch; indeed, the author (Forbes) says in his preface that the book contains "a considerable number of excellent choise Italian songs and English ayres." A superficial glance at the volume shows us that it includes such well-known songs as Douland's "Awake, sweet love," and Morley's "Now is the month of maying."

The music referred to as resembling "God save the King" is set to the words, "Remember, O thou man, thy time is spent," &c.; but it had previously appeared in a book published in London in 1611 under the following title: "Melismata: Musicall Phansies fitting the Court, Citie, and Countrey Humours. To 3, 4, and 5 Voyces. London: Printed by William Stansby for Thomas Adams."

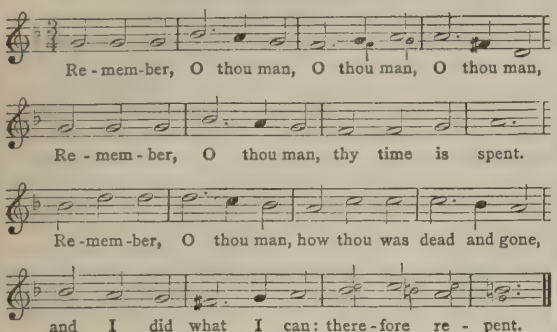
A CHRISTMAS CARROLL.



Re-mem-ber, O thou man, O thou man, O thou man,
Re-mem-ber, O thou man, thy time is spent.
Re-mem-ber, O thou man, how thou was dead and gone, and I did what I can: there-fore re-pent.

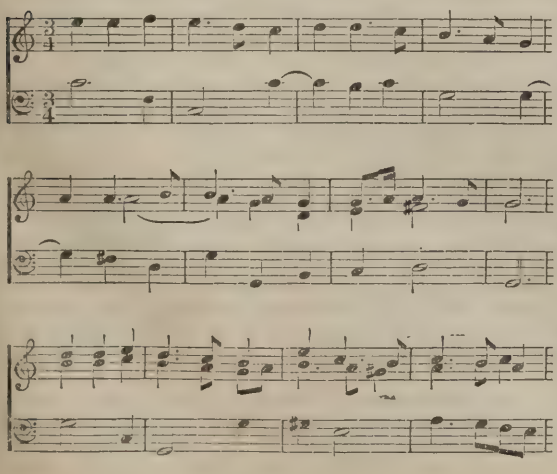
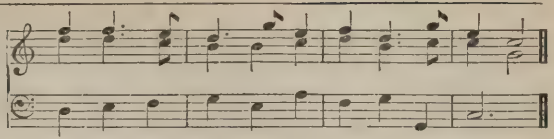
[The small notes with the tails turned down are according to the "Melismata" copy, the other reading being that found in the Aberdeen "Songs and Fancies."]

"Melismata," from which "Remember, O thou man" is extracted, was edited by Thomas Ravenscroft, and became very widely known amongst musicians. It is, however, probable that the Christmas Carol was a very old tune, and that Ravenscroft merely harmonised it in four parts. Be that as it may, Dr. Bull, at the time of the publication of "Melismata" (1611), was in the zenith of his fame, and surely had he desired to make variations to a well-known carol, such as "Remember, O thou man," he would have given the tune in its accepted form. I confess I cannot see much resemblance between Bull's "ayre" and the carol, but have no doubt the former was Bull's own original composition.

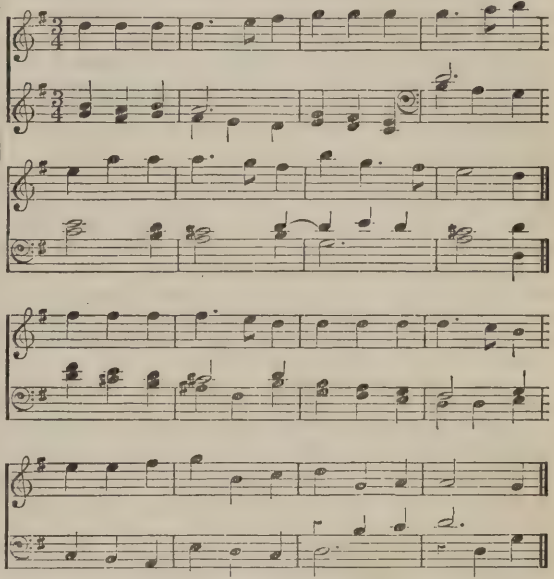
The air of "God save the King" has sometimes been claimed for Henry Purcell. "The Essex Harmony," third edition, 1786, prints it with his name attached, but there is no composer's name in the previous editions of the work. Richard Clark asserted that Purcell was acquainted with "God save the King," and endeavoured to prove it by quoting a passage from the Sonatas published by Purcell in 1683. Clark was not, however, content to leave his readers to judge fairly of the extent of the resemblance, but positively altered the notation and added bars of music and words, the original being a composition without words for viols (two violins and a bass) with "harpsecord."

LARGO FROM PURCELL'S SIXTH SONATA.





There are twenty-six bars more in a similar strain. Clark printed one other example from Purcell, and it is to be found on page 4 of "A choice Collection of Lessons for the Harpsichord or Spinnet, composed by the late Mr. Henry Purcell;" published by Frances Purcell, 1696:—



I have by no means exhausted all that might be said respecting the authorship of "God save the King;" but it will be readily seen that the airs from Ravenscroft's "Melismata" and from Purcell's works, resembling as they do in some respects the melody of our "National Anthem," are yet wanting in that most important element, rhythm. Bull's "ayre" presenting a perfect coincidence in that essential feature, induces the belief that the tune of "God save the King" must have been adapted from his music, but when and by whom we shall probably never know.

As I commenced this series of papers with an eloquent tribute to the value of our National Anthem from the pen of the great Beethoven, I cannot do better than close with a quotation from an article which appeared in a recent number of the Journal des Débats:—

It is a melancholy fact that France does not possess a song which can be really called national. In a national song the first and most indispensable element is religious sentiment. . . . As for England, we need not mention the air at the sound of which all Englishmen rise and uncover their heads, and which is played at the farthest extremities of the world.

Note.—"The Muse's Delight."—Mr. Miller (page 401) has written respecting this work, which I quoted as containing "God save the King," and published in Liverpool in 1754. I am indebted to Mr. Miller for a perusal of his copy of the book bearing the same date, and published in London. Having carefully collated the two copies, I have only discovered one variation—the title. The Liverpool copy reads thus: "And several hundred English, Irish and Scots songs;" whereas the London title reads, "and upwards of four hundred English, Irish, and Scots songs." How the same book came to be published simultaneously in London and Liverpool I am unable to suggest.

"Ouida," in her latest novel, ridicules the philistinism of people in society who go to classical concerts and complain of hearing nothing but the tuning of the fiddles, although they are told, as the lady in her novel says, that what they have been listening to is, "Op. 101st with a motive on B flat." The same authoress, however, who thus caricatures her friends, puts into the mouth of her hero this unscientific speech: "I am a countryman of the melodists," said Joris with a smile; "I plead guilty to thinking the delight of the ear the first charm of all music; you know it is a rococo opinion scorned by all modern science." Unhappily, it is not only the Italian Prince "Joris," and cultivated musical society in general, but musicians themselves, and particularly the more solemn amongst them, who repeat that absurdity about melody as distinguished from harmony "delighting the ear;" as if harmony or counterpoint did not or was not intended to delight the ear. "Modern science," so far from scorning the opinion of "Joris," would ratify his views. In these days, if we wish to express our contempt for "times," and to appear more solid and sound and prosy than our neighbours, it is unscientific to talk of "ear-tickling tunefulness;" the negative proof being in the absolute fact that the ear itself, as an apparatus, is less tolerant in harmony than in melody. A "sense of harmony" is a rare gift, and its possession is the truest indication that a man has the right organisation for musical composition. But if his symphonies and nocturnes are only "symphonies in grey and gold" and "nocturnes in blue and silver," we may be sure that he has the sense of harmony and nothing else. He will be like what Mr. Ruskin has the candour to say of himself in his youth—he will be one who takes pains in the lettering of his maps only for the pleasure of colouring them. The truth is, it is harmony which "delights the ear," and is purely a question of sensation, and of itself about as meaningless as the effects of the kaleidophone. "Ouida's" Prince was not only the countryman of "the melodists," but of harmonists, and of very good harmonists too, who made use of the same mechanism employed in "Op. 101st on B flat;" but they did not possess the native energy and force of the Germans, an energy which shows itself in music in one stroke or melodic phrase as much as in construction and harmonic combination. It is not all technical science, as the musical pedant and pedagogue would persuade us. In the Nineteenth Century of last month, Dr. Waldstein, in an article on "Pessimism in Germany"—which pessimism, by the way, he ascribes to the baneful habit of "living in flats," a doctrine that will astonish our friends of Edinburgh and Pimlico—tells us that plain German tunes no longer stimulate the imagination. Musicians, he says, have introduced Slavic melodies, the characteristics of which are "an occasional shrill discord (as of destiny)" and "a breaking off in deceptive cadences." The worthy Doctor seems to miss what he calls the old "propitiating" effects of dominants and subdominants in this all but "gipsy" music of young Germany—music, we are content to think, so exquisite, and which "Ouida" would perhaps call "scientific," forsooth, as compared with the music of Cherubini, of Sarti, and Scarlatti.

There is, perhaps, no particular reason why certain every-day occurrences should strike us as interfering with the general "fitness of things," but there can be no doubt that, in spite of the best exercise of our reasoning powers, incongruities will make themselves felt, in proof of which we may mention that we once were rooted to the spot merely to see a policeman, in full uniform, playing at cricket. Why a member of the "force" should not indulge in this pastime we cannot say; but we at once confess to sharing the general hilarity of the lookers-on at witnessing his fagging in the "field," and quietly giving up his bat when "out" without attempting to take the bowler into custody. The latest instance of this feeling of what may be termed "misappropriateness" occurred a few days ago on hearing the "Dead March" in "Saul" played at the funeral of a sweep. We were passing along a well-known thoroughfare when a procession of sooty mourners, headed by a band, stopped the road, and we were informed that a master sweep had passed away, and that the members of a Society to which he belonged were about to bury him with musical honours. Now, if the deceased had been a military man, or even a member of the Fire Brigade—all of whom are heroes in their way—we should have considered this solemn dirge most fitting for the occasion; but when we found who he was, we confess it was a shock to our nature. No doubt he was a highly respectable man, and his friends were perfectly justified in showing their appreciation of his character; but from the observations of many of the spectators, we cannot but believe that the solemnity of the occasion was sadly perilled by the very means taken to insure it. If, on the other hand—as we heard it whispered—some "amalgamated Society" of sweeps desired to make itself better known by such a demonstration, Handel's pathetic March is too sublime a composition to be dragged in for the purpose of strengthening the advertisement.

Byron, in jestingly alluding to a certain critic whom he had bribed to speak well of his new work, says, if he should deny the receipt of it,

> And smear his page with gall instead of honey,
> All I can say is—that he had the money.

Whether some of our correspondents imagine that editorial "honey" is a marketable commodity, as Byron insinuates, we know not; but certainly the communications we constantly receive strengthen us in this belief. Some time ago those who desired notices in our journal gently hinted that they were "constant subscribers," some even going so far as to order "six copies" in case a review appeared. When they found, however, that the fact of their being subscribers, and the magnificent order for half-a-dozen copies did not produce the desired result, they became bolder, and the letters which have reached us within the last two months distinctly inform us that the writers are not only much "disappointed," but perfectly "astonished," to find that their concerts and compositions have not been reviewed, considering that they have inserted and "paid for" advertisements. Without stopping to debate the question as to whether an advertisement sent to secure a notice is not as decided a bribe as if money were forwarded to the Editor, we hasten to assure those "astonished" performers and composers who write to us on the subject that reviews in the Musical Times are not in the slightest degree influenced by the advertisements. If, therefore, persons who would not dare to offer a direct "retaining fee" imagine that they can attain their object by the indirect process we have mentioned, the sooner they are dispossessed of this idea the better; and we may say not only that we shall be much obliged to them, but that they will materially consult their own interests, if they abstain from sending us such letters as we have alluded to for the future.

We can of course have no possible objection to the practice of composers giving fantastic, and even inappropriate, titles to their pieces, because if they should prevent their acceptance with the more intelligent pianists they have only themselves to blame for the result. But we do enter our earnest protest against the system of publishers taking well-known works and giving names to them which would have driven their authors to distraction. As specimens of these we need only cite Beethoven's so-called "Moonlight Sonata," Handel's "Harmonious Blacksmith," and Mendelssohn's "Bee's Wedding" (from his "Lieder ohne Worte"), and ask our readers to contrast these with Beethoven's "Les Adieux, l'absence, et le retour," Weber's "Invitation pour la Valse," or Sterndale Bennett's "Lake, Millstream, and Fountain," all of which were the composers' own titles, obviously suggested by the character of the works above named. But a more reprehensible method has lately sprung up—that of selecting subjects, or portions of subjects, from standard vocal or instrumental compositions, and publishing them as pianoforte pieces, with some sentimental name, as if in this form they had been originally written by the composers themselves. It is true that artists may know from what works these extracts are taken; but they appeal not to artists, but to those who know no better than to accept these as genuine pianoforte compositions. When a young player hears one of these "Gems for the Pianoforte" with the name of Beethoven, Mozart, or any other great composer on the title-page, it is utterly impossible that its real character can be revealed; and it is the duty therefore of all true artists not only to avoid teaching these pieces, but openly to denounce such spurious productions whenever and wherever they meet with them.

We have always been of opinion that if children must be placed under an inferior master as well as a good one in the early days of their musical instruction, it would be advisable that the good one should come first, so that the other can do but little harm. On the same principle we believe that pieces written for children by those who cannot write them for grown people lay the foundation of a frivolous taste for the art which it is extremely difficult in after-life to eradicate. From the first, thoroughly sound music—of course fitted to the mental as well as the physical capacities of the young pupil—should be taught, so that in the future there should at least be nothing to *un*learn. We have been led to make these remarks from seeing the growing tendency in the present day to publish music especially for children, as if works did not already exist excellently suited for their requirements. Songs for children and pieces for children flood the market, and now we have an Oratorio for children. Surely our object should be to train the mind to comprehend the music rather than to write music down to the comprehension of the mind. Commonplace little songs and vapid arrangements of Operatic airs should have no place even in the nursery, for our greatest composers have not thought it beneath their dignity to supply the musical wants of juvenile pupils. We have never known a child more impressed with anything than certain portions of the "Messiah." Infinitely better, then, is it to adapt children to Oratorios than to adapt Oratorios to children.

It appears from a letter written by Mr. John Hullah to Dr. Pole, a copy of which has appeared in the Academy of July 13, that the London University scheme of musical degrees, which was commented upon in the last number of the Musical Times, was protested against by Mr. Hullah while it was still under consideration, but without effect. In the course of his letter Mr. Hullah, after urging that acoustics, as a science, has really nothing to do with music as an art, adds that the scheme is not only redundant in one direction but deficient in another, in giving no place to technical skill. He says:—

> In omitting or excluding this from the number of "qualifications for a musical degree," you ignore the best qualities of the musical artist. Sentiment, expression, refinement, made manifest in touch and tone, are all to go for nothing! The business of ninety-nine musicians out of every hundred is to render or expound the works of others. You ignore every gift or accomplishment which will enable a musician to do this. The greatest executant, instrumental or vocal, the world ever heard or saw might utterly fail in your proposed examination. . . . Music is an art; and the science of music does not consist in the measurement or tuning of sounds, but in the treatment of sounds as the musician finds them and accepts them—i.e., in giving them every variety of combination, succession, repetition with a difference, and the like, of which they are susceptible.

We are glad to give further circulation to an opinion in which we so entirely concur, and to find so sound a musician as Mr. Hullah in sympathy with the views which had already been expressed in our columns.

We have on several occasions drawn attention to the advertisements of teachers who assume a title to which they have no right; but the following, from the Times, seems to inaugurate a new method of securing the attention of those who are too much outside the musical world to become acquainted with facts:—

> Holiday engagement required, for August and September, by a North German lady, Violinist; pupil of the Royal Academy under Herr Joachim. Address "Fraulein," &c., &c.

As the artist named does not teach, and never has taught, at this Institution, we cannot understand how the advertiser can style herself a "pupil of the Royal Academy under Herr Joachim." Should this meet the eye of "Fraulein," perhaps she will kindly explain.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The production of Flotow's latest Opera, "Alma," on the 9th ult., with Mdlle. Albani as the heroine, although redeeming one of the promises in the prospectus of the season, has scarcely any interest in an artistic point of view. The composer made a legitimate effect in "Martha," but he has proved his inability to write anything else; and it seems strange, after the unfavourable verdict of a Parisian audience, that "Alma" should be brought up for judgment in England. Let us hope, however, that the faint applause with which it was received at our "Royal Italian Opera" will decide the question of its merits at once and for ever; for really life is not long enough to enable us to deal seriously with such trifles, especially when the great works are lying around us neglected and almost unknown. The story of "Alma" would be commonplace enough were not Camoëns, the Portuguese poet, the principal character; for it turns upon the love of the hero for a Bayadere, or street-performer, and the adventures he meets with in protecting her from the insults of some roysterers at the Carnival, amongst whom is the King of Spain in disguise. There can be little said in favour of the music. No overture prefaces the Opera, the solos are throughout of the conventional type, and the choral pieces seem dragged in rather as necessary incumbrances than as integral portions of the work. The best music is given to Camoëns, but there are some showy pieces for Alma, the most prominent of which is a bravura in the second act, which was enthusiastically redemanded. The "Cigarette" trio, too, is tuneful and vivacious, and Mdlle. Anna di Belocca, who played the small part of Zingaretta, deserves warm praise for the manner in which she gave the characteristic music assigned to her in this piece. After the performance of a well-arranged Ballet, the music of which we believe is composed by the Conductor, Signor Vianesi, there is little to dwell upon with any degree of pleasure, the dénouement, especially, being extremely tame. Mdlle. Albani did all that could be done for the thankless part of Alma, and M. Capoul gave much effect to the few solos of which anything could be made, as the poet Camoëns. The scenery is excellent; Signor Vianesi conducted with much care and judgment, and the principal singers were, as usual, summoned before the curtain; but the doom of "Alma" is sealed, and we much doubt whether even next season it will be heard of. The principal event of the month has been the appearance of Madame Patti as the Assyrian Queen in "Semiramide." Everybody must feel assured how finely this gifted artist would sing this part; but it was a great triumph for her to create so profound an impression as an actress in a character which calls up so many reminiscences with all frequenters of the Opera. Madame Scalchi, too, as Arsace, was highly successful; and with two such able representatives in the principal characters, there can be little doubt that Rossini's once popular work will commence a new lease of life. On the 20th ult., the season closed with Verdi's "Aïda," in which Madame Patti sustained the part of the heroine.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

"Carmen," as we anticipated, has been the principal attraction during the last month; and we can only regret that it was not produced at an earlier period of the season; for certainly the revival of Balfe's "Il Talismano" and Marchetti's "Ruy Blas" can have but little interest either for the subscribers or the public. Madame Eugenie Pappenheim's essay as Leonora, in Beethoven's "Fidelio," has made but little effect; but Madame Hélène Crosmond has fully sustained her reputation both as Susanna in "Le Nozze di Figaro" and as the heroine in Gounod's "Faust." Madame Trebelli has materially strengthened the Operas with which her name has been so long associated, her singing and acting as Cherubino, in "Le Nozze di Figaro," being especially worthy of the warmest commendation. The regular season terminated on the 13th ult.; but a series of farewell performances has been since given at reduced prices.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The last Concert of the season was given on the 3rd ult., when, although no novelty was introduced, the programme was of the utmost interest. Mr. Charles Hallé's performance of Beethoven's pianoforte Concerto in G was remarkable for that mechanism of which he is so perfect a master; and Mdlle. Castellan's rendering of the "Andante and Finale" from De Beriot's seventh Violin Concerto was highly satisfactory; her want of breadth of tone being scarcely felt in the music which she selected. Mdlle. Schou's execution of the showy song from "Il Flauto Magico," "Gli angui d' inferno," was a decided success, the exceptionally high notes of her voice being perfectly in tune; but the song is not suited for a concert-room, and we should be glad, therefore, to hear more of this vocalist in another class of music. Mr. Barton McGuckin gave Handel's "Deeper and deeper still" and "Waft her, angels," with good expression, and was deservedly rewarded with warm applause. The orchestral pieces were Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony," Mendelssohn's Overture, "Isles of Fingal," and the usual "Jubilee" Overture of Weber, which, ending with our National Anthem, is always chosen to close the series of Concerts. Mr. W. G. Cusins, who conducted, was much applauded on leaving the orchestra.

PURCELL'S "DIDO AND ÆNEAS."

A recent performance of this work was advertised in the daily press to take place in the concert-room of the Royal Academy of Music. The concert-giver not content to let the Opera stand on its own merit, attempted to excite additional interest by stating that it would be the first time of performance since 1677. Several journals in commenting on the Concert accepted the statement as a fact, which speedily brought forward indignant protests from persons who had aided in other public renderings of Purcell's remarkable Opera. The concert-giver at the Royal Academy Room could not plead ignorance of the previous performances, for he was informed of the state of the case before his Concert took place; and it may be well here to record that "Dido and Æneas" was one of the stock pieces occasionally performed at the Ancient Concerts. Mr. Cummings possesses a complete set of orchestral, chorus, and solo parts of the Opera, the latter bearing the names of some of the solo singers—Mr. Dyne, Mr. Bellamy, Mr. Sale, and Mr. Hindle; a tolerably clear indication of a performance or performances about 1770-1780. Coming to more recent times we may refer to performances by the "Purcell Club," by the "Temple Choral Club," and others under the direction of Mr. E. J. Hopkins. Also to performances at Hackney under the direction of the Rev. J. C. Jackson, also one at Norwood, and another by that well-deserving body, the "Liverpool Purcell Society," in 1877. The President of this Society had an impression that the revival of "Dido and Æneas" in Liverpool was the first performance since its first rendering under the care of the composer, an error which we now correct, and also the statement that the Opera was composed in 1677. Conclusive evidence has been discovered which fixes the date at 1680.

MADAME VIARD-LOUIS'S CONCERTS.

The last of the series of Concerts was given at St. James's Hall on the 25th ult., the orchestral pieces including Mendelssohn's "Scotch Symphony," the Overture to "Tannhäuser," and a Suite by M. Massenet. M. Massenet's work, which was performed for the first time, is a striking composition, the second and third movements being perhaps the best of the four divisions, a very pleasing "Air de Ballet" being enthusiastically redemanded. Madame Louis was warmly greeted after her performance of Beethoven's Concerto in G, and Sterndale Bennett's "Rondo Piacevole;" and during the evening was presented by Mr. Weist Hill with a silver salver and basket of flowers, as a token of esteem from the Conductor and members of the orchestra. Miss Robertson was the vocalist of the evening.

During the past month a memorial has been placed in honour of the Irish composer, Michael William Balfe, in his native city, Dublin. It consists of a modest marble bust, by Thomas Farrell, R.H.A. The bust is beautifully finished, and is admitted by those who have seen Balfe to be an excellent likeness. The site on which it has been placed is a perfectly appropriate one, namely, the Irish Portrait Chamber of the National Gallery. The bust rests on a pedestal in the centre of the room, at the four corners of which are marble busts of the orators Curran and Shiel, the painter Maclise, and Dr. Murray, an esteemed prelate, who presided over the Irish Roman Catholic Church some thirty years ago. The ceremonial of formally unveiling the bust took place on Saturday afternoon, the 6th ult. Amongst those present were—Sir Bernard Burke, Sir Robert Stewart, Mus. D., Professor of Music in the University; Thomas R. Jones, President of the Royal Hibernian Academy; Thomas Farrell, R.H.A.; Mr. Henry Doyle, Director of the National Gallery; the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor; Michael Gunn, T.C.; Mr. William Gernon, barrister; Dr. Lyons, Mr. Charles E. O. Fitzgerald, Mr. W. D. Hutton, Mr. F. T. Stoney, Dr. John Dunne, Dr. Joze, and a number of ladies. In the absence of the Duke of Leinster, the chair was taken by Sir Bernard Burke, C.B., as representing the Board of Governors of the National Gallery. Eloquent speeches were made on the occasion; and Sir Robert Stewart especially dwelt upon the fact of Balfe's works penetrating into France, Italy, and Germany, at a time when foreigners held but a low estimate of the art in the country of the composer's birth. The speaker also expressed a hope that he would be enabled to place a memorial window to Balfe in St. Patrick's Cathedral.

A correspondent incloses us a copy of the programme of a Musical Service given on Ascension Day in Old Trinity Church, New York. "Old Trinity," it should be stated, is the parent church of the city, and is governed by the wealthiest corporation in the land. The principal organist and director of the choir is Mr. A. H. Messiter (an Englishman), the associate organist being Mr. Henry Carter (also an Englishman, and brother to Mr. William Carter, well known in London); and many of the gentlemen of the choir are from England, drawing their experience from the cathedrals and prominent parish churches. The church possesses two organs, the grand organ (an immense instrument) being at the west end of the nave, and the smaller one in the chancel. As will be seen by the following programme, the selection of music was most appropriate to the occasion: great organ Voluntary (played by Henry Carter), "Austrian Hymn," Koehler; Processional, "O Zion, blest city," from Hiles's "March of the Crusaders;" opening Anthem, "Great is Jehovah," Schubert; Kyrie, Credo, Sanctus, Agnus Dei, Gloria in excelsis, Gounod's "Messe de Ste. Cécile;" Offertory, third movement of Gade's Cantata, "Zion;" closing Voluntary (for great organ and full orchestra), Symphony No. 9 (in C), Schubert. On this occasion, as on other great festivals, an orchestra of forty instrumentalists, selected from the principal organisations in the city, assisted. Director of the Services, Mr. A. H. Messiter; director of the Orchestra, Mr. Henry Carter; at the grand organ, Dr. S. Austen Pearce.

The third of the Musical Festivals at the Alexandra Palace took place on June 29, Beethoven's compositions forming the first part of the programme, the second part being miscellaneous. Mdme. Lemmens-Sherrington in "Ah! perfido" and "Sweet bird" (Flute Obbligato, Mr. Hird), Madame Patey in "Creation's Hymn" and "By the sad sea waves," Mdlle. Lido in "Com' è bello," Mr. Sims Reeves in "Adelaida" and "Tom Bowling," and Mr. Thurley Beale in "Kennst du das land" and "The Raft," were all very successful, several encores being awarded, and Mr. Reeves receiving the usual enthusiastic welcome. The Choir sang "Twine ye garlands," "The calm sea," and the Processional March from "Reine de Saba;" and the Leonore Overture (No. 3), Symphony (No. 5), and the Overture "Der Freischütz" were played by the band. Mr. F. Archer conducted.

The seventy-seventh Monthly Concert of the Grosvenor Choral Society was held at the Grosvenor Hall, Buckingham Palace Road, on Friday the 19th ult. F. H. Cowen's "The Rose Maiden" formed the first part of the programme, the soloists being Miss Gertrude Hemming, Miss Kate Reed, Mr. Arthur Weston, and Mr. T. Nettleship. The second part included Leslie's Madrigal, "My love is fair," Mendelssohn's "Shepherd's Song," a Pianoforte Solo, well played by Miss Frame, and a Harp Solo by Miss Viola Trust. Miss Agnes Ross made a very successful début, being encored in both her songs. Mr. J. H. Maunder acted as accompanist. All the Choruses were given with precision and expression. In the absence of Mr. J. G. Callcott, the Concert was efficiently conducted by Mr. Henry Baker.

The Paddington Musical Society, which has been formed during the past winter, with Dr. Sangster, organist of St. Michael's, Star Street, as Conductor, gave its first Concert on the 4th ult., at Steinway Hall, Lower Seymour Street. The work selected for the occasion was "Judas Maccabæus," the performance of which was most interesting and satisfactory. The principal vocalists were Miss Anderson and Miss Beata Francis (soprani), Miss Vere (contralto), Mr. Kearton, of Westminster Abbey (tenor), and Mr. R. G. Lloyd (bass). The choruses went exceedingly well under the steady beat of Dr. Sangster. Mr. Fogg was leader of the band, and Mr. W. Stevenson Hoyte presided at the pianoforte.

Mdlle. Gabrielle Vaillant gave an excellent Concert on the 4th ult. at the Steinway Hall, assisted by the Misses Arthur and Damien and Mr. H. Seligmann as vocalists, and by several eminent instrumentalists, including Miss Frances Thomas, of the Royal Academy of Music, who is rapidly making her way as a clarinet-player. The artistic violin performance of the bénéficiaire was of course the principal attraction; and all her solos were warmly and deservedly applauded. She also took part in several concerted pieces with equal success.

An excellent entertainment was given in aid of the funds of the National Dental Hospital, at Steinway Hall, on the 9th ult., under distinguished patronage. Mr. and Miss Dietz deserved all the applause they gained in their recitations, and Misses Klugh, Taylor, and Watson (pianists), Miss Jessie Jones, Messrs. Arthur Wilkinson and Annerdale (vocalists) were also highly successful. Mr. Westropp Wilkinson was the accompanist. The hall being well filled, we trust the hospital has been a considerable gainer.

On Monday evening, the 1st ult., the members of the North London Philharmonic Society gave their first invitation Concert at the Schools of St. Anne's, Highgate Rise. The work performed was Sullivan's "Prodigal Son," followed by a selection of solos and part-songs. Mr. J. S. Bates presided at the harmonium; the Conductor, Mr. Henry J. B. Dart, taking the pianoforte part throughout.

At a meeting of the London Vocal Union, City division, held on the 6th ult. at Carter Lane, Mr. George Wells, the Conductor, presiding, a presentation of a handsome timepiece and bronze statuettes was made to Miss Fanny Henman, who, for nearly six years has acted as accompanist. Mr. Wells referred to the many services rendered by Miss Henman, and Mr. Bonney, in an eulogistic speech, made the presentation on behalf of the Choir.

Mdlle. Albani has kindly consented to give the memorial prizes and rewards of merit to the pupils of the Royal Academy of Music, in the concert-room of the institution; but unfortunately the day fixed upon—Saturday, the 27th ult.—is too late to allow of our doing more than record the fact. The plan of selecting an eminent artist to perform this ceremony is one, we think, admirably calculated to cause a spirit of emulation amongst the students.

Miss Constance Layton gave her first Morning Concert at 51, Great Cumberland Place, Hyde Park (by kind permission of Mrs. Taylor), on June 27. The principal artists were Miss Eva Layton, Mrs. Richard Blagrove, Mr. Faulkner Leigh, and Mr. Chas. Tinney. The rooms were crowded by a fashionable audience.

The death is announced at Bombay, from sunstroke, of Mr. John Locke Gray, organist of the Cathedral there. Mr. Gray, who was only thirty-five years of age, was formerly organist of Holy Trinity Church, Richmond, and Christ Church, Kensington.

We regret to announce the decease of Miss Ellen Dickson, who, under the name of "Dolores," wrote several vocal pieces which obtained much popularity in the drawing-room; a setting of "The Brook" being perhaps the best known of her many publications.

REVIEWS.

Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in C. By Eaton Faning.

Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in B flat. By George C. Martin. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

We have classed these two evening services together, because they both illustrate a new and significant phase of modern church music. Mr. Faning's service was composed for this year's festival of the Sons of the Clergy at St. Paul's Cathedral, and Mr. Martin's for the festival held in the same building in aid of the Royal School for Daughters of Officers of the Army. Many of our readers will not need to be informed that it is at present, thanks (we believe) chiefly to Dr. Stainer, the most commendable practice to accompany the music at special festivals in the Cathedral by other instruments as well as the organ. Thus Mr. Faning's service is written for full orchestra, while Mr. Martin's, written for a military festival, is appropriately accompanied by a military band. As both works lie before us only in vocal score, it is impossible to speak with certainty as to the instrumentation, especially as Mr. Faning's service has no indications of the orchestration, and the accompaniment seems in parts to have been simplified for the organ. As far as can be judged, we are inclined to think that in their original form both would be highly effective; we can at least pronounce them to be of real musical value.

Mr. Faning's "Magnificat" opens with a short symphony, which begins piano, and after a dominant pedal, crescendo, leads to a broad burst for the voices with the words "My soul doth magnify the Lord." This first subject clearly indicates the general character of the music. The composer evidently feels, and rightly, that music intended to be performed by a large mass of voices and instruments, and in such a building as St. Paul's Cathedral, should be broadly diatonic, and aim rather at massive effects than at great elaboration of detail. Hence, while chromatic chords are not entirely avoided, their employment is but rare; and bold progressions and clearly defined melodic ideas are the leading features of the work. The introduction of a soprano solo, "For behold from henceforth," which enters simultaneously with the cadence of the chorus, piano, is a happy thought, and the continuation of the phrase is well treated. Among other good points of the music may be noted the unison passages for the basses, repeated by the full chorus in harmony at the words "He hath shewed strength with his arm" and "He hath put down the mighty from their seat." We fail to see the appropriateness of the sudden piano at the words "and hath exalted the humble and meek," which appear to us to carry on the triumphant feeling of the first part of the sentence. The point of imitation at "He remembering His mercy" is well worked, and the passage "Abraham and his seed for ever," with the bass rising by semitones, is especially effective. The Gloria contains a neat fugato to "As it was in the beginning," and a good coda concludes the piece. The "Nunc dimittis" naturally offers less scope to the composer; but it is excellent music throughout, the tranquil opening in $\frac{3}{4}$ time, and the passage "To be a light to lighten the Gentiles" being especially worthy of notice. The Gloria is the same as for the "Magnificat."

Mr. Martin had a novel and, it must be added, a difficult task before him in scoring his service for military band and organ. So far as we are in a position to form an opinion from the occasional indications of the instrumentation given in the organ part, he seems to have solved the problem with great judgment. After a few bars of prelude for drums and trombones, the voices enter with a phrase quite as diatonic as Mr. Faning's, whom we are glad to see Mr. Martin resembles in breadth of style. A fortissimo passage for unaccompanied voices, "For behold from henceforth," leads to a very striking and effective modulation at "shall call me blessed," in which the chord of G flat is followed at once by the dominant seventh on C, leading to a full cadence in F major—the passage being repeated at "hath magnified me." The quartett "And his mercy is on them," accompanied by the organ only, contains some smooth and graceful part-writing, and it leads to an excellent chorus, "He hath shewed strength," at the close of which, by a slip of the pen, Mr. Martin has written consecutive octaves between extreme parts, with an effect which we certainly do not like. The following movement, though good, calls for no especial remark; the concluding Gloria is very effective. The "Nunc dimittis" presents the peculiarity, that it begins in E flat and ends in B flat—an innovation which we are hardly disposed to commend. The tonality of the first page is also rather undecided; and we confess to not liking the third syllable of the word "salvation" at the beginning of a bar, as it is given at the top of p. 13. With these slight reservations we have only praise for the music. As with Mr. Faning's service, the Gloria of the "Magnificat" is repeated for the "Nunc dimittis."

We cordially welcome both these works, not only for their intrinsic value, but as an indication of the direction which church music is taking in our own day. Both services are as far removed as possible from the "cut-and-dried" cathedral style; yet in neither is anything of a secular character to be found. There can be no possible reason why in sacred music all the resources of the art should not be used, and Messrs. Faning and Martin show us how it is possible to employ them without rendering the compositions unworthy to form part of the service of the Most High. We ought to add that neither of the works under notice present any remarkable difficulties, and that choirs of average culture will be able to do them justice, and will doubtless be glad to add them to their répertoire.

Hezekiah. A Short Oratorio. The words selected from the Book of the Prophet Isaiah. The music composed by Philip Armes, Mus. Doc., Oxon.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The performance of this work at Newcastle-upon-Tyne last year and the fact of its being included in the programme of the forthcoming Worcester Festival sufficiently prove that it has no ordinary claim to public attention. Of course a perusal of an Oratorio with merely the pianoforte score can scarcely warrant us in giving a detailed account either of its merits or demerits; but there can be no question that Dr. Armes throughout his work evidences the possession of much contrapuntal skill, and that many of his choruses are not only worthy of warm commendation as abstract music, but as effectively illustrating the varied incidents of the sacred drama. We may mention that two new choruses have been added since the Oratorio was given at Newcastle; but we reserve our notice of them—as indeed we do of the entire work—until the Worcester Festival, when no doubt every justice will be done to the composition by the soloists as well as by the band and choir. Meantime we may congratulate Dr. Armes upon the circumstance of his having shown us that a cathedral organist can labour for his art outside the limit of his daily duties.

A Dictionary of Music and Musicians (A.D. 1450-1878). By eminent writers, English and Foreign. With illustrations and woodcuts. Edited by George Grove, D.C.L. In two volumes. Part III. [Macmillan and Co.]

The notices in the third part of this Dictionary are quite equal in interest to those in the preceding parts; but none of them extend to any great length. Ample justice is done to the merits of the late Henry Chorley, who was certainly, as his biographer says, not a "genius," and therefore—although ready to acknowledge the merits of some struggling artists—utterly incapable of comprehending the claims of the composers of "the future." As an art-critic, however, he was fearless in the expression of his opinions; and for this alone he should be remembered. We have a good sketch of the life of Muzio Clementi, a laudatory criticism upon the artistic claims of Hans von Bülow, and a well-written article upon the career of Cherubini. There are many able explanations of musical instruments, too, and also of terms connected with the art. The illustrations are frequent and well executed; and in every respect the work bids fair to realise the promises made in the prospectus.

The May Queen. Composed by Sir W. Sterndale Bennett. The Accompaniments arranged for Pianoforte and Harmonium by J. Lemmens.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Sir Sterndale Bennett's Pastoral—the only approach to an operatic work left to us by this composer—needs no eulogium upon its musical merits, for scarcely any Cantata by a modern writer has obtained so universal an appreciation. As a drawing-room work—for which it is admirably fitted—it has usually been given only with pianoforte accompaniment; but so many houses now possess a harmonium, that the arrangement before us will doubtless be eagerly sought by many persons who feel the necessity of hearing those sustained wind-instrument effects which lend such a charm to accompaniments in combination with voices. But the boon of the edition for pianoforte and harmonium—which we understand is to be followed by similar arrangements of the band-parts of other great works—will be chiefly felt by Choral Societies in the habit of giving public performances of vocal compositions without an orchestra. So careful and well-considered a transcription of the score as that by the Chevalier Lemmens will be invaluable to those members of a choral body who, in spite of their reverence for an author's work, cannot afford the expense of rendering it according to the original design; and we shall be glad if the issue of this arrangement should lead to making our countryman's charming composition more widely known.

The Book of Single Chants (Ancient and Modern). Edited by Henry P. G. Brooke, late Professor of Music at Lampeter College, &c.

[Oxford: W. R. Bowden, 59, High Street.]

This is a very large and useful collection of chants. Two sets are allotted to each day of the month; one mostly by living composers, and the other by chant writers from Purcell's time up to the last generation, with now and then an Anglicanised Gregorian tone by way of variety. About one third of the book is taken up with historical and musical explanatory notes, the usefulness of which, we think, is doubtful. Psalm-singing must either be congregational or artistically musical. As a rule congregations do not join in the Psalms heartily where the choir change suddenly from ff to pp, or vice versâ; and from an artistic point of view, chanting can scarcely be satisfactory, on account of the ever-changing sentiment of the words. The jubilant Psalms will, of course, always be sung full, and the penitential ones softly and slowly; but the smaller changes had better, we think, be left in the hands of the organist. The congregation will then never be fearful of pp pitfalls, but will be able to join with confidence. The following example from the explanatory notes will give a fair idea as to the character of this part of the book:—

Psalm xiv.

This Psalm shows no strophical or other divisions, and is one continuous wail to the last verse.

God beholdeth the corruption of the nation (verses 1-3), and rebuketh it from heaven (verses 4-8); The heathen are confounded at His word (verses 9, 10); Prayer for the restitution of Israel (verse 11). MUSICAL TREATMENT.—Verses 1-3—verses 1, 2, rather loud; verse 3, very soft; verses 4-8, moderately loud; verses 9, 10, in unison; verse 11, both sides in unison, full.

Marche Solennelle. Composed for full Orchestra by Ch. Gounod.

Transcription for Pianoforte—Solo.

Transcription for Pianoforte—Duet.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THERE can be little doubt that this new March by a composer who has so legitimately earned a world-wide popularity will shortly have a hearing in its original form for a full orchestra; but meantime we accord a warm welcome to the two transcriptions named at the head of our notice, as well as to those for organ, and harmonium and pianoforte, mentioned on the title-pages. Gounod writes nothing hurriedly: inequalities may exist, and do exist, in the works of one who produces so much; but we are always struck by the earnest and artistic aim which obviously underlies every composition from his pen; and the March now before us is no exception to this rule. After some imposing bars of introduction, the leading subject is given out, simply accompanied with chords, the return of this impressive theme throughout the composition always acquiring fresh interest by the varied nature of the accompaniment. The second subject, in the subdominant, contrasts admirably with the opening melody; and the coda most effectively concludes a piece which, although simple in construction, is well worthy of the reputation of its composer. Both for the organ, and harmonium and pianoforte, this March—now published for the first time in England—should command the attention of the many amateurs of these instruments; but the two transcriptions for the pianoforte forwarded to us we can, from our own knowledge, most conscientiously recommend, not only as sound pianoforte music, but as conveying an excellent idea of the orchestral effects.

Blessed are they that dwell in Thy house. Short full Anthem. Composed by Arthur Page, F.C.O.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS is an anthem of modest pretensions but thoroughly deserving much popularity. It is of the ordinary "short and full" type, and not beyond the powers of most choirs who indulge in the luxury of anthems.

Like as the hart. Anthem for four voices. Composed by F. W. Pacey, Mus. Bac., Oxon.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

SINCE the very earliest days of musical history, the tendency of composers has been towards writing down more and more clearly their ideas respecting the speed, expression, &c., of their compositions. It is therefore with some surprise that we find a composition of five movements and fifteen pages, by a latter-day Mus. Bac., absolutely without a single mark of expression in the vocal parts. We are sorry to be unable to qualify this sad grumble by saying that the excellence of the work makes up for the other deficiencies. The music shows but little sign of invention, and not much fitness to the sentiment expressed in the words.

Blessed be the Lord God of Israel. Anthem for Advent or S. John Baptist's day. By C. Swinnerton Heap, Mus. Doc., Cantab. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS is practically a setting of the Benedictus which might be used as a "service" as well as an anthem. The treble solo to the words, "And thou, child, shall be called the prophet of the Highest," is an exceedingly smooth and agreeable piece of writing, and belongs to a high order of art. The choruses, judged from a "service" point of view, are skilfully and effectively written, and betoken the thought of a conscientious and promising artist.

Happy bygone days. Part-song. Words by George Bennett.

The Wayside well. Part-song. Words by Allingham.

Composed by Alexander S. Cooper.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

BOTH these songs are very favourable specimens of Mr. Cooper's power of writing simple part-music. "Happy bygone days" has an attractive theme, the harmony enriching, without in any part obstructing, the melody. We especially like the temporary change of key on the words "And all that once was bright and fair;" and there are many other points worthy of much commendation. A quaint effect is obtained in "The wayside well" by the tenors commencing the first two phrases alone, on the repetition of which, after the double bar, the sopranos and tenors unite in octaves.

Greek War Song. Unaccompanied part-song for male voices. Words by Lord Byron. Music by Joseph C. Bridge, B.A., Mus. Bac. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

MR. BRIDGE has set Byron's stirring words with much success, the bold harmonies materially aiding the effect of the theme, which happily sympathises with the varied feeling of the text throughout. Although the voice-parts are arranged for the pianoforte in small notes, we should recommend that the song be sung without accompaniment.

Cheerfulness. Glee for Male Voices. The words from Shakspeare's "Merchant of Venice."

How dear to me the hour. Glee for Male Voices. The words by Thomas Moore.

Composed by Ciro Pinsuti.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THESE glees—forming two numbers of the "Orpheus" (new series)—are good specimens of Signor Pinsuti's part-music. The true spirit of Shakspeare's poetry has been caught in the first of these compositions; the opening lines—"Let me play the fool, with mirth and laughter"—being set with a characteristic jollity contrasting well with the sudden alteration of feeling on the word "groans," where the dominant harmony of B major is abruptly followed by the chord of G natural, in which latter key the following phrase commences with excellent effect. An equally happy point too is the management of the snatches of laughter, which are skilfully answered by the several voice parts in descending passages, and afterwards sung in rapidly repeated semiquavers by the altos and tenors, against quavers set to the words "With mirth, with mirth," for the two basses. We may safely predict for this clever glee a lasting popularity. "How dear to me this hour" is a more quiet and purely melodious composition, the writing showing the hand of an experienced master throughout. The modulations are always natural and appropriate, and no undue sensational effects disturb the serenity of the music. A feature worth mentioning in this edition is the marking of the places where breath should be taken.

Sonata in C minor, for the Organ, by Robert Hainworth. [Weekes and Co.]

A NOTE on the title-page of this Sonata informs us that it last year gained the prize offered by the College of Organists for an original organ composition. We have therefore given it a very careful examination, and have come to the conclusion that the umpires for the College of Organists must have had a very indifferent set of compositions submitted to them. Mr. Hainworth's Sonata is by no means destitute of merit; he has ideas of his own, and a certain facility in writing; but side by side with really good phrases we find so much crudeness, and in parts such imperfect command over form, that it is impossible to give high praise to the work as a whole. In order that we may not be thought to be merely bringing vague charges against the Sonata, we will give a short account of each movement, because, with all its faults, it shows decided promise, and if the composer has his weak points indicated to him, he may know how to avoid them in future compositions, and thus succeed in producing work of much higher value.

The Sonata commences with an Allegro moderato, written in the ordinary "duplex form," with the first part repeated. Of this movement on the whole we can speak well, though the middle portion is weak, there being no thematic development worthy of the name. The Larghetto, in E flat, is decidedly the best movement of the work; the ideas are graceful, and the form clear; though we wish Mr. Hainworth had omitted the florid passages (which are only fit for the piano, and quite unsuited to the organ) on the first staves of pages 12 and 13. At the close of this interesting movement, we find a curious example of the—shall we say?—"amateurish" quality of the work. After the pause on the chord of C flat, eight bars from the end, the composer seems to lose his feeling of the rhythm altogether: anything more confused than the effect of these last bars we never met with in music. The same fault—a total want of feeling for correct rhythm—altogether spoils the third movement, an Allegretto scherzando, which is in fact a Minuet and Trio. At its commencement we find two phrases of four bars, followed by one of five, then two more of four, followed by one of three. We do not of course mean to say that everything should be capable of being cut up into equal lengths of four bars; but if this is not done there should at least be some reason for the deviation; and we trust that we are not doing Mr. Hainworth an injustice when we say that we fear he had no reason at all, but that the rhythm proved unmanageable. In the Trio, which is one of the best-written parts of the Sonata, all is perfectly regular, which inclines us to think that in the first part the composer did not trouble himself about the length of his phrases, but left them to take care of themselves. The Finale, allegro maestoso, is in our opinion the weakest part of the Sonata. In the first place, there is no distinct form about it at all; besides this the whole episode in C major (pages 21-23) is altogether unsuited to the organ. Let our readers imagine the effect of scales and arpeggios in tolerably rapid semiquaver triplets (♩=92) played (as directed) on the "Great Stopt Diapason, Fifteenth and Double," and accompanied on the Full Swell. The modulations, moreover, are at times very forced, and remind us of Mozart's well-known remark about Abbé Vogler, "He pulls in the keys by the hair of their head." We have analysed the harmony of one passage—page 20, line 2—and, with the most liberal allowance for chromatic chords, cannot make less than nine modulations in eight bars of $\frac{3}{4}$ time.

The shortcomings which we have felt it our duty to point out in this Sonata arise, we think, from two causes. First, from the want of thorough scholastic training. Of counterpoint, in the strict sense of the term, there is hardly a trace; and there is very little of that imitative writing which forms so large an ingredient of the best organ-music. We should recommend Mr. Hainworth to put himself under an experienced teacher, and to thoroughly master the technique of his art; for the power of writing well in the free style can only be acquired by obtaining perfect command over the stricter forms. The other faults we have had to find with the Sonata clearly arise from what we cannot but consider the pernicious influence of the French school of organ-music. Such passages as that in the Finale, on which we commented above, are the distinct outcome of the music of Lefébure-Wély and Batiste. Would that English writers for the organ would form their style upon German models! Adolph Hesse, Gustav Merkel, and many others who might be named are the legitimate successors of the old school of organ-playing; and though their compositions may occasionally be somewhat dry and pedantic, we consider these faults infinitely smaller and more pardonable than the flashiness and tawdriness too often characteristic of the French school.

Andante for the Organ. By H. J. Martine. [Simpson and Co.]

We are sorry to be unable to discover Mr. H. J. Martine's reasons for publishing this composition. It contains, considering its length, a remarkable collection of consecutive fifths, and the notation occasionally is more than questionable.

New Gradus ad Parnassum. One hundred Studies for the Pianoforte. Selected, the fingering supplemented, and revised by E. Pauer. [Augener and Co.]

Herr Pauer has done well to commence his preface to this work by acknowledging the value of Clementi's "Gradus ad Parnassum;" for assuredly many pianists who have attained a thorough mastery over the keyboard owe very much of their purely technical proficiency to a careful study of the admirable exercises contained in this volume. Since the first appearance of Clementi's great Pianoforte School, however, sixty years have elapsed; and although the advance has been so gradual that the term "higher development" is really no more applicable in the present day than at any other period from the time of Emanuel Bach, there can be no doubt that, as Herr Pauer says, "technical execution has made immense progress. Many passages or figures of which we recognise merely a germ in Clementi's compositions, have grown to large dimensions; the richer-toned modern pianos have suggested a variety of effects which Clementi could not have foreseen; the wider compass of the instrument invited 'gymnastic evolutions,' as Beethoven already used to call the technical feats for which the keyboard at Clementi's time scarcely offered room enough." This is scarcely the place to discuss whether this invitation to what Beethoven called a display of "gymnastic evolutions" has not been somewhat too freely accepted, and that a race of what the same authority contemptuously termed "passage-players" has not been thus created: suffice it to say that the compiler of this "New Gradus ad Parnassum," accepting the fact that more modern exercises are now imperatively called for, has worthily accomplished the task of supplying this want, and in eleven volumes has furnished the pianist with studies containing every executive difficulty, selected (with the exception of two by Herr Pauer) from the works of the most accredited pianoforte writers, and including many by composers comparatively unknown. We hardly agree with Herr Pauer's almost total exclusion of the studies of Moscheles, Sterndale Bennett, Herz, Bertini, and several others, on the ground of their having "a place in the musical library of every industrious student," for certainly the same objection might apply to the names of many admitted into the volume—such, for example, as Chopin; yet we are bound to say that in every case the exercises have been most judiciously chosen. The work is divided into separate "Schools," each one devoted exclusively to studies for the cultivation of a particular touch, or for the practice of a special difficulty. These parts are lettered from A to L, and thus arranged: A. Scales and Velocity; B. Studies in Thirds and Sixths; C. School of the Shake; D. School of the Arpeggio; E. Wrist Studies; F. School of Octaves; G. Studies in Chords; H. Extensions in Arpeggio-chords; J. School of the Staccato; K. School of the Legato; L. School for the Left hand. Some of these sections contain as many as fifteen exercises, and others only three, but all are happily selected as illustrations; and the care with which every passage requiring such aid is fingered adds materially to the value of the studies. Teachers and students owe a deep debt of gratitude to Herr Pauer for the excellent manner in which he has collected and arranged his materials; and there can be no doubt that the "New Gradus ad Parnassum" will meet with all the recognition it deserves.

Rondo Grazioso, for the Pianoforte. Composed by J. Baptiste Calkin. [Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

The graceful models of pianoforte music for the drawing-room written by Sterndale Bennett at a time when brilliant operatic fantasias almost exclusively occupied the attention of amateurs, have exercised a most beneficial effect upon the art; for not only are they intrinsically so good as to have lived down the neglect with which they were at first treated, but they have given an impetus to other composers to add to the stock of such pieces as the demand for them increased. How many "Rondo Piacevoles," under various titles, are constantly appearing; and even the same composer's charming little sketch, "Pas triste, pas gai," has given rise to several—perhaps unconscious—imitations, which, although inferior to the original, may be conscientiously recommended both for practice and performance. Mr. Calkin always writes like an artist; and despite the fact of his "Rondo Grazioso" reminding us in many parts of Sterndale Bennett—especially of his Rondo already referred to—we accept it with pleasure as a wholesome contribution to the amateur's portfolio. The melodious opening subject, given according to the conventional style, with accompanying arpeggios for the same hand, contrasts effectively with the second theme; and the passages, which flow naturally from the general design, although demanding careful practice, lie well under the hand.

Edith. Joyous Moments, No. 1. Composed by James Robinson. [Alphonse Bertini and Co.]

We confess to have been somewhat puzzled with the title of this piece, until we found on the title-page that the same composer had published a series of "Joyous Moments," one being called "Magnolia," another "An Evening Song," and a third "Scandinavia." We are glad to find that Mr. Robinson can always write in so happy a mood—for most musicians have their hours of thoughtfulness, which are indelibly stamped upon their works—but even presuming that there is anything particularly "joyous" in an expressive legato melody, with accompanying arpeggios divided between the two hands, we should be glad to have this feeling expressed in less conventional language. In truth, we are perfectly weary of this pattern, which has years ago been worn threadbare, and pant for a bar of healthy music as a prisoner long confined in a dark cell pants for a breath of fresh air. We do not wish to diminish the composer's "Joyous Moments," but care not to share them with him until he has something new to say.

Gavotte des Bergères. Pour le Piano, par Cleveland Wigan. [Goddard and Co.]

There is a sufficiently pastoral character about this Gavotte to justify its title; and moreover, it is tuneful and vivacious enough to insure its welcome under the fingers of one who can throw the requisite amount of life into the notes. Apart from the attraction of these old dances in a musical point of view, there is much to be said in their favour as pieces for students. Modern school-music has so much fostered the idea of the left hand being a mere attendant upon the right that it is quite time a protest were entered against it; and Gavottes, as good as this by Mr. Wigan, should be encouraged by all who wish well to the cause.

FOREIGN NOTES.

The hundredth anniversary of the foundation of the Munich Hof-Theater is to be celebrated in October next in a manner befitting the great artistic traditions of that institution.

Herr Richard Wagner's new music-drama entitled "Parsifal," the "poetic basis" of which has already been the subject of a review in this journal, has, according to the Neue Berliner Musik Zeitung, just been completed. It is said that Herr Jäger, of the Stadt-Theater at Hamburg, has been intrusted by the poet-composer with the rôle of the hero, and is at present engaged upon the study of his part under the master's supervision at Bayreuth.

The praiseworthy activity displayed by the Hamburg Stadt-Theater under the direction of Herr Pollini, may be instanced by the fact that during the period from August, 1877, to June of the present year no fewer than ten new operatic works have been presented by that institution. A complete cyclus of Herr Wagner's operas, commencing with "Rienzi" and to conclude with "Götterdämmerung," has been foreshadowed by the energetic management for the coming season.

The centenary of the birth of the organist and composer Hans Gänsbacher, the friend and fellow-pupil, under the Abbé Vogler, of Carl Maria von Weber and Meyerbeer, was commemorated last month by a music-festival held at Sterzing in the Tyrol, where he was born. The performances, which consisted exclusively of works by the deceased composer, were chiefly sustained by the Innsbruck Musik-Verein. Gänsbacher died in 1844, as Dome-Capellmeister, in Vienna.

Dr. Ferdinand Hiller has been elected a corresponding member of the Société des Compositeurs de Musique of Paris.

The preparations for the performance during next season of the entire tetralogy "Der Ring des Nibelungen" are actively carried on at the Leipzig Stadt-Theater with the co-operation of Capellmeister Seidel, of Bayreuth. The work is likewise to be taken in hand shortly on the Cologne stage.

The widow of the composer Franz von Holstein has, in memory of her late husband, founded a domicile at Leipzig for the accomodation of six young artists pursuing their studies at the Conservatorium of that town.

Madame Adelina Patti will give a series of representations at the Kroll'sche Theater at Berlin during next October.

At the gala-dinner, given at the White Hall of the Royal Palace at Berlin, on the occasion of the inauguration of the European Congress, the music performed by the band of the Imperial Guards included the following numbers, viz.: Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis" (Gluck); Introduction and Bridal Chorus from "Lohengrin;" Symphony in G major (Haydn); two Hungarian Dances (Brahms); and Haydn's Serenade.

The Frankfort Stadt-Theater was completely destroyed by fire last month, the library and costumes only having been rescued from the fury of the flames.

The performances of the Imperial Opera of Vienna came to a close on the 1st. ult., and will probably be resumed in October next, with the production of Herr Wagner's "Siegfried," that work having been for some time in course of preparation.

Not the least interesting among the musical relics just now exhibited in connection with the Paris International Exposition is the original score of Mozart's "Don Giovanni," of which Madame Pauline Viardot is the fortunate possessor.

M. Eugene Deloplanche, the sculptor, has been awarded a gold medal of the value of 4,000 francs, for his statue representing "La Musique."

Messrs. John Brinsmead and Son's well-known "Gold Medal Pianos" occupy a conspicuous position in the instrumental section of the Paris Exhibition, where the special qualities of the instruments are being displayed in afternoon performances given by eminent pianists, including the Chevalier de Kontsky, M. Tamplin, Mdlle. de Pierpont, and Madame Detournelle-Dessirier.

Among the musical remains of Rossini a number of unpublished compositions, vocal and instrumental, have been discovered, the great majority of which were probably never intended for publication by their author. These include nearly seventy pieces for the pianoforte, all of them bearing titles such as "Prélude rococo," "Bolero tartare," "Spécimen de l'ancien régime," "Spécimen de mon temps," "Valse antidansante," "Prélude hygiénique," "Prélude baroque," "Prélude convulsif," &c. As musical curiosities may be quoted "Six préludes sur la gamme chinoise" (the Chinese scale), "Echantillon mélodique sur les noires de la main droite," "Une caresse à ma femme," "Un mot à Paganini" (for violin and pianoforte), &c. The collection also includes a Requiem for contralto and a vocal composition on the death of Meyerbeer.

Popular Concerts have been instituted at Turin under the direction of Signor Mancinelli. The Società Musicale Romana has recently given an interesting concert performance of Mercadante's Opera "La Vestale," under the bâton of a young amateur, the Marchese Teodoli. At the Theatre Goldini, at Venice, the first performance of an Opera by Fernando Caballero, entitled "La Marseillaise," has met with a good reception. The production at Seville of Meyerbeer's "L'Africaine," in which Signor Tamberlik took part, is said to have achieved an almost unprecedented success.

An interesting volume from the pen of Giovanni Trojo has just been published at Milan, entitled "Muzio Clementi, la sua vida, le sue opere, e sua influenza sul progresso dell' arte."

We have to record the death, which occurred at Paderborn in June last, of Otto Gerke, a composer of merit, and universally esteemed in Germany. He was born in the year 1807, and had been a pupil of Spohr and Hauptmann.

The death is also announced in German papers of Anton Deprosse, the gifted writer of Lieder and the composer of an Oratorio, "Die Salbung David's." He was only forty years of age.

At Paris, died, on the 2nd ult., J. Bazin, for years a professor at the Conservatoire, and member of the Institute de France.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE TENOR CLEF.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—I notice in the June issue of the Musical Times a letter from Mr. F. Whitaker advocating the use of the tenor clef on the third space, thus making the letters of the lines and spaces agree with those of the G clef and still preserve the true position of the tenor part.

Permit me to remark that this custom has prevailed to a large extent in this country for some years past, and many of the publications of the houses of Oliver Ditson and Co., G. D. Russell and Co., of Boston, and John Church and Co., of Cincinnati, have the tenor clef so printed. Tenor singers have found the plan to work well, and it is growing in favour with publishers.—Truly yours,

Alfreton Hervey.

Newark, N.J., U.S. of America, June 22, 1878.

LONDON UNIVERSITY MUSICAL DEGREES.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—The essay of your correspondent, Mr. Statham, upon the recently published regulations for musical degrees at the University of London is an interesting paper. Into many of the questions raised by Mr. Statham I do not propose here to enter; but, whether the London University has or has not in elevating its curriculum so much, as you say, "overshot the mark," two things at least are certain: (1) Professional musicians as a body have hitherto been deficient in knowledge outside their own profession; and (2) Associating as they do with the high-born, the wealthy, and the educated classes, they are, by the want of general culture, placed at a disadvantage both as regards themselves and the art they profess. Indeed, this has been so well expressed in your paper that I cannot do better than quote the words in page 378 of the last number of the Musical Times: "There is nothing more required in the musical profession, or which would tend more to elevate it in social estimation, than a higher standard of general culture than at present for the most part exists within its ranks." And in a few sentences further the writer proceeds to advocate "a matriculation examination such as would insure that the candidate had received a fair liberal education."

Now, these are two admirable paragraphs, and had the writer gone on to state that precisely what he advocated, and which existed at no university twenty years ago, was introduced (solely at my instance) into the Dublin curriculum in 1861, this letter would have been unnecessary. I cannot understand why Mr. Statham, who seems so well made up on these matters, should be unacquainted with so important a phase of the question; or why, knowing it, he should ignore what has been admitted by all graduated musicians, from the eminent professors at Oxford and Cambridge downwards. I, however, think it due to the honour and status of the ancient foundation of Queen Elizabeth to inform the readers of your excellent periodical once for all that, as in the admission of Dissenters and Roman Catholics to university privileges, so in the literary education of her musical graduates, the University of Dublin has led the way, and been even in advance of her distinguished sisters of Cam and Isis. In claiming insertion for these lines, I would appeal to that proverbial love of fair play which distinguishes Englishmen; and I trust that, by means of the publicity of a protest in the Musical Times our claims to originate this important reform will not again be ignored.—Your faithful servant,

Robert Stewart.

Trinity College, Dublin, July 10, 1878.

[We print Sir R. Stewart's letter, though it seems hardly called for. The article he refers to was not upon musical education generally, but on the London University curriculum; and, as not the slightest reference was made to either of the two leading English Universities, it can hardly be matter for complaint that no reference was made to Dublin.—Ed. Musical Times.]

"SPEECH IN SONG."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—In your review of this book there are a few slight errors, and as Mr. Ellis has not noticed them I have ventured to point them out, at the same time giving the raison d'être of the Glossic symbols objected to.

OA is an historical digraph denoting the sound of o in oak, and not "recoil," which is marked by special symbols.

The hiss TH in thin, and the buzz DH in DHEN (then). The first of these two digraphs is historical (reserved for the hiss in Glossic). DH is formed from it by analogy. Of course neither T, D, nor the H's are sounded. The sounds may be generated by slightly releasing the contact of the dental T and D of modern Greek. The difference between the two sounds is the same as for any other pair of "flated" and "voiced" consonants, viz., the vocal chords are relaxed for the one, and vibrate for the other. The tongue position is identical. This may be verified by assuming the TH position, and alternately forcing "voice" and "flatus" over the tip of the tongue. If your reviewer produces the buzz with the tongue touching the lower gums only, he can do more than any ordinary Englishman.

The digraph KH for the hiss in ach (AAKH) is so written because the sound may be generated by slightly releasing the contact of K. Neither K nor H are sounded. This hiss is denoted in ordinary Spanish spelling by j, or g before e or i. To confound this sound with our aspirates is a very common English error. As a German once remarked to me, "The English always try to break their throats over this sound."

The trigraph KY'H for the hiss in ich (ĕeky'h) is so written because the sound is derived from a palatalised K (written KY' in Glossic) by slightly releasing the contact.

The H of the above symbols conventionally represents a continuous consonant, and the other letters the contact from which it is derived.—Yours truly,

Bath. D. P. W.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

Ampleforth.—The programme of the Concert given at St. Lawrence's College on the 9th ult. was rendered additionally interesting by the production of an Oratorio, the words written by one of the Fathers of the Monastery, and the music composed by Herr Placide von Tugginer, Professor of Music at the College. The subject of the work is the "Martyrdom of St. Lawrence," and its success was highly creditable to all concerned.

Banbury.—A number of ladies and gentlemen, members of the Banbury Choral Society, lately presented Mr. G. A. Hardacre with a handsome clock and purse as a mark of their appreciation of his valuable services during the past three seasons. The clock was supplied by Messrs. Walford and Son.

Bedale.—The Church of St. Mary and St. Joseph, Aiskew, was opened on Thursday, the 4th ult., by the Bishop of Beverley. The total cost of the church will be about £2,000, most of the money being a gift by the will of Catherine Lady Throckmorton, and the site, together with the presbytery, the gift of Lord Beaumont. The Rev. Mr. Lacy, of Masham, officiated at High Mass, assisted by the Rev. E. Pearson, of Leyburn, and the Rev. A. Galli, of Thirsk. The choir of St. Francis Xavier, Richmond, sang Mozart's Mass (No. 12) and Haydn's (No. 3) most charmingly, Mr. Swarbreck, the Misses Priestman, Mr. H. C. Priestman, and Mr. E. D. Swarbreck giving the solo parts. Mr. J. H. Rooks, organist of the Parish Church, Richmond, accompanied, and performed as voluntaries "Andante" (Batiste), "Fugue" (J. S. Bach), and Costa's "Triumphal March" from Naaman. The Church was crowded, many of the clergy and laity from the neighbouring towns being present.

BIRMINGHAM.—A grand Promenade Concert was given at the Botanical Gardens, Edgbaston, on Wednesday, June 26. The vocalists were Miss Jessie Royd, who sang "Ombra leggiera," from Dinorah, and "Lo! here the gentle lark;" Mr. Bywater, whose selections were "Tell me, Mary, how to woo thee," "The Pilgrim of Love," and "Tom Bowling;" and Mr. Lander, who gave the popular songs, "I fear no foe," and "Nancy Lee," and joined Miss Royd in the duet (from Don Giovanni) "La ci darem." The orchestral selections included Beethoven's Overture Fidelio, Auber's Zanetta, Rossini's William Tell, Gounod's "Funeral March of a Marionette," and other pieces. Mr. Gilmer conducted, and the whole Concert was a great success. A second Promenade Concert was given on Saturday the 13th ult., when a capital programme was well performed under the direction of Mr. S. Blythe. The vocal pieces were rendered by Mrs. Bellamy, Mr. W. Young, and a glee party. There was a good attendance on each occasion.

BRIDLINGTON.—On Monday evening, the 15th ult., the organ built by Mr. Thomas Lowe, of Sheffield, for the Congregational Church was opened by Dr. W. Spark, Organist of the Leeds Town Hall, who gave an Organ Recital which was highly appreciated by a large audience. At the close of the Recital the Rev. M. Smit proposed a vote of thanks to Dr. Spark, which was seconded by the Rev. G. Barrans, and carried unanimously.

DEWSBURY.—The sixth Annual Festival of the District Choral Union was held in Liversedge Church on Saturday evening, June 29, when fourteen choirs, numbering about 350 voices, took part. The small old-fashioned organ was supplemented by an efficient string band, free accompaniments for which to all parts of the service (Psalms and Canticles included) were written by the Rev. J. A. Seaton and T. L. Chadwick, Esq. The service included Gounod's Anthem, "Sing praises," and Garrett's Te Deum in F. The Rev. J. A. Seaton, Vicar of St. John's, Cleckheaton, as in former years, trained the choirs and conducted at the service. An excellent sermon was preached by the Rev. Canon Temple, Vicar of St. John's, Leeds.

DUMFRIES.—For fully eighteen months Mr. James Broom Lawson, son of Mr. Lawson, clothier, Dumfries, has officiated gratuitously as organist in the Wesley Church here. The congregation, thoroughly appreciating his valuable services, gave expression to that appreciation on the 9th ult. in the vestry, when a handsome volume of organ music, bearing a suitable inscription, was presented to Mr. Lawson, together with a massive gold ring—the volume being furnished by Novello, Ewer and Co., London, and the ring by Mr. Seiffert, Dumfries.

FARNWORTH (NEAR BOLTON).—On Thursday evening, the 4th ult., Mr. Eccles, of Darwen, gave an Organ Recital in the Market Street Church, interspersed with a few choral and solo pieces by the choir, which were exceedingly well rendered. The choir was under the conductorship of A. Barnes, Esq., B.A. The programme included Handel's Second Organ Concerto, Mendelssohn's Hear my Prayer, Bach's Toccata and Fugue in C major, Cherubini's "O Salutaris Hostia," Haydn's Air with variations (organ solo), and Eccles's Anthem, "Praise ye the Lord."

GLASGOW.—The members of the St. George's Choral Union gave their fourth and last Concert of the season on the 3rd ult., before a large and appreciative audience, in the Kibble Palace Botanic Gardens. The performance of the various pieces showed a marked improvement on their former efforts. The solo vocalists were Miss Struthers and Miss Boyle, both of whom received well-merited applause. Solos on the violin were contributed by Mr. J. B. Heron. The Conductor was Mr. W. Moodie, and the accompanist Mr. John Turnbull.——Under the title of "The Glasgow Select Choir," the Association for some time known as "Mr. Lambeth's Choir" will continue to give Concerts as formerly, a considerable number of new pieces having recently been added to the répertoire of the Society. Until a permanent Conductor is appointed, the choir will be under the direction of Mr. James Allan.

HALIFAX.—On the 3rd ult. Dr. Roberts, Organist and Choirmaster of the Parish Church, gave an Organ Recital from the works of Bach, Mendelssohn, and Handel, in the Brunswick Chapel, Rhodes Street, on the occasion of the opening of the new organ, built by Messrs. Wordsworth and Maskell, of Leeds. The instrument, which consists of three full manuals and pedal, reflects great credit upon the builders.

LEEDS.—On Sunday, June 30, the third annual Service of Praise was given in Salem Chapel, Hunslet Lane, before a crowded congregation. The first part of the service consisted of selections from Haydn's Creation, both the solos and choruses in which were rendered with excellent effect. The second part was devoted to Mendelssohn's Lauda Sion, which on the whole went fairly well. The solo vocalists were Miss Jenny Winkworth, Miss Willans, Mr. Thompson, Mr. Billington, Mr. Dealtry, and Mr. Burniston, to whom great praise is due. The choir, numbering nearly seventy voices, included members of the Philharmonic and other musical Societies in the town, and the instrumentalists were thoroughly efficient. Mr. Toothill conducted, and Mr. J. Wilkinson presided at the organ.

NEW MILL (NEAR HUDDERSFIELD).—On Sunday the 7th ult. the Annual Festival in connection with the Christ Church Day and Sunday Schools was held. The musical portions of the Services were very effectively rendered by the choir, accompanied on the organ by Mr. C. E. Holmes. The anthem in the morning was Mozart's Motett No. 1, O God, when Thou appearest, and in the evening Mendelssohn's Hear my prayer, the solo being well sung by Miss Annie Jenkinson. The "Magnificat" and "Nunc dimittis." were sung to Russell in A. In the afternoon the children assembled in the schoolroom previous to the service, and marched in procession to church, where an appropriate address was delivered by the Rev. B. J. Holmes, Vicar of St. Mary's, Berwick-on-Tweed. The anthem in the afternoon was "Hosanna" (Jackson, of Masham). Special hymns were sung at all the services with much vigour, taste, and precision.

OXFORD.—The Professor of Music gave his Terminal Lecture on June 27. The subject was "German and Italian Composers for the Organ." After characterising the school of Bach with a brief account of his sons and chief pupils, the Professor concluded the German division of his subject with Albrechtsberger, Mendelssohn, Hesse, and Schumann. A considerable part of the lecture was devoted to indicating the injurious effects that were produced in the music of the last-named composer by defective musical training and by his ungoverned desire of novelty at any price. Passing to Italy, the Professor made especial mention of Domenico Scarlatti and Padre Martini, and lamented that so few of the works of the latter composer were published—a regret brought home to the audience by the performance of a charming Gavotte. The illustrations, which, beside this Gavotte, included specimens of organ music by W. F. Bach, Eberlin, Albrechtsberger, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Hesse, and Scarlatti, were excellently played by Mr. Parratt.

SHERBORNE.—The announcement that C. S. Whitehead, Esq., B.A., was to give a Lecture on Sound, in connection with the Musical Society, on Tuesday evening, the 2nd ult., brought a large and appreciative audience to the Town Hall. The lecture was illustrated with the most varied experiments, all of which were highly successful. Especially good were the experiments with Chladni's plates, in which the sand-figures were reflected on to the ceiling of the room by means of a powerful lime-light. Mr. Whitehead's explanations were lucid, and sufficiently untechnical to be understood by the people, and were frequently enlivened by witty anecdotes and pointed epigrams. Mr. Walker ably assisted the lecturer, and greatly added to the smoothness of the experiments. We understand that a handsome balance has been realised in favour of the Society.

SHREWSBURY.—A successful Concert was given in the Music Hall, on the 5th ult., by the members of the School Choir. The first part of the programme was sacred, the second secular. The Concert was opened with an Organ Solo Fantasia (Bunnett), and a Quartett from Rossini's Moses in Egypt, "My heart sinks within me." The Chorus, "How excellent," from Handel's Saul; the Solo, "Shall I in Mamre's fertile plain" (Handel's Joshua); and the Chorus, "For all these mercies," were much applauded. In the second part, Flotow's Overture to Stradella; Claribel's "Little bird, little bird;" the part-songs, "The Hop-pickers" (E. Phipps) and "Love in May" (T. Lefevre), and the Chorus, "Hark!" from Lucia di Lammermoor, were all well received. Mr. W. C. Hay conducted.

TOTTENHAM.—On Thursday the 11th ult. an Evening Concert for a benevolent object was given at the Masonic Hall, under the direction of Mr. William Miller. The following artists took part:—Mdlle. Kate Leipold, Miss Maud Clinton, Miss Rose Davis, Mr. C. A. White, Mr. Geo. Weige, Herr Alfonse Seneca, Herr Leipold, Mons. Claude Jacquinot, the British Vocal Quartett (Messrs. Collins, Upton, Kift, and Tremere). Messrs. A. and W. Miller, Herr Leipold, and Miss Davis were the accompanists. The Concert was an entire success, and greatly appreciated by a large audience. Among the noticeable features was the playing of Messrs. Leipold and Jacquinot and the singing of the British Vocal Quartett. The artists generously gave their services.

WOOLWICH.—A very handsome chancel to the Church of SS. Michael and All Angels was opened on the 1st ult. by the Lord Bishop of St. Albans. During the octave of services the music was admirably rendered by the choir of the church, assisted by several members of the choir of Christ Church, Clapham, under the directorship of Mr. Richard Lemaire, the honorary Precentor of S. Michael's, who is also Organist and Precentor of Christ Church, Clapham. On Sunday the 7th ult. a new setting of the Communion Service was well rendered by the choir, aided by wind and stringed instruments. The composition was written by Mr. Lemaire expressly for this service. Mr. Hack, the Organist of S. Michael's, ably presided at the organ during the week.

NOVELLO, EWER & CO.'S

MUSIC PRIMERS

EDITED BY

DR. STAINER.

In issuing this series of Music Primers the Editor sees with pleasure the realisation of a desire he has long felt, to place in the hands of teachers and students of music a set of educational works of a high standard at a price so low as to render them attainable by all.

The growing interest in music generally, and rapid spread of its study, so very evident in this country, render it of the utmost importance that the student's first steps in every branch should be directed with skill and based on sound principles. The Editor has kept this object steadily in view, and he believes that each one of these Primers will prove to be as carefully constructed in detail as it is comprehensive in design.

Such a result would have been impossible but for the hearty support and sympathy of those authors, men of known ability in their special branches of art, who have embodied the results of their long and valuable experience in their respective contributions.

While gratefully acknowledging the kindness of these gentlemen, the Editor cannot but express a hope that the Primers may prove as useful to the public, and as beneficial to art, as both authors and publishers have endeavoured to make them.

PIANOFORTE AND HARMONIUM ACCOMPANIMENTS.

To obviate the difficulty frequently experienced by Country Choral Societies, many of which are unable to procure the assistance of an orchestra for the performance of complete works, Messrs. NOVELLO, EWER and Co. contemplate publishing an arrangement of the Orchestral Accompaniments of many popular works for Pianoforte and Harmonium.

The first of this series,

Sterndale Bennett's May Queen,

arranged by J. LEMMENS, is now published, folio size, in paper covers, price 7s. 6d.

THE ORPHEUS

(NEW SERIES)

A COLLECTION OF GLEES AND PART-SONGS FOR MALE VOICES.

Notwithstanding the popularity of the ORPHEUS in its former shape, it is believed that its issue in separate Voice Parts is scarcely in accordance with the present taste; it is therefore the intention of Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co. to publish a New Series of this favourite Collection, in which every composition will appear in the popular Octavo form, in single numbers printed in Vocal Score, with a carefully revised Pianoforte Accompaniment. In many instances the translation of the words will also undergo revision.

The ORPHEUS will now consist exclusively of Part-Music for

MALE VOICES ONLY.

The whole of the original Series, with a few unimportant exceptions, will be published in the new form, and new compositions by the best composers will be added from time to time, as well as a number of pieces which have become popular in other forms or in other Collections. The Part-Songs for Mixed Voices hitherto contained in the Series will in future appear in the "Part-Song Book."

The whole of the compositions by Mendelssohn, until now included in the ORPHEUS, will be issued as a separate publication, forming a complete collection of his Part-Songs.

NEW WORK FOR SINGING CLASSES.

CHAPPELL'S PENNY OPERATIC PART-SONGS.

For Soprano, Alto, Tenor, and Bass.

The present collection of Part-Songs is entirely new, being selected and adapted from the most striking and popular Choruses in the Favourite Foreign Operas. The Arrangement is purely Vocal, such Choruses only being chosen as can be sung without the aid of an Instrumental Accompaniment. The Words have been expressly written for the work, and the harmonies arranged in four parts, as likely to be most useful in small classes.

1.	Hymn of the Fisherman's Children	Adapted to a Melody from Herold's "ZAMPA."
2.	Fays and Elves (In mia fe,	From Flotow's "MARTA."
3.	Spring's Bright Glances (In Elvezia non v' ha)	From Bellini's "LA SONNAMBULA."

GOLD MEDAL PIANOS.

18, WIGMORE STREET, LONDON, W. ON THE THREE YEARS' SYSTEM.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' GOLD MEDAL PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

SIR JULIUS BENEDICT. { "This most ingenious and valuable invention cannot fail to meet with success."
SYDNEY SMITH. "The touch is absolute perfection."
BRINLEY RICHARDS. { "A very clever and useful invention, and likely to be extensively adopted."

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' SHORT IRON GRAND PIANOS. Six feet six inches in length, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action. Price, 105 to 115 Guineas.

"The tone of the Grand now referred to possessed all the qualities that a good piano ought to have, and in touch and action was perfect. The sweet and silvery quality of the upper octaves was worthy of special admiration."—The Era.

"Sir Julius Benedict played his well-known composition, 'Where the Bee sucks,' on one of Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons' Grand Pianos, with the recently patented improvements, which enabled him to produce the sustained tones with great variety of effect in the light and shade of tones, especially so when extreme delicacy of touch is required."—Court Journal.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' SHORT IRON GRAND PIANOS. Six feet six inches in length, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action. Price, 105 to 115 Guineas.

"Admirable repetition, perfect sostenuto, and luscious tone of the instrument fully justified the performer's choice."—Sunday Times.

"Magnificent, grand, the air telling out with almost vocal clearness and sweetness to the bell-like treble arpeggio accompaniment, which contrasted excellently with the extraordinary power produced in the forte passages."—Illustrated Sporting and Dramatic News.

"An immense improvement in arpeggios. The rapid passages in the upper register, the beautiful flute-like tone, and quick and perfect repetition, were very enective."—Figaro.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' CONCERT IRON GRAND PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

"Sir Julius Benedict, now seldom heard as a soloist, delighted the public once more by his arrangement of 'Where the Bee sucks.' He played upon a new Patent Grand by Brinsmead, possessing a remarkably loud and clear tone."—Echo.

"The upright Iron Grand Piano, with sostenente sounding-board, the mechanism produces the obvious result of a fuller and richer tone."—Morning Advertiser.

"Every means are adopted to insure the production of perfect instruments."—The Orchestra.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' SHORT IRON GRAND PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action

"Where all the pianos go to seems somewhat of a mystery, for a really good instrument will last a lifetime: and yet every year thousands are made by each of the great London manufacturers, while the numbers made by the 200 or more smaller firms must represent an enormous number in the course of each year. The improvements made in English pianos have caused this trade rapidly to increase, until one pianoforte manufactory after another has been built to supply the growing demand. One of the largest of these, lately erected by Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons, of Wigmore Street, covers nearly an acre of ground in the Grafton Road, Kentish Town, and is intended to accommodate 300 workmen. These works alone can supply 3,000 pianos annually, and there are at least three manufactories in London capable of making an equal number."—Illustrated London News.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' GOLD MEDAL PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

"A metal bridge of a peculiar form is used to produce the treble, and a much finer tone is produced than if a wooden bridge were used."—Morning Post.

"A perfect check, great power, and quick repetition."—Times of India.

"Produces a better quality of tone, greater durability, the new patent perfect repetition, with a check (never before attained), with the certainty of the instrument never blocking."—Land and Water.

"Beautiful, light, and elastic touch, and an instant repetition."—Globe.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' GOLD MEDAL PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

"The softest touch is sufficient to secure a reply, the touch and facility of repetition are really perfect."—Belgravia.

"The advantages fully justify the term 'Perfect' Check Repeater Action."—John Bull.

"The touch is very sure, light, and elastic."—Musical Times.

"This invention is simplicity itself."—The Queen.

"The latest and greatest improvements in the pianoforte."—City Press.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' GOLD MEDAL PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.
On the Three Years' System.

"Receive the greatest approbation everywhere of musicians and manufacturers."—Standard.

EDITED BY

DR. STAINER.

In issuing this series of Music Primers the Editor sees with pleasure the realisation of a desire he has long felt, to place in the hands of teachers and students of music a set of educational works of a high standard at a price so low as to render them attainable by all.

The growing interest in music generally, and rapid spread of its study, so very evident in this country, render it of the utmost importance that the student's first steps in every branch should be directed with skill and based on sound principles. The Editor has kept this object steadily in view, and he believes that each one of these Primers will prove to be as carefully constructed in detail as it is comprehensive in design.

Such a result would have been impossible but for the hearty support and sympathy of those authors, men of known ability in their special branches of art, who have embodied the results of their long and valuable experience in their respective contributions.

While gratefully acknowledging the kindness of these gentlemen, the Editor cannot but express a hope that the Primers may prove as useful to the public, and as beneficial to art, as both authors and publishers have endeavoured to make them.

CHALLEN AND SON'S
GOLD MEDAL PIANOS,
20, OXFORD STREET, LONDON.

ESTABLISHED 1804.

PRIZE MEDAL, LONDON, 1862. | GOLD MEDAL, SOUTH AFRICA, 1877.

The only Firm who obtained the International Exhibition Medal for the special distinction of "excellence of touch and tone."

CHALLEN & SON'S GOLD MEDAL PIANETTE,
WITH CHECK ACTION, IN ELEGANT WALNUT OR ROSEWOOD CASE.

FROM 25 GUINEAS.

"The Pianettes manufactured by CHALLEN & SON are most satisfactory instruments."—Anton Rubinstein.

"I can testify in the strongest manner to the qualities of the Pianette as manufactured by CHALLEN & SON. In every point, as to tone and touch, they are excellent; and I can also certify from experience as to their durability under hard wear."—William Henry Monk, Professor of Music in King's College, London.

CHALLEN & SON'S GOLD MEDAL SEMI-COTTAGE,
WITH CHECK REPEATER ACTION.

FROM 32 GUINEAS.

"The Pianos I have selected from Messrs. CHALLEN & SON have invariably given complete satisfaction, some of them having had to bear the severe test of an Indian climate."—William H. Cummings.

"As a customer of some years' standing, I speak with confidence of the quality of the instruments supplied by Messrs. CHALLEN & SON. The two I have for my own use have had a great deal of wear, and in this respect have entirely satisfied me as to their durability; and the tone and touch of all those selected by me for myself or pupils have been much commended."—Alfred Gilbert, R.A.M.

CHALLEN & SON'S GOLD MEDAL COTTAGE;
TRICHORD THROUGHOUT; BRASS BRIDGE; CHECK REPEATER ACTION.

FROM 60 GUINEAS.

"I hold a very high opinion of Messrs. CHALLEN & SON'S Pianos. Their qualities of tone and touch can be at once estimated; but I can furthermore bear testimony to their great durability."—Lindsay Sloper.

"CHALLEN & SON is a name synonymous with wonderful durability, great beauty of tone, and moderation in price. We know of not one single maker whose Pianos excel theirs in the qualities most desirable in a good and lasting Piano."—Cape Argus, May 7.

EBONISED AND GOLD PIANOS

WARD'S

ROYAL PIANOFORTE AND HARMONIUM LAMP,

FOR PROVIDING A CENTRAL & DIRECT LIGHT FOR THE PERFORMER.

The inconvenience of the present mode of lighting a performer at a pianoforte or harmonium by means of sconces fitted at the extremities of the instrument has long been a subject of complaint. The requirement is a central light to fall direct upon the music-book. This can be obtained by using Thomas Ward's Royal Pianoforte Lamp, which can be fitted to any form of instrument without defacing the same. Vocalists also will thus find a convenience which does not exist in other modes of lighting.

TESTIMONIAL.

"Barrow Street, Quorndon, near Loughborough,
"July 16, 1877.

"SIR,—It is now over two years since I purchased a set of your pedals and action for pianofortes. After having thoroughly tested them and used them regularly for so long a period I have no hesitation in saying that they are a most decided success, and at the same time advise every organ student who wishes to become proficient in the art of pedalling to procure a set of them at once.

"I remain, Sir, yours truly,

"To Mr. J. Hamilton." "J. J. CALLIS.

CONCERT-ROOMS.

By H. HEATHCOTE STATHAM.

ALTHOUGH there is metaphysically considerable relation between architecture and music, insomuch that the former has been fancifully but not inaptly termed "the music of the eye," and the latter is habitually criticised in regard to its "construction," they seem materially to have great difficulty in getting on together. Perhaps it may be said that very little definite attempt has been made to bend architecture to the service of music. When a new theatre is built, there is every endeavour made to secure for it acoustic properties, and the convenient placing of the audience, so that all can hear and see as well as economy of space will permit; and with these practical advantages to combine a brilliant effect, though too often in a somewhat over-showy and vulgar manner. But there is little evidence of the same kind of thought in the case of most of our concert-rooms. Generally a concert-room is simply, as far as regards shape and arrangement, a ball-room with a larger orchestra. There is little attempt made (if we may judge from results) at considering how an audience may be best placed in regard to the performers, and what is the best shape or plan of room for hearing; and it cannot be denied that a great deal of enjoyment of music is obtained in rooms which would seem to include every drawback to satisfactory hearing which could well exist in the same apartment. But though the listeners know what their enjoyment of the music is under these circumstances, they hardly know what it might be in a more favourably arranged and constructed room. A remarkable example of this, in the experience of the present writer, was the comparison of the effect of one of the greatest passages in orchestral music—the crescendo leading to the introduction of the final march in Beethoven's C minor Symphony—as played in two different rooms by the same orchestra on two occasions. In the one case the effect was magnificent, in the other it fell perfectly dead, though the playing was just the same. The difference was that one performance was in a very echoing room, bad for some things, but splendid for this particular effect; in the other case it was in a room much deadened by superfluity of upholstery. This was an extreme instance of the influence of the room upon the music; but in a general way it may be said that the room is to the music what the body is to the strings in a violin, or the sound-board to the piano; upon its material and construction depends much of the effect of the sounds produced. But in addition to this, there is all the question of comfort to the executants and to the audience, and the planning of the room so as to bring them into the best possible relation with each other, and to realise the greatest happiness of the greatest number at a concert. Important as the concert-room thus becomes in regard to the art of music, it has received comparatively little attention of a practical kind. In London it cannot be said that there is one good concert-room; and the finest musical performances, not exactly in London, but for the benefit of London audiences, are given in two of the worst and most comfortless rooms that can well be imagined—St. James's Hall and the Crystal Palace concert-room. The latter, of course, is only a makeshift in a place not specially built for music; but the former is a somewhat sad specimen of what it seems the best available skill was able to produce in the way of a concert-room at the time it was built.

When a new concert-room is built now there will frequently be a great deal more consideration given, or at all events a great deal more scientific talk about it, with the object of producing a good result; but the misfortune is that theory is of less value in the matter than practical experience, and that few of the architects are sufficient musicians to have been in the habit of regular concert-going and of forming a judgment as to the success or non-success of the music in any particular room. When an architect is going to build a concert-room he generally talks a great deal about acoustics for some time beforehand, and has theories of rhythmical proportions between height, breadth, and length. All this notion of proportions is utter nonsense when it comes to practice. You can get as far as general principles, such as that a room must not be too high in proportion to its width; that it must not have a ceiling or an end-wall that will produce disturbing echoes, &c.; but the idea which has often been put forth, that a room should be planned in certain arithmetical or harmonic ratios of dimensions, could only result (if anything) in this—that such a room will reinforce one particular note, just as a pipe with a certain length and breadth gives one particular sound. Acousticians are fond of remarking on the fact that a room has one particular note to which it responds—so it often has, but so far from that being any advantage to a musical performance, it is a drawback; the object should be to get rid of any tendency in the room to reinforce one sound more than another. Every one knows the annoyance often resulting from the pedal-pipe of an organ to which the room responds, and which suddenly and unreasonably asserts itself by setting everything rattling and shaking. What acoustic science can do for us is in regard to the neutralisation of echo by the arrangement of surfaces, and the effect of various materials in assisting or deadening sonority; and even this is more a matter of observation and common sense than of scientific theory.

The conditions of success in a concert-room may be considered in regard to size, shape, material employed, and arrangement of the audience and executants in relation to each other. Architectural effect is a separate matter, hardly, perhaps, to be discussed in these columns, and only to be looked to when the practical requirements are all satisfied. It is, of course, very desirable that a concert-room should be a beautiful and impressive room architecturally; but any preconceived idea in regard to its architectural treatment is apt to interfere with its proper treatment practically, as we see in the case of the Albert Hall, which was started with the idea of the Roman amphitheatre in view, and thus is deliberately planned as if it were a place for a spectacle, though really intended as an auditorium. And this is a part of the subject which may be left to the architects; the object here is to suggest what is wanted from a musical point of view; more especially because the musicians and concert-goers seem to have no very definite idea themselves as to what they want, and to create a demand for the right thing is one of the most important steps towards getting it.

Now in regard to size, the well-known laconic form of advice may be given to those who propose to build very big concert-rooms—"Don't." It is quite a mistake to suppose that we want larger rooms than we have. As a general rule music cannot be really enjoyed in rooms above a certain limit of size—certainly not music requiring delicacy of execution and expression.

It may be doubted whether it is possible to enable more than 2,000 persons, at the outside, to hear an orchestral symphony with full enjoyment and realisation of the intended effect. I have heard old subscribers to the Philharmonic object even to the size of St. James's Hall, and profess that they did not enjoy the symphonies nearly as much as in the old quarters. But there is perhaps a little of the laudator temporis acti about this. The present Philharmonic band requires a room as large as that; and on the whole it can hardly be said that there would be an advantage in reducing the numbers of the band, for Beethoven's limit of sixty performers referred to a period when execution was not carried to so high a point as it now is, and a band of eighty or ninety performers are probably able to play with as much delicacy and finish as the sixty of his day could: and the effect of the numerous string force in brilliant passages is undeniable. But this size of band and concert-room is about the limit for real enjoyment. If the room is much enlarged you reach the point when there is a perceptible interval between the origination of the sound and its reflection (which can never be wholly obliterated), and there is at once an element of confusion; besides which the force of the effect of a certain number of performers must be impaired, or their number must be increased and delicacy lost: and even by increasing their numbers the force of effect is not proportionally increased, there is not the same precision and sharpness of enunciation.* The obvious reason of this is that, however the number of performers and the size of the room are increased, the velocity of sound and the force and timbre of individual voices and instruments remain unaltered; and unless we could accelerate the velocity of sound and increase the power of lungs and catgut, with each enlargement of the area of the concert-room we necessarily produce a perfectly different balance of effect.

The Albert Hall, the most remarkable experiment in monster concert-room building in recent times, has taught us a good deal in this respect—much more conclusively than the Handel Festivals, because in the case of these latter the conditions are really so unfavourable as to afford no fair test. But the Albert Hall, though radically and almost absurdly wrong in its plan and the method of seating the audience, is by no means a failure acoustically. On the contrary, considering its size, the degree in which voices and instruments are supported and sustained by the building (all but the organ, of which a word just now), joined with the comparative absence of echo, is really remarkable. Yet it may be said without fear of contradiction that no experienced and exigéant auditor can enjoy the higher and more elaborate forms of music there, for the simple reason that the place is too big, and the proportions, balance, and delicacy of a great work are lost there. This reasoning applies with even more force to performances of chamber-music in large concert-rooms. No doubt the "Monday Popular Concerts" have been an immense agency in raising and educating popular taste by bringing many to a knowledge of one of the highest forms of the art who might otherwise have known nothing of it, and we must be glad that so large a public have had this opportunity: but the said public are quite under a delusion if they imagine that in hearing Mozart's and Beethoven's quartetts played at the end of a room ninety feet long they hear them with the effect contemplated by the composers. The whole scale of the compositions is really destroyed by bringing them into a place so much too large for their proportions. Among the initiated there is a rather strong feeling getting up on this point; and two beautiful concerts were given a little while ago (very badly attended) in the Tenterden Street Rooms, at the instance of some amateurs who wished practically to draw attention to the superior effect of this class of music in a smaller room, and to enter a protest against the system of bringing all chamber-music to lose itself in large concert-rooms. By degrees the musical public generally will find this out, and then the Monday Popular Concerts will perhaps have done their work (and a great one) in bringing chamber-music to the knowledge of the people, and lead to an effort for its more frequent performance under the conditions contemplated by its composers.

The questions of the shape of room and of the seating arrangement may be taken together, since the one depends to some extent upon the other. The first thing to be emphatically said about a room for hearing music is that it should never have a flat floor. Theoretically, it is true, acousticians will say that sound diverges equally in all directions from the point of origination. Practically it is perfectly certain that (whether it ought to be so or not) sound has a tendency to ascend rather than descend, and that any one at the further end of the room from the platform will hear far better in a gallery than on the ground floor of an ordinary concert-room: indeed, more than this may be said, for I can testify from repeated experience that at the Crystal Palace concert-room the band can be better heard in the end gallery than from a point on the ground-floor only half the distance from the orchestra. There is also the serious disturbing influence of the interposition of the heads or bonnets of the auditors between those behind them and the performers. This not only affects sight but hearing, for sound casts its shadows just as much as light; and whenever you cannot see the performer, or at least the instrument, you may be quite sure you are not thoroughly hearing the music. Every consideration therefore calls for an arrangement of concert-rooms with a floor rising from the point nearest to the performers to the extreme limit of the audience; and those who are concerned in the building of music-rooms should insist upon this as a sine quâ non—otherwise, however good the room may be for promenading, it cannot possibly be a good concert-room. As to the general shape of the room it should be recognised that this may advantageously be varied in accordance with the use to which it is to be put. As a general rule a concert-room is required to provide for singing as well as for instrumental music; and as singing can only be heard well in the direction in which the singer is facing, the arrangement of an end orchestra facing the audience must be the most generally useful. Whether the usual oblong parallelogram or the theatre form would be the best for a large audience may be matter for question, but probably the result for a large concert-room will be in favour of the long form of room. The theatre form brings all the audience more equally near the performers; but it is a form in which it is very difficult to avoid echo, unless the auditorium is arranged in galleries as in a theatre, and then there are caverns produced which, while they break up and destroy echo, have the disadvantage of presenting an obstacle to the free passage of sound, for sound never traverses freely from a large open space to a more confined one; moreover the theatre form brings a certain number of the audience appreciably nearer to one side of the orchestra than to the other, so as to hear one portion of the band or chorus more loudly than the rest, which is always most disadvantageous. Another objection is that the theatre or horseshoe form, with its large central space, does not concentrate the combined sounds and drive them in one direction so much as a longer and narrower shaped room. For the larger class of concert-rooms, therefore, the best form seems to be a long room with the seats rising in a gradual curve from the orchestra end to the back; and experience shows that in such a room the sound, confined in an onward and forward direction, will travel a long way without losing much of its initial force: the room becomes, in fact, a kind of sound-conducting tube. To provide against a return echo from the end-wall is then the point; its surface requires to be broken up at various angles and planes to prevent this. At this point a small gallery across the end may be a real advantage in this way, provided it does not project too far or come too low down over the audience beneath so as to stop out sound from them; or the echo might even be sufficiently neutralised by hanging curtains at the end to absorb the sound; anything absorbent being quite in place at this extreme end of the room, while at the orchestra end everything should be resonant and non-absorbing, so as to start the sound wave on its journey with all the advantage possible. The ceiling must not be a flat expanse, for the same reason, that it will produce an echo or reflection downwards; nor must it be a semicircle, for though the echo will thus be limited and concentrated, it will be very strongly felt in the part of the hall upon which it is concentrated.* A horizontal ceiling, with the angles at the joining with the walls canted off obliquely, and the surface broken up with beams and panels, seems therefore to be the most desirable form: and the ceiling should not be higher than is really necessary for appearance and for breathing space, otherwise the intensity of the sound is lost and scattered by being dispersed into empty air-space.

In the construction of the orchestra itself there is often much to be desired. In the case where a chorus and band are to be combined on the same orchestra, there should certainly be a sound-board behind the band, throwing forward its sounds, and at the same time masking them to some extent from the chorus, who are by no means assisted in their part by the sounds of individual instruments close to them. The sonority of the band, besides, is very much impaired by the immediate contiguity of a large body of chorus singers, whose dress forms a mass of absorbent material. In a paper on music-rooms read by the writer before the Institute of Architects in 1873 (to be found in their "Transactions") a suggestion was made as to the construction of the orchestra, so as to place the band and chorus more effectively, and also another proposition, which may be repeated here, viz., that in concert-rooms for large performances there should be some space of floor between the orchestra and the front row of the audience, to be laid with boarding with air-space beneath; since no one ever desires to sit close up to the orchestra for music on a great scale, which can never be adequately heard except at a certain distance. The floor-space thus left would be an assistance to resonance, and could be utilised as a foyer before and after the performance, being connected with the main entrances in such a way as to avoid draughts in the neighbourhood of the orchestra.* It is true that such an arrangement would presuppose that concert audiences should be much more civilised than they are at present in England, and not leave during the performance of a piece; but perhaps we shall get to that in time, and to plan a room so as to render an improvement in this respect more imperative might even have a salutary educational effect on the British concert-goer.

But where it is intended that instrumental music alone should be provided for, it is unnecessary to assume the end of the room as the only or the best position for the players. In England, it is true, we hardly ever have concerts of unmixed instrumental music; but at the Monday Popular Concerts it may be said that the singing is so subordinate and often so unsatisfactory a part of the entertainment that it would be hardly necessary to consider it specially in the arrangement of the room; and at the Musical Union it has always been dispensed with, and the performers placed in the centre of the room. This arrangement, even in St. James's Hall, is a vast improvement on the end position, but the room is still too large for the class of music. We very much want one or two rooms planned for chamber-music, with the object of bringing as large a number of listeners together as can be accommodated without making the room too large for such music to be heard under its proper conditions. Such a room would take the form of a circle with seats rising all round from the centre, and a centre platform slightly raised for the players, with a sound-board over it to drive the sound laterally over the expanse of the room and prevent it rising to the ceiling and returning in the form of echo. With such a form of plan the same number as generally form the audience at the Musical Union could be accommodated in a room about half the area of St. James's Hall, where a great deal of space is thrown to waste on these occasions; and on the same plan a room might be built accommodating as large an audience as the Monday Popular Concerts draw, and bringing them, at all events, far more within reach of the adequate hearing of the music than they are at present. Perhaps it would hardly be a safe investment to erect a large building with a central orchestra, with the idea of depending for a return entirely on orchestral music. But it may be suggested that this is the way in which such a building as the Albert Hall could really be best utilised for music, by raising the absurd "arena," in which no one can hear anything, so as to be to a certain extent above, instead of below, the level of the amphitheatre barrier, and placing a large band there, which would at least be much more effectively heard than any band ever is at present in that hall. And it is very probable that a large organ would be better heard if placed in the centre of such a building than it ever is at the side or end; and it might in that case be made an opportunity for a most brilliant effect of architectural design.

As to the materials for concert-rooms, there can hardly be a doubt that wood is the most valuable as an internal finish, as almost the only material which sympathises with sound and strengthens it without sharply reflecting it. All materials that are hard and brittle in character produce sharp and confusing echoes; fibrous materials in general assist and sympathise with sound; woollen and other stuffs absorb and deaden it, and are therefore most useful to counteract the effect of echo, but for the same reason it is desirable to guard against filling a concert-room too much with cushions and curtains. It must always be remembered too that the audience bring a large amount of this absorbent element into the room; and that a room which appears entirely satisfactory (in regard to absence of echo, &c.), when empty, will almost certainly be found too dead when filled with people. One of the best ways of lining a music-room was that adopted, after much consideration, in the construction of the Albert Hall—a thin lining of wood with an air-space behind it.* It is curious that the same constructors who originated this successful treatment of the walls should have made such a mistake as to put a concave glass roof, the deleterious effect of which might have been foreseen by the mere exercise of common sense. Large windows of every kind are to be avoided in a concert-room as much as possible, as glass is one of the materials which only echoes sound without helping it. The Albert Hall, however, affords a curious instance of the difficulty of providing for various kinds of music in the same building, in regard to the organ, before alluded to as an exception to the success of the room. When the building was first talked over the organ-builder wished to persuade the authorities to fill it with hard material, such as tiles and cement. To those who knew how utterly the large organ at Liverpool by the same builder is spoiled for all intricate music (such as fugues) by being placed in a room formed of the same class of materials, and echoing and reverberating every note, the advice must have seemed suicidal. As a rule, however, organ-builders do not care about hearing music, but only about hearing pipes; and the result proves that from the organ-builder's point of view the advice was correct, for the Albert Hall organ is utterly deadened by the building, in comparison with its brother instrument at Liverpool; so much so that, although the heavy 32-feet and 16-feet pedal-pipes sound tremendous when close to the instrument, they do not travel into the building the least, and the effect of the full pedal organ from the amphitheatre is like a gigantic harmonium. This is partly, perhaps, from the want of a flat floor, which greatly promotes the travelling power of the big pipes, but it is also owing to the fact that the comparative absence of echo destroys the "roll" of the organ. Apparently, in the case of large organs, we must choose between a grand effect of tone on the one hand or clearness of definition on the other hand. We find the same dilemma in our cathedrals, where the roll and echo of the organ is a grand effect, but where definition is, for that very reason, extremely imperfect. The contrast between the effect of Mr. Willis's two instruments in Liverpool and in London is just the same as that between the two performances of Beethoven's Symphony mentioned at the commencement of these remarks, and arises from just the same cause. In massive plain passages of full harmony the echo of the building makes an organ sound very grand, but it is at the expense of all clearness of definition in more intricate music, so that it is necessary to choose between the two; and on the whole, there can be no doubt that definition is the most valuable quality.

* The circular ceiling of St. James's Hall is thus a mistake to begin with; but the echo which there doubtless would be from it, is probably, I think, cut up and destroyed by the perpendicular stalks of the hanging gaslights. These, however, were not put with this object, but to attain an effect of diffused light, so that the amelioration, if owing to this cause, is accidental.

* A sketch plan was given in the Institute of Architects' "Transactions," showing how this could be arranged.

The arrangement of convenient cloak-room accommodation in connection with concert-halls is only a matter of ordinary requirement in all places of public meeting, though it is worth remark that in London there is not a single concert-room properly provided in this respect; wherever one goes to hear music the ingress and exit is connected with draughts, confusion, and discomfort. But the accommodation for performers is a matter for special consideration, and is often very much neglected, as any one will discover who asks a leading vocalist for his or her experience of "green-rooms." It is not only most important for singers to avoid draughts, but it is important for musical executants in all branches, unless they are blessed with iron nerves, to be out of the way of disturbance, confusion, or discomfort of any kind just before coming on the platform. Their rooms should be spacious, comfortable, and cheerful (which last point is not unimportant, for it is depressing to a sensitive organisation to be in a gloomy ill-lighted room just before performance), and should open direct on the platform on the same level, so as not to entail the annoyance and exertion of running up and down steps every time the concert-room is entered and quitted; at the same time the connection with the platform should be so arranged with two doors and an intermediate vestibule, that conversation may be freely carried on in the green-room without its being heard in the music-room. Most performers can probably testify that it is very rarely that a green-room is arranged with even these simple and self-evident provisions for comfort and convenience; and we demand so much of musical executants, and are so ready to be cross with them if they do not do all we expect, that it is only bare justice to give them every comfort that may conduce to their coming before the public in the best condition, mental and physical, for their arduous duties.

* An interesting account of the various considerations gone into in scheming the construction of the Albert Hall will be found in a paper by General Scott, in the "Transactions" of the Institute of Architects for 1871-2.

THE LITERATURE OF NATIONAL MUSIC.

By Carl Engel.

We now arrive at the British Isles, where, especially in Scotland, we meet with numerous printed collections. Indeed, the Scotch can boast of possessing nearly as many publications of the kind as the French or the Germans; but whether their tunes are as judiciously edited is another question. A considerable number of them are arranged for the pianoforte with the omission of the words of the songs, and with the introduction of embellishments, brilliant passages, and variations. However, with these we have not to concern ourselves in our present inquiry. The following certainly deserve attention:—

"A Collection of Original Scotch-Tunes (full of the Highland Humours) for the Violin: Being the first of this kind yet Printed: most of them being in the compass of the Flute. London: Printed by William Pearson, in Red-Cross Alley in Jewin-street, for Henry Playford, at his shop in the Temple-Change, Fleet-street. 1700" (oblong 4to). Henry Playford was the second son of the well-known music publisher John Playford. The book, which contains thirty-nine tunes, is interesting inasmuch as it represents the oldest published collection of Scotch national tunes properly so termed.

"Orpheus Caledonius; or, a Collection of the best Scotch Songs, set to Musick by W. Thomson (London). Engrav'd and printed for the Author, at his house in Leicester Fields" (folio). This publication bears no date, but the editor entered it at Stationers' Hall on the 5th of January, 1725. It contains fifty songs, preceded by a dedication to the Princess of Wales (afterwards Queen Wilhelmina-Caroline), and followed by a notation of the same songs for the flute. In the index Thomson has marked seven songs with asterisks, and he says "the songs mark'd thus were composed by David Rezzio" (sic). They are "The Lass of Patie's Mill," "Bessie Bell," "The Bush aboon Traquair," "The Bonnie Boatman," "An' thou were my ain thing," "Auld Rob Morris," and "Down the burn, Davie." Mention is made of W. Thomson in Burney's "History of Music" (vol. iv., p. 647) and in Hawkins's "History of Music" (vol. iv., p. 7). Hawkins evidently mistook the second edition of this work for the first. The second edition, which is in two volumes, octavo, was published in the year 1733, and has not the asterisks referring to David Rizzio, the musician of Queen Mary Stuart.

"The Scots' Musical Museum; consisting of upwards of six hundred songs, with proper basses for the pianoforte; originally published by James Johnson, and now accompanied with copious notes and illustrations of the Lyric Poetry and Music of Scotland, by the late William Stenhouse. New edition." (Edinburgh, 1853; 8vo, four volumes). The first edition (London, 1787-1803) is in six volumes, 8vo. An edition with notes and illustrations of the lyric poetry of Scotland, by W. Stenhouse, and with additional illustrations by David Laing, was published in Edinburgh in the year 1839, and is likewise in six volumes 8vo. The introduction to the present edition contains the titles and description of a large number of published collections of Scotch airs. There is also a list of ninety-seven published collections and eight manuscripts in the introduction to "The Dance Music of Scotland," arranged and edited by J. T. Surrenne; second edition (Edinburgh: Wood and Co., 1852; royal 8vo).

"Ancient Scottish Melodies, from a manuscript of the reign of King James VI.; with an introductory enquiry illustrative of the history of the Music of Scotland," by William Dauney (Edinburgh, 1838; 4to).

"The Songs of Scotland, adapted to their appropriate melodies, arranged, with pianoforte accompaniments, by G. F. Graham, T. M. Mudie, J. T. Surrenne, H. E. Dibdin, Finlay Dun, &c.; illustrated with historical, biographical, and critical notices, by G. F. Graham" (Edinburgh: Wood and Co., 1856; royal 8vo, three vols.). It is indeed difficult to praise the pianoforte accompaniments in this publication, however much one may be disposed to judge them leniently; nevertheless, as the beautiful Scotch tunes are preserved intact, or have at any rate only occasionally been slightly tampered with, the student will find this publication useful for his purpose, especially on account of the annotations.

"The Songs of Scotland prior to Burns, with the Tunes," edited by Robert Chambers (Edinburgh, 1862; small 8vo). A carefully compiled and very interesting little book.

"The Jacobite Relics of Scotland; being the Songs, Airs, and Legends of the Adherents to the House of Stuart," collected and illustrated by James Hogg (Edinburgh, 1819-21; 8vo, two vols.).

"Scottish Songs, with the Music," by Joseph Ritson (London, 1794; 12mo, two vols.); a second edition (Glasgow, 1869; 8vo, two vols.). The work contains an historical essay on Scotch songs.

"Ancient Scottish Ballads, recovered from Tradition, and never before published; with Notes, and an Appendix containing the Airs," by G. R. Kinloch (Edinburgh, 1827; 8vo).

There is a large publication of "Scottish Airs and Songs," by George Thomson (London, 1793-1841; folio, six vols.), who engaged Pleyel, Kozeluch, Haydn, Beethoven, Hummel, and Weber, to write pianoforte accompaniments to the melodies.

As regards the beautiful Irish airs, it may suffice to notice the following publications:—

"A General Collection of the Ancient Irish Music; containing a variety of admired Airs never before published, and also the compositions of Conolan and Carolan," by Edward Bunting (London, 1796; folio).

"A General Collection of the Ancient Music of Ireland, arranged for the Pianoforte; some of the most admired Melodies are adapted for the Voice, to poetry chiefly translated from the original Irish songs by Thomas Campbell, Esq., and other eminent poets; to which is prefaced a Historical and Critical Dissertation on the Egyptian, British, and Irish Harp," by Edward Bunting (London, 1809; folio, vol. i.). Only one volume has been published.

"The Ancient Music of Ireland, arranged for the Pianoforte; to which is prefixed a Dissertation on the Irish Harps and Harpers, including an account of the Old Melodies of Ireland;" by Edward Bunting, (Dublin, 1840; 4to). In the preface, E. Bunting remarks that before the year 1796, when he published his first collection, "there had been but three attempts of this nature—one by Burke Thumoth, in 1720; another by Neill, of Christ Churchyard, soon after; and a third by Carolan's son, patronized by Dean Delany, about 1747."

"A Favourite Collection of Irish Melodies, the original and genuine compositions of Carolan, the celebrated Irish Bard; arranged for the pianoforte, violin, or German flute; dedicated to the Irish Harp Society of Belfast" (Dublin, no date; folio).

"Historical Memoirs of the Irish Bards, interspersed with anecdotes of, and occasional observations on, the Music of Ireland; also an historical and descriptive account of the musical instruments of the Ancient Irish; and an Appendix containing several biographical and other papers, with select Irish Melodies," by Joseph C. Walker (London, 1786; 4to).

"A Selection of Irish Melodies; with symphonies and accompaniments by Sir John Stevenson, Mus. Doc., and characteristic words by Thomas Moore, Esq." (London: J. Power, 1807-34; ten parts, folio). There have subsequently been brought out some smaller editions of this work. Moore's fine poetry adapted to Irish airs has much contributed to make the Irish national music more widely known among the educated classes in different countries. The "symphonies and accompaniments" in the work, while containing much which is hardly desirable, leave much to be desired.

"The Petrie Collection of the Ancient Music of Ireland arranged for the pianoforte; edited by George Petrie, under the superintendence of the Society for the Preservation and Publication of the Melodies of Ireland" (Dublin: Gill, 1855; folio, vol. i.). Of this work the first volume only has been issued. It is rather diffuse, being overburdened with prolix introductory remarks and annotations; and the pianoforte arrangement is too elaborate to be in character with the tunes; otherwise the work is interesting.

Respecting the songs of Wales, there requires to be noticed first a curious publication which claims to be the earliest printed collection of Welsh tunes. I shall insert here its whole title, as I have done with some of the Irish books, because its character and purpose are therein so fully set forth, that it obviates the necessity of any further explanation. It is:—

"Antient British Music; or a Collection of Tunes, never before published, which are retained by the Cambro-Britons, more particularly in North Wales, and supposed by the learned to be the remains of the music of the antient Druids, so much famed in Roman history; Part I. containing twenty-four Airs set for the harp, harpsichord, violin, and all within the compass of the German flute, and figured for a thorough-bass. To which is prefixed an historical account of the rise and progress of Music among the Antient Britons; wherein the errors of Dr. Powel and his editor, Mr. Wynne, on that subject, in their history of Wales, are pointed out and confuted; and the whole set in its true and proper light. London: printed for and sold by the Compilers, John Parry, at his House in Jermyn Street, near St. James's Market; and Evan Williams, at Mr. Mickleborough's, in New Bond Street, near Union Street; and are to be had at the Music Shops. MDCCXLII." (sm. folio). Only the first part appears to have been published.

The following works ought likewise to be consulted by the student:—

"British Harmony; being a Collection of Antient Welsh airs, the traditional remains of those originally sung by the Bards of Wales; carefully compiled, and now first published with some additional variations, by John Parry; inscribed with all due esteem and gratitude to Sir Watkin Williams Wynn, Bart." (London: Hodgson, 1781; folio). This work, which contains forty-two airs arranged for the harpsichord, without the words of the songs, antecedes the publications by Edward Jones, who has adopted a similar plan in his arrangements with variations.

"Musical and Poetical Relics of the Welsh Bards, preserved by Tradition and Authentic Manuscripts from very remote antiquity, never before published. To the Bardic tunes are added variations for the harp, harpsichord, violin, or flute, with a select collection of the Pennillion and Englynion, or epigrammatic stanzas, poetical blossoms, and pastoral songs of Wales, with English translations. Likewise a General History of the Bards and Druids from the earliest period to the present time, with an account of their music and poetry; to which is prefixed a copious dissertation on the musical instruments of the Aboriginal Britons. A new edition doubly augmented and improved, by Edward Jones" (London, 1794; folio). Respecting the first edition (London, 1784; folio), Edward Jones, "Bard of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales," observes, p. 123, "A few years ago I published a similar work; but, having since collected very important and more considerable documents on the subject, I thought it more judicious, instead of giving an additional volume, to blend the chief matter of the former publication with the present."

"The Bardic Museum; or Primitive British Literature, and other admirable Rarities, forming the second volume of the Musical, Poetical, and Historical Relicks of the Welsh Bards and Druids; drawn from authentic documents of remote antiquity, with great pains now rescued from oblivion, and never before published; containing the Bardic Triads, Historic Odes, Eulogies, Songs, Elegies, Memorials of the Tombs of the Warriors of King Arthur and his Knights, Regalias, the Wonders of Wales, et cætera, with English translations and historic illustrations. Likewise the Ancient War-tunes of the Bards. To these national melodies are added new basses, with Variations for the harp or harpsichord, violin or flute. Dedicated by permission to His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, by Edward Jones, Bard to the Prince" (London, 1802; folio).

"A Selection of Welsh Melodies with Symphonies and Accompaniments, by John Parry; and Characteristic Words, by Mrs. Hemans" (London: J. Power, 1821; folio, two vols.). The first volume appeared some years earlier than the date here given, and was republished for the present edition, newly arranged, and with the poetry expressly written for it by Mrs. Hemans. It appears that the publisher, J. Power, instigated by the success of the Irish Melodies by Moore and Stevenson, to which, also, Sir Henry Bishop supplied some accompaniments, resorted to a similar expedient with the present Welsh Melodies, to only the first volume of which, however, it was extended. Perhaps more noteworthy to musicians is John Parry's statement in the preface: "I have purposely avoided all extraneous modulations and chromatic passages, that the accompaniments may be performed on the harp as well as on the pianoforte. I was strongly urged so to do, and requested to render the arrangement as simple and familiar as I possibly could, so that the melodies might not lose any of their character, or be disfigured by gaudy trappings."

"Ancient National Airs of Gwent and Morganwg; being a collection of original Welsh melodies hitherto unpublished, which obtained the prize at the Eisteddvod, held in celebration of the fifth anniversary of the Abergavenny Cymreigyddion, October, 1838, to which are added the words usually sung thereto. Collected and arranged for the harp or pianoforte, by M. Jane Williams, of Aberpergwm" (Llandovery, 1844; folio). Most of the tunes in the preceding publications were evidently collected in the northern and central districts of Wales. The melodies contained in the present volume, Miss Williams says, "have been collected among the peasantry of the districts of Gwent and Morganwg, especially in the Vale of Neath, one of the most romantic and secluded parts of the Principality of Wales, where the inhabitants retain much of their ancient pastoral and simple character, and the songs which suited the peaceful avocations of their forefathers are still to be heard in the farmhouse and the cottage. . . . In printing the present volume the collector disclaims all feelings of musical or literary ambition. The songs are given as she obtained them, in their wild and original state; no embellishments of the melody have been attempted, and the accompanying words are those sung to the airs." Considering how seldom even professional musicians have succeeded in writing appropriate pianoforte accompaniments to national airs, the shortcomings in the present arrangements may be easily excused, especially as we are told that the more important task of rendering a faithful notation of the tunes has been carefully attended to. Several of the tunes are remarkably beautiful.

"Y Caniedydd Cymreig; the Cambrian Minstrel; being a collection of the melodies of Cambria, with original words in English and Welsh, together with several original airs," by John Thomas [Jeuan Ddu] (Merthyr Tydvil, 1845; 4to). "Pencerdd; Gems of Welsh Melody; a selection of popular Welsh songs, with English and Welsh words; specimens of Pennillion Singing, after the manner of North Wales; and Welsh national airs, ancient and modern, set in a familiar manner for the pianoforte or harp, with symphonies and accompaniments," by John Owen [Owain Alaw] (Ruthin, 1860; folio).

Here may also be noticed "The Mona Melodies; a collection of ancient and original airs of the Isle of Man, arranged for the voice with a pianoforte accompaniment by an Amateur; the words by Mr. J. B.," edited by C. St. George (London: Mitchell, 1820; folio.) The editor states in a preface that the melodies are genuine, but that "the words adapted to them are entirely new, as the subjects of the Manx ballads were not esteemed to be of sufficient general interest to warrant their translation," which is to be regretted.

It seems rather singular that England should not possess any printed collection of its national songs with the airs as they are sung at the present day; while almost every other European nation possesses several comprehensive works of this kind. One or two small publications, such as "The Cheshire Melodies; provincial airs of Cheshire," by Edward Jones (London, about the year 1803), and "A selection of the most popular Melodies of the Tyne and the Wear, consisting of twenty-four original airs peculiar to the counties of Durham and Northumberland," published by Robert Topliff (London, folio), are too insignificant to supply the desideratum. Besides, they are too old to serve for illustrating the English national songs of the present time. Some musical inquirers have expressed the opinion that the country-people in England are not in the habit of singing while at their work in the fields, or when towards evening they are returning to their homes; and that those social gatherings during the long winter-evenings, in which the Germans and other continental nations delight in singing their favourite songs, are unknown to the English rustics. However, this opinion would probably be found to be only partially correct if search were made in the proper places. Large towns are not the nurseries for the growth and preservation of national songs; and the circumstance of England possessing many large towns may be the chief cause of the apparent dearth of such songs in this country. Still there are in some of the shires rather isolated districts, in which the exertions of a really musical collector would probably be not entirely resultless. We have indications of this in several of the descriptions of English counties which have been published during recent years, and in which some tunes of the country-people are given, with explanations of the peculiar manner in which they are sung on certain occasions. Likewise several collections of popular poetry relating to different English counties, which have appeared in print since about the middle of the present century —as, for instance, "The Popular Rhymes, &c., of the county of Berwick," by G. Henderson (Newcastle-on-Tyne, 1856; 8vo); "Ballads and Songs of Lancashire," by J. Harland (London, 1865; 8vo), &c.—suggest that there must be, belonging to the ditties, airs which have never been written down, and are only orally preserved by the people. We have seen that Miss Williams succeeded in bringing out a number of remarkably fine airs, hitherto unknown but to the villagers in the south of Wales, from whose singing she committed them to paper. The same might perhaps be accomplished in central and eastern England; and if the airs, as appears very likely, should prove less beautiful than those of Wales, they might be in every other respect equally interesting.

Of songs which were popular in former centuries, England possesses, as is well known, several old collections of considerable comprehensiveness. As they may be supposed to exist in the libraries of many English musicians, I shall not try the patience of the reader by enlarging upon them. Suffice it to point out two or three by way of example.

"The Dancing Master," a collection of dance-tunes, has already been alluded to. Its first edition was published by John Playford, in London, in the year 1651. Many of the tunes which it contains are airs of popular songs of the time when the book was brought out.

"Wit and Mirth: or Pills to purge Melancholy; being a collection of the best Merry Ballads and Songs, old and new; fitted to all humours, having each their proper tune for either voice or instrument; most of the songs being new set," by Thomas D'Urfey (London: 1719; 12mo, six vols.). An exact reprint of this work was published by Chatto and Windus, London, 1872. Not all the tunes which it contains are English, many are Scotch, others Irish, &c. Moreover, the original tunes are not unfrequently distorted to adapt them to the poetry written to them by D'Urfey.

"A Select Collection of English Songs," by Joseph Ritson (London, 1783, 8vo, three vols.); with an "Historical Essay on the Origin and Progress of National Song." The third volume contains the musical notation of the airs. There is also a second edition with additional songs and occasional notes by Thomas Park (London: 1813, 8vo, three vols.). However, the great majority of the airs printed in Ritson's "English Songs" can evidently not be regarded as national airs in a strict sense of the term, although the tunes may have been for some time in popular favour. The same remark applies to the airs in almost all the English collections of old songs. The difference between a national song (German, Volkslied) and a merely popular song (German, Volksthümliches Lied) is not always distinctly observed by the English musicians, and the two terms are often used indiscriminately.

"Musical Illustrations of Bishop's Percy's Reliques of Ancient English Poetry; a collection of old ballad tunes, &c., chiefly from rare MSS. and early printed books; deciphered from the obsolete notation, and harmonized and arranged according to modern usage," by Edward F. Rimbault (London: Cramer, Beale and Co., 1850; royal 8vo).

"Popular Music of the Olden Time; a Collection of ancient songs, ballads, and dance tunes, illustrative of the National Music of England. With short introductions to the different reigns, and notices of the airs from writers of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries; also a short account of the Minstrels," by W. Chappell. The whole of the airs harmonised by G. A. Macfarren (London: Cramer, Beale, and Chappell, no date; royal 8vo, two vols.).

THE GREAT COMPOSERS, SKETCHED BY THEMSELVES.

By Joseph Bennett.

No. IV.—BEETHOVEN (continued from page 438).

Leaving still unexhausted that portion of Beethoven's letters through which we have so often travelled, I now ask the reader to examine with me those of a later date, for the purpose of seeing the master in one of the most touching and interesting phases of his life. Everybody who knows anything at all of Beethoven's career is acquainted more or less with the relation in which he stood to his nephew Carl, and the sore trouble brought upon him by the behaviour of that ingrate. Few, however, may have taken the pains to gather the entire history of the connection and its attendant events from the letters which, on this subject at least, Beethoven seemed never weary of writing. But that the pains are worth taking, not only on account of the intrinsic interest of the theme, but because of the light thrown upon the master's character, I shall have no difficulty in showing.

Writing to the Archduke Rudolph, on November 16, 1815, Beethoven said: "Since yesterday afternoon I have been lying in a state of exhaustion, owing to my great distress of mind caused by the sudden death of my unhappy brother." The brother referred to was not Johann, who figures so largely in the composer's biography, but Carl, a Vienna cashier, and a most unfortunate fellow—one of those who seem born to be the sport of a malicious Fate. From a subsequent letter to Ries, in London, principally about money matters, we gather more concerning him: "My poor unhappy brother is just dead; he had a bad wife. For some years past he has been suffering from consumption, and from my wish to make his life less irksome I may compute what I gave him at 10,000 florins. This indeed does not seem much to an Englishman, but it is a great deal for a poor German, or rather Austrian.

The unhappy man was lately much changed, and I must say I lament him from my heart, though I rejoice to think I left nothing undone that could contribute to his comfort." No doubt the abrupt and, from its connection, significant reference to Carl's "bad wife" strikes the reader as odd, but Beethoven knew the woman well, and may have had a prevision of future trouble in that quarter; besides, the feminine members of his family and household exercised his patience and temper a good deal. Johann's wife was his special aversion; Carl's widow he soon nicknamed the "Queen of Night," and as for his housekeeper, Nany, when not flinging books at her head, he was writing her down a "beast." For him, therefore, to say, after announcing his brother's death, "he had a bad wife," was the most natural thing in the world, and a perfect bit of character-painting. In a letter to Zmeskall (Jan., 1816), we have the first hint as regards the new relationship which at this time devolved upon the master: "The death of my brother two months ago, which, owing to the guardianship of my nephew having passed to me, has brought with it all sorts of annoyances and perplexities, has caused this delay in my answer." Not long after we find Beethoven in the active discharge of his new obligations. Young Carl had been sent to Czerny for pianoforte lessons, and thus the one master writes to the other concerning the attendant money arrangements: "Pray give the enclosed to your parents for the dinners the boy had recently at your house; I positively will not accept these gratis. Moreover, I am very far from wishing that your lessons should remain without remuneration—even those already given must be reckoned up and paid for; only I beg of you to have a little patience for a time, as nothing can be demanded from the widow, and I had and still have heavy expenses to defray; but I borrow from you for the moment only." Beethoven soon saw the need for removing Carl beyond his mother's influence. He was resolved to do his duty by the boy, and with what earnestness he entered into it may be gathered from a letter to Ries wherein he says, inter alia: "You can scarcely have had as much vexation from Salomon's death as I have had from that of my brother! But I have the sweet consolation of rescuing a poor innocent child from the hands of an unworthy mother." At this very time, indeed, Beethoven took his nephew from home and sent him to a school kept by one Giannatasio del Rio, whom the master thus addressed: "I have great pleasure in saying that at last I intend to-morrow to place under your care the dear pledge entrusted to me. But I must impress on you not to permit any influence on the mother's part to decide when and where she is to see her son. . . . You must keep a watchful eye on your servant, for mine was bribed by her on one occasion." In a second note we see him playing the new rôle of pater familias with most laudable attention to detail, and wanting to know "how many pairs of stockings, trowsers, shoes, and drawers are required, and how many yards of kerseymere to make a pair of black trowsers for my tall nephew." But the master could hardly have expected that his sister-in-law would tamely surrender her rights, and he was not surprised when she appealed to a court of justice. The verdict went against her, and then Beethoven spoke with the firmness of established power. Writing to G. del Rio, he said: "As regards his mother, I desire that under the pretext of the boy being so busy, you will not let her see him; no man on earth can know or judge of this matter better than myself; and by any other line of conduct all my well-matured plans for the good of the child might be materially injured. I will myself discuss with you when the mother is henceforth to have access to Carl." Later on he returned to this subject: "As to Carl's mother, I have now decided that your wish not to see her again in your house shall be acceded to. This course is far more safe and judicious for our dear Carl, experience having taught me that every visit from his mother leaves a root of bitterness in the boy's heart, which may injure but never can benefit him. I shall strive to arrange occasional meetings at my house, which is likely to result in everything being entirely broken off with her. As we thoroughly agree on the subject of Carl's mother, we can mutually decide on the mode of his education." But while thus addressing the schoolmaster, Beethoven had resolved, as appears from a letter to Ries, upon taking the boy from under his care. Again, discussing money matters, he wrote: "The entire maintenance of my young nephew devolves upon me. At present he is at school, which costs 1,100 florins, and is by no means a good one, so that I must arrange a proper household and have him with me." We soon find a first step taken towards this end, and it is worth while noting that Beethoven spares Del Rio's feelings at the expense of a fib. He writes: "Various circumstances compel me to take charge of Carl myself; with this view, permit me to enclose you the amount due at the approaching quarter, at the termination of which Carl is to leave you. Do not, I beg, ascribe this to anything derogatory either to yourself or your respected institution, but to other pressing motives connected with Carl's welfare. . . . With regard to the 'Queen of the Night' our system must continue the same; and as Carl is about to undergo an operation in your house which will cause him to feel indisposed, and consequently make him irritable and susceptible, you must be more careful than ever to prevent her having access to him, otherwise she might easily contrive to revive all those impressions in his mind which we are anxious to avoid." Carl underwent the operation, whatever it was, and then Beethoven expressed to Del Rio his almost motherly anxiety and thankfulness. But we know by this time what a tender heart beat beneath that rugged exterior. Thus the master wrote: "Certain things can never be fully expressed. Of this nature are my feelings, and especially my gratitude, on hearing the details of the operation on Carl from you. You will excuse my attempting even remotely to shape these into words. . . . You can easily imagine my anxiety to hear how my dear son is getting on. . . . You can well understand how much it grieves me not to be able to take part in the sufferings of my Carl, and that I at least wish to hear frequently of his progress." Beethoven was comprehensive as well as profuse in his thanks. "I wish you," said he, "to express to Smetana (the surgeon) my esteem and high consideration;" while, with regard to Del Rio's wife, he wrote: "I forgot, in my haste, to say that all the love and goodness which Madame A. G. showed my Carl during his illness are inscribed in the list of my obligations, and I hope one day to show that they are ever present in my mind." Meanwhile, Beethoven gave up the idea of educating his nephew at home, or, at all events, put off its realisation; and the boy remained under Del Rio's care.

Up to this point we have gathered nothing concerning the character of the lad. Now, however, a glimpse of his personality is vouchsafed. Still writing to the schoolmaster, Beethoven says: "I beg you will allow Carl to come to me to-morrow, as it is the anniversary of his father's death, and we wish to visit his grave together. . . . I wish to know the effect of my treatment of Carl after your recent complaints. In the meantime, it touched me exceedingly to find him so susceptible as to his honour.

Before we left your house I gave him some hints on his want of industry, and, while walking together in a graver mood than usual, he pressed my hand vehemently, but met with no response from me. At dinner he scarcely ate anything, and said that he felt very melancholy; the cause of which I could not extract from him. At last, in the course of our walk, he owned that he was vexed because he had not been so industrious as usual. I said what I ought on the subject, but in a kinder manner than before. This, however, proves a certain delicacy of feeling, and such traits lead me to augur all that is good." Alas, poor man! if he could have seen into the future! But even then he would have closed the letter saying: "I warmly commend my poor orphan to your good heart." That the boy continued to give trouble may be gathered from a subsequent letter, in which Beethoven says: "With respect to Carl, I beg you will enforce the strictest discipline on him, and if he refuses to obey your orders, or to do his duty, I trust you will at once punish him. Treat him as if he were your own child rather than a mere pupil, for I already told you that during his father's lifetime he only submitted to the discipline of blows, which was a bad system. Still, such was the fact, and we must not forget it." But if Carl annoyed his guardian, Carl's mother did so tenfold. Having discovered that the "Van" preceding Beethoven's name had been treated by the Court as equivalent to the German "Von," she pointed out the error, whereupon the master was duly cited to appear and explain. He complied, and then said, pointing to his head and heart, "My nobility is here and here." But, as the qualification could not be recognised by the judges, the whole matter was sent down for ultimate settlement to an inferior tribunal, and Beethoven once again found himself "afloat upon a sea of troubles." He felt it bitterly. Writing to Del Rio on a certain matter he said: "If you do not see me, attribute it to my distress of mind, for I am now only beginning to feel the full force of this terrible incident." And again: "The assertions of this wicked woman have made such a painful impression on me that I cannot possibly answer every point to-day; to-morrow you shall have a detailed account of it all; but on no pretext whatever allow her to have access to Carl, and adhere to your rule that she is only to see him once a month. As she has been once this month already, she cannot come again till next." Strangely enough, in the midst of his perplexity, Beethoven revived the idea of educating Carl at home, on the ground of dissatisfaction with the teacher, to whom he wrote so confidentially. In a letter to Frau von Streicher we read: "I do thank heaven that I everywhere find men who interest themselves in me. One of the most distinguished professors in this university has, in the kindest manner, undertaken all that concerns Carl's education. If you happen to meet any of the Giannastasios at Czerny's you had better know nothing of what is going on about Carl, and say that it is contrary to my usual habit to disclose my plans, as when a project is told to others it is no longer exclusively your own. They would like to interfere in the matter, and I do not choose that these commonplace people should do so, both for my own sake and Carl's. Over their portico is inscribed 'Educational Institution,' whereas 'Non-Educational Institution' would be more appropriate." But, despite these bitter words, we find Carl at the school long after, and Beethoven calling Del Rio his "dear friend," from which state of things let the reader draw his own conclusions. Moreover, when in January, 1818, the master took the lad out of Del Rio's hands, he wrote: "Pray accept my heartfelt thanks for the zeal, rectitude, and integrity with which you have conducted the education of my nephew." Not a bad testimonial, this, for a "commonplace" man keeping a "non-educational" school!

The letters make no reference to Carl for eighteen months, and then we learn from a communication to the Archduke Rudolph that, owing to Beethoven's absence from Vienna, an interim guardian had been appointed in association with the lad's mother. We learn also that he, as well as the solicitor in the case, had thrown up his post, leaving Beethoven in worse trouble than ever. "Thus," he exclaims, "these endless perplexities go on, and no help, no consolation. The whole fabric that I had reared is now blown away, as if by the wind. A pupil of Pestalozzi, at present an inmate of the institute where I have placed my nephew, seems to think that it will be a difficult matter for him and for my poor Carl to attain any desirable goal. But he is also of opinion that the most advisable step is the removal of my nephew to a foreign country." Some action at any rate was called for if, as Beethoven averred, the lad's moral character had been "almost totally ruined;" and at length the master resolved upon sending him to an institution at Landshut, where he would be free from his "abominable mother." This was to have been done through the influence of the Archduke Ludwig; and, lest the mother should prejudice that Prince against the step, Beethoven wrote to the Archduke Rudolph, asking him to caution his imperial relative about her character. In his letter he said: "As for the conduct of the mother of my nephew, it is easy to be inferred from the fact of her having been declared by the Court wholly incapable of undertaking the guardianship of her son. All that she plotted in order to ruin her poor child can only be credited from her own depravity, and thence arises the unanimous agreement about this affair, and the boy being entirely withdrawn from her influence. Such is the natural and unnatural state of the case. I therefore beg Y.R.H. to intercede with H.R.H. Archduke Ludwig, and to warn him against listening to the slanders of the mother, who would plunge her child into an abyss whence he could never be rescued." It does not appear from the letters that the Landshut scheme was carried out; but not long after we find Beethoven writing to a certain Herr Blöcklinger, who had obviously taken charge of the boy, and giving very precise and stern directions as to who should be permitted to see him and who not. How high a tone he assumed will appear from the subjoined extract: "My nephew must never leave your house without a written permission from me. From this you will at once plainly perceive your line of conduct towards Carl's mother. I must impress on you the necessity of those rules (proceeding from the magistrates and myself) being strictly enforced. You, dear sir, are too little experienced in these circumstances, however obvious your other merits are to me, to act on your own judgment in the matter as you have hitherto done. Credulity can, in the present instance, only lead to embarrassment, the result of which might prove injurious to you rather than beneficial, and this I wish to avoid for the sake of your own credit." The letter is signed "Beethoven, sole guardian of my nephew, Carl van Beethoven." But there is evidence to show that at this time the master was not a guardian at all, either sole or joint, for we find him a month later praying the magistrates to reinstate him in the position he had given up to a substitute. In the petition he said: "Being now finally settled here, and the welfare of the boy very precious to me, both love and duty demand that I should resume my rights, especially as this talented lad is coming to an age (he was then sixteen) when greater care and expense must be bestowed on his education, on which his whole future prospects depend. This duty ought not to be confided to any woman, far less to his mother, who possesses neither the will nor the power to adopt those measures indispensable to a manly and suitable education. . . . I have hitherto taken a paternal charge of my nephew, and I intend to do the same in future at my own expense, being resolved that the hopes of his deceased father, and the expectations I have formed for this clever boy, shall be fulfilled by his becoming an able man and a good citizen. With this view I accordingly request that the highly respected magistrates whom I now address will be pleased to annul the Town Sequestrator Nussböck's interim office, and forthwith transfer me the sole guardianship of my nephew Carl van Beethoven." For some reason or other, perhaps respect for a mother's claims, the master's petition was rejected, and the previous arrangement sustained. Deeply troubled, Beethoven addressed a remonstrance to the authorities, but with no effect; and then, with characteristic obstinacy of purpose, he went to the High Court of Appeal. The petition he laid before this august tribunal is a remarkable document, full of earnestness and pathos. One cannot read it without intense sympathy for the love and zeal which animate every sentence. Here, for example, is an extract: "The welfare of my nephew is dearer to my heart than it can be to any one else. I am myself childless, and have no relations except this boy, who is full of talent, and I have good grounds to hope the best for him, if properly trained. . . . My efforts and wishes have no other aim than to give the boy the best possible education—his abilities justifying the brightest hopes—and to fulfil the trust placed in my brotherly love by his father. The shoot is still flexible, but if longer neglected it will become crooked, and outgrow the gardener's training hand, and upright bearing, intellect, and character be destroyed for ever. I know no duty more sacred than the training and education of a child." In response to this cogent appeal, and having regard to the fact that Carl's mother had just given birth to an illegitimate child (the second since her husband's death), the High Court annulled the decision of the Court below, and nominated Beethoven sole and responsible guardian.

For two and a half years from the date (January, 1820) of this settlement the letters, one excepted, are silent about Carl, but then the series addressed by the guardian to the ward himself begins. These must be reserved for future consideration. They are too important, alike in the measure of their interest and as indicative of character, to be passed over hastily. As to those already noticed, what do they show but a noble determination to discharge with faithfulness a sacred duty, and the existence in Beethoven's nature of a wealth of affection which, before restrained for want of an object, was lavished without stint upon the child intrusted to him by Providence. This, however, will appear later in forms than which nothing in universal biography is more pathetic.

"OVERPOWERING ORCHESTRAS."

Under the heading quoted above, and in the columns of the Times, public attention has recently been called to what we are taught to regard as the undue prominence of the modern orchestra. Not a few persons, amateur and professional, have had their say on the matter; and we are bound to add that not a little nonsense has been written concerning it. Taking up the subject here and now, when the voices elsewhere are hushed, our object is to undo the mischief possibly wrought by hasty generalisations on both sides, and to place the real facts and necessities of the case in a clear and simple light.

We want to show, first, that the expansion of the orchestra is inevitable, and that none of the disadvantages incidentally attendant thereupon can or ought to hinder it. The development in question is indeed but part and parcel of a movement affecting the whole domain of executive music, while that in turn is but one phase of a universal phenomenon. We make ourselves perfectly understood when, using an objectionable but handy term, we call the present a "sensational age." In nothing is the world now satisfied with the slow and sober procedure of the past. Our feelings, whether of attraction or repulsion, can only be engaged by powerful forces. Like the string of a slack bow, we vibrate only when touched by strength. We have no patience with that which is plodding and tame. We must be dazzled where there is light; or, if darkness be the object, we pooh-pooh it, unless it can be felt. Music no more than anything else can escape the prevailing influences of the age; indeed, more readily than anything else, it is touched by the dominant feeling. In what branch of human labour, for example, do we see reflected with greater strength the awakening of passion and the kindling of aspirations caused by the great moral, social, and political convulsion styled the French Revolution? It is certain that without the Revolution we should have had no Sinfonia Eroica. Is it as certain that we should have had a Beethoven—the Beethoven of actual reality? And how much of the peculiar character of modern German music may be due to the present chaotic transition state of German thought—a state characterised by the uprooting of social, philosophical, and religious landmarks before new ones had been laid down. But these considerations lead us far afield. Enough that the "sensationalism" of the age has entered into music. To it we owe our monster performances, with players by the hundred and singers by the thousand; and from it arises that constant feverish straining after "effect" which leads to results good and bad in almost infinite variety. Under such conditions the development of the orchestra is a matter of course, the more because the orchestra presents the most ample field for expansion. With the chorus you are working, so to speak, no more than four primitive colours, and are limited to whatever can be done by deepening and intensifying their hue. But the orchestra gives all shades, and not only makes possible endless combinations, but suggests actual discoveries in a region that opens wider the more it is explored. What marvel, therefore, that the modern composer exalts the orchestra, since he finds in it the readiest exponent of his thoughts, and the most powerful lever by which to lift himself to fame.

The facts above set forth must be looked in the face. They are inevitable, and he who leaves them out of his calculations upon the matter at issue is as silly as the schoolboy who labours on hoping to exhaust a recurring decimal. The power of the orchestra, like that of the House of Peers in the opinion of the Long Parliament, "has increased and is increasing." Whether it "ought to be diminished" is another question altogether, and one which we do not hesitate to answer in the negative. Experience goes to show that in the artistic world tendencies and developments which harmonise with the spirit of the age, and are general rather than local in their character, work for good rather than evil. So it is, beyond doubt, in the case under notice. Already the expansion of the orchestra in the direction of increased resources and augmented strength has revolutionised the mode of its employment when conjoined with voices. Where it was once subordinate, it has become co-ordinate, if not more. Where the instruments once merely supported the voices, moved about them in conventional forms of ornament, or filled up with rococo passages the pauses given them for rest, they now act independently in the promotion of the general design, and even carry its expression further than words and voices can follow. Any fairly representative work of modern times—the more modern the better—will exemplify this. Take, in proof, the "Schicksalslied" of Brahms; and, among operas, the later works of Wagner, in which the orchestra far more than the voices illustrates both fact and feeling. Looking at all this, it is impossible to generalise about the use—"overpowering" or other—of the orchestra. No longer do instruments necessarily play the part of accompaniment; and there may arise occasions when, on perfectly legitimate grounds, they take precedence of the voices. Each case should, therefore, be judged upon its merits, and decided not with reference to a theory now antiquated and inapplicable, but from a point of view having regard to the plan and intention of the composer.

But while the foregoing considerations should have due weight and lead to careful discrimination, they stand wholly apart from the criticisms sometimes passed upon modern performances of music which is not modern. Nothing in them excuses or, even by distortion, can be made to excuse the wrong-headedness which treats works of a former day precisely as though they belonged to the present. When a writer of "additional accompaniments" (unless he be a Mozart, and have the genius which is a law unto itself) adds to the work of another features as incongruous as a Grecian portico and a Gothic church, he meets with and deserves universal reprobation. So should he who brings to the performance of an oratorio by Handel the gigantic resources and relative supremacy of the modern orchestra. Here the conditions under which the composer wrought and by which he was guided are reversed. The original intention was—since there could have been no other—that the vocal music should reign supreme, everything else being an adjunct, and carefully treated with regard to the measure of its subordination. But a Handelian oratorio with the "overpowering orchestra" now in vogue violates that intention and something more. It thrusts the voices into the background and hides them behind a mass of mere noise, while at the same time it employs the resources of instruments capable of and intended for specific and noble effects in mere hack-work—thickening chords and doubling parts. This is the grievance which underlay the sometimes blindly sweeping letters to the Times; and we are bound to say that it is one the more severely felt because in origin so opposed to common-sense and the elementary principles of art. There is no music in mere noise, which indeed may be and often is increased at music's sole expense; and there is supreme folly in applying to works of art a century old the conditions that suit only those of our own time. But while this fact should be recognised, we must not be led blindly into a crusade against big orchestras. They have their place, and the limit of their development has even yet not been reached.

OUTSIDE the circle of those accredited teachers of an art whose exertions contribute so materially to its healthy progress, we always find a number of persons who assist in an equal degree to its degradation by pretending to show how fame and even money can be obtained without the trouble or expense of study. Theatrical engagements, for example, are promised to ladies and gentlemen who know nothing whatever of acting, the only stipulation being that the former must be bonâ fide "blondes or brunettes," and the latter "good-looking." Adults of any age, by applying to the advertiser, can be, by some process entirely unknown to the most celebrated professors, made "brilliant performers" with but little practice, and at a very moderate cost; and now we find, by an advertisement in a morning paper, that a professor of the guitar undertakes to teach voice accompaniment to ladies "by ear, in six easy lessons. Knowledge of music not necessary." We remember that at the now extinct "Dramatic College Fêtes" those who entered the "Tent of Mystery" were politely shown out at the other end, without seeing anything, and particularly told—what was perhaps quite unnecessary—not to mention the trick outside. On the same principle we may conclude that the "blondes or brunettes" and "good-looking" gentlemen who hope to receive at once theatrical engagements, the "adults" who believe that they will become "brilliant performers," and the ladies who expect to accompany themselves in "six easy lessons," without possessing any knowledge of music, are too much ashamed of their failure to confess it in print. For the sake of the arts thus lowered, and to help in the exposure of those who lower them, we should be glad, however, if one of those tempted to take advantage of these advertisements would give the result of his or her experience; and freely offer the use of our columns to any who will boldly come forward as a champion in the cause.

THE ignorance of authors upon matters connected with music is so proverbial that it excites but little surprise when, in perusing the works of even the most eminent literary men, we light upon any decisive instances of the fact. Yet in articles presuming only to convey information we can scarcely be so forgiving; and it behoves those who desire to uphold the dignity of an art rapidly asserting its true place in the world to point out any erroneous statements put forward with a confidence which might carry conviction of their truth to the minds of those as ignorant of the subjects as the writers themselves. In a notice of the meeting of the British Association in Dublin, which appeared in the Athenæum of the 10th ult., after mentioning the appreciative reception of Handel, we read the following: "Dublin has since produced the composer Michael Balfe, while to Thomas Moore and Sir John Stevenson—both natives of that city—Ireland owes the 'Melodies,' still prized by the Irish race in every quarter of the globe." Now that Moore wrote words to melodies already deeply engraven in the hearts of the people, and that Sir John Stevenson arranged them with symphonies and accompaniments which completely disfigured their native beauty, is so patent a truth that its being unknown to the very person who undertakes to write about it seems almost incomprehensible. Supposing, for instance, that in speaking of the labours of a man well known, it were to be asserted that he made some extraordinary discoveries in chemistry, the fact being that he had never contributed anything at all to the science. Assuredly this would somewhat astonish the intelligent readers of a periodical presumed to hold high rank as an authority; but how would this astonishment be increased when—to put a parallel case to that respecting Moore—it was found that the person mentioned was not a chemist at all?

WE have a word of caution for all those whose position renders them liable to be called upon, with letters of introduction, by visitors from the United States. Some time during the past season a female pianist arrived in London bearing, among others, a recommendation from an artist in America to the wife of a distinguished professor. She duly visited the lady in question, and being treated, as she thought, with incivility went home and wrote a savage letter to a friend across the Atlantic, who of course sent it to a musical paper, which equally of course printed the thing with nearly two columns of comment. The letter is one of the vilest productions conceivable. It speaks of having been ushered into a "dull and dirty-looking parlor" furnished with "a good deal of vulgar finery;" it refers to the lady of the house as "showily dressed;" describes another member of the family as "tall, thin, . . . powdered, painted, and made up badly," and criticises the bearing and conversation of both in the same complimentary spirit. It may have been that the female pianist was not received with open arms. About that we know nothing; but if American artists who come here bearing letters of introduction, and find themselves valued at a less figure than their own self-estimate, are to write letters for publication lampooning the homes and the families into which they obtain admittance, it will be necessary to take measures for keeping them on the door-step. It is bad enough for people of position in the musical world to be pestered, as they continually are, by strangers on the look-out for favours, but it is intolerable that they should run the risk of being held up to ridicule by name in American journals, and, worst of all, lectured upon through nearly two columns by an American editor.

THE vocal "star" of the Paris Conservatoire this year is a Mdlle. Vaillant, who has succeeded in carrying off the three highest rewards open to her. Mdlle. Vaillant may with special reason be called a surprising young lady, for, on what racing men call "public form," she ought to have come out of the competition at the tail-end. A student for some years, she was always classed among those without a future. Twelve months ago even, Mdlle. Vaillant took only a solitary and miserable accessit, and now she is laden with honours and eagerly sought by managers at her own terms. A propos, Mdlle. Vaillant has made the French impresarii and critics angry, by engaging herself to the Théâtre de la Monnaie of Brussels. The Grand-Opéra wanted her, and the Opéra-Comique was eager for her service, but both found that the Belgian had been first in the field. Upon this she is reproached with accepting a gratuitous education under the usual conditions, and then evading them by closing with the Brussels offer before knowing whether a French theatre would claim her. Mdlle. Vaillant's conduct, we are told, is inexcusable; while the assertion of her friends that she desires to perfect her dramatic education away from Paris is ironically pronounced "admirable." We can make some allowance for the anger excited by the young lady's behaviour. Paris has not too many singers of real worth to be able to spare even one. But, on the other hand, the French capital so often robs Brussels of her artists—as when, the other day, she took M. Bertin—that a reprisal should be accepted with equanimity as both natural and just.

A LETTER on some inaccuracies in Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians" from a correspondent who signs himself "G. A. C.," which appears in our present number, draws attention to a matter upon which we have often commented in reviewing works intended for the reference of future musical historians—we mean the plan of confidingly following the account of the career of an eminent man in one book, instead of carefully sifting the evidence to be gleaned from many. Few persons not accustomed to collating facts can form an idea how a story affecting the artistic—if not the moral—character of one who has earned a world-wide fame passes current for years, simply because no biographer sees the absolute necessity of becoming assured of the truth before committing himself to print; in proof of which we might cite instances, not only where an almost universally accepted statement has been discovered to be utterly without foundation, but where one person has been actually confounded with another of the same name. It would, we think, be an excellent method were the authorities to be named for every fact mentioned in a biography; for, independently of thus drawing the attention of those interested in the subject to these sources of information, we certainly could not then be informed that a composer who had never exercised his talents upon the lyrical drama had produced two successful Operas, or that an artist living at the time of a so-called "Biographical Dictionary" being printed, died nine years previously, for the publication of both which glaring errors we can ourselves vouch.

EVERYBODY has heard of "moral pocket-handkerchiefs," the object of which is to convey words of wisdom to the young by means of a material which, like that used for the "indestructible toys," could not be wantonly pulled to pieces by the little hands for which they were especially manufactured. It must have been a clever person who first thought of applying this idea to musical publications. At first we had elaborately executed views of places, the names of which gave the titles to the compositions; and children became thus acquainted with some of the principal cities of the world during the hours of their musical study. But we have now gone beyond this, for on the "Great Globe Quadrilles" appears a coloured representation of one half of the earth; and to prove that music keeps pace with the times, the "Cyprus Galop" contains on its title-page a "clear and authentic map of the island." The notion of thus inculcating geographical knowledge to young scholars under pretence of giving them music is so good that it should be more universally carried out. The "Multiplication Table Polka," or the "Alphabet Waltz," for example, would be excellent school-pieces, as far as the illustrations are concerned, and would no doubt command an extensive sale. We would only suggest to those composers who feel inclined to lend themselves to this undertaking that—as in the case of the "moral pocket-handkerchiefs"—the title-pages should be printed on some substance more durable than paper; for as these would probably long survive the music, it seems a pity that they should become at all torn or defaced.

PROMENADE CONCERTS.

WE have never been warm friends of these Concerts, partly because, under the direction of refreshment contractors, a certain tone is necessarily given to them antagonistic with any high feeling for art, and partly because the cross between a concert-room and a promenade prevents our considering the arena in its present shape suitable for either. Since the opening of the Concerts for the present season on the 3rd ult., however, many excellent works have been given, under the able conductorship of Mr. Arthur Sullivan, who, with Mr. Alfred Cellier to assist him occasionally in his arduous duties, presides over a thoroughly efficient orchestra. On the first evening a selection from Mr. Sullivan's comic Opera, the "Sorcerer," was a successful item in the programme; and the Overtures to "Oberon" and "William Tell" showed the sterling quality of the band to the utmost advantage. Mdlle. Alma Verdini created a very decided impression; her facile vocalisation in Verdi's "Ah fors' è lui" especially, eliciting the warmest applause; and Miss Josephine Lawrence's artistic rendering of Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Concerto in G minor deserves also to be mentioned in terms of high commendation. The announced plan of playing all Beethoven's Symphonies in regular order on the "classical nights" (with the exception of No. 9) has been strictly adhered to; and Mr. Sullivan may fairly be congratulated on the manner in which he has taken the tempi of the several movements. A new pianist, Madame Montigny-Rémaury, has won for herself a high reputation; her unexaggerated and intelligent interpretation of some of the standard and most exacting Concertos having won the good opinion of artists as well as of the general public. The vocalists have included Madame Rose Hersee, Miss Mary Davies, Miss Anna Williams, Mesdames Patey and Antoinette Sterling; Messrs. Barton McGuckin, E. Lloyd, and Maybrick; several others being promised during the season. The attendances have been very large, especially on the "classical nights."

The following paragraph, respecting a scheme of the utmost importance to those who desire to forward the cause of healthy musical education in this country, has been sent to us for publication:—"A meeting has recently been held at Marlborough House, under the presidency of the Prince of Wales, with the view of advancing the science and art of music and of founding a Royal and National College of Music. At present the Royal Academy of Music and the National Training School for Music have no connection. It is proposed, with the assent of the managers of both these institutions, to consider the best methods of bringing them into connection, so that they may co-operate in promoting higher education in the art of music, and form the basis for a new college on a more extended and permanent footing than any existing institution. An executive committee, under the presidency of Prince Christian, has been appointed, and will confer with representatives of both these institutions. It is hoped that the present scholarships given by public bodies throughout the country will be continued to the new college, and that the great city and municipal corporations, as well as individuals interested in music, will aid in founding new scholarships. In the autumn the Prince of Wales proposes to invite to a conference the chief representatives of the corporations interested in founding the new college. The following gentlemen attended the preliminary meeting at Marlborough House: His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales (in the chair), his Royal Highness Prince Christian, K.G., Earl Granville, K.G., Earl Spencer, K.G., Lord Hampton, Lord Clarence Paget, Sir Thomas Gladstone, Bart., Rev. Sir F. A. Gore Ouseley, Bart., Sir Wm. G. Anderson, K.C.B., Sir Henry Thring, K.C.B., Sir Julius Benedict, Sir Michael Costa, Right Hon. Lyon Playfair, M.P., Mr. Alderman Cotton, M.P., Mr. Samuel Morley, M.P., Major-General Scott, C.B., the Dean of St. Paul's, Mr. Thomas Chappell, Mr. C. J. Freake, Mr. Otto Goldschmidt, Mr. John Hullah, Mr. Henry Leslie, Mr. Charles Morley, Professor G. A. Macfarren, Mr. Kellow Pye, Rev. John Richardson, and Dr. A. S. Sullivan." We reserve our comments upon this undertaking until the detailed plan upon which the college is to be carried on—and, more especially, the names of the managing body—come officially before us.

The Dedication Festival of the church of St. James's, Curtain Road, Finsbury, was observed on St. James's Day and during the following week. On the evening of the 25th of July the choir was considerably augmented. The processional hymns were 164 and 136 ("Hymns Ancient and Modern," old edition); the responses, Tallis (Goss's festal arrangement). The psalms were sung to Gregorians from Helmore, the pointing being especially commendable. The Magnificat was one of a series of three à faux bourdons, arranged to first and second tones by the Rev. C. J. Ridsdale, the preacher of the evening. The Nunc dimittis was a setting of the second Parisian tone, composed for the occasion by Mr. E. Rumney Smith, the director of the choir. The anthem was H. Gadsby's fine chorus, "O Lord, our Governour," and the hymns during the service 257, 142 (part iii.), 320, 243, and 244. At mid-day on the following Sunday, the music was as follows: Introit, "Come ye blessed" (Barnby); service, Dykes in F; offertory sentences, Monk in C; Benedictus and Agnus Dei, Messe Solennelle; Paternoster (Hoyte). At Evensong a full orchestra, numbering twenty-four performers, assisted the organ in accompanying, and also in playing the voluntaries. The responses, psalms, and hymns, were the same as on St. James's Day. The service was Gadsby in C, which was sung in an efficient manner. The anthem was Shaw's "I will magnify Thee," the orchestral parts for which were written by the Conductor, Mr. E. R. Smith, to whom the success of the musical arrangements of the festival is mainly due. Mr. Walter Miller ably presided at the organ.

At the Tonic Sol-fa College a six weeks' term of musical study for precentors, teachers of singing in day and Sunday schools, reformatories, church choirs, &c., has been concluded during the past month in London. About forty students from various parts of England, Wales, and Scotland attended. There was daily practice in the art of teaching singing, voice-training, and in the special duties of precentors and choirmasters. Besides this, there were classes in composition, counterpoint, harmony, analysis, ear-training, and instruments. Evening lectures were given on instrumentation, musical form, elocution, and the art of conducting. The classes all afforded actual practice for the students; instead of lecturing to them, the teachers called upon them one by one to stand before their fellows and conduct a piece of music, give a model lesson, or sing or read a passage. Each performance was then criticised by the class and afterwards by the lecturer. The lecturers included Mr. Curwen, Rev. A. D'Orsey, B.D., Mr. H. Fisher, Mus. Doc., Mr. Proudman, Mr. McNaught, A.R.A.M., Mr. W. C. Harris, Mr. A. L. Cowley (of Dublin), Mr. L. C. Venables (conductor of the South London Choral Association), and Mr. Evans (music instructor to the London School Board). This is the third yearly session the College has held.

A Mendelssohn Concert was given at the Alexandra Palace on July 27, when Miss Anna Williams, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Mr. Vernon Rigby (who replaced Mr. Sims Reeves, absent from indisposition), and Mr. Thurley Beale appeared. The first part of the programme was devoted to Mendelssohn's works, and included the Overtures, "Marriage of Camacho" and "Ruy Blas," the Cantata "To the Sons of Art," "Infelice," "O rest in the Lord," "If with all your hearts," and a solo and chorus from the "First Walpurgis Night." The second part was miscellaneous, the Concert concluding with Weber's "Jubilee Overture." On the 1st ult. Sir Julius Benedict's Cantata "Undine" was given, and on each Saturday evening during the past month Operas in English have been performed in the theatre, under the conductorship of Mr. F. Archer, and have attracted large audiences. "Faust," "Fra Diavolo," "La Sonnambula," and "Maritana" have been amongst the Operas produced.

The St. George's Glee Union gave its usual monthly Concert at the Pimlico Rooms on Friday the 2nd ult., a feature in the programme being the pianoforte playing of Miss Julia Augarde, who selected for her solos Liszt's "Rigoletto" and Chopin's Grand Valse in A flat. Miss Clara F. Nash and Mr. R. Griffin were the vocalists. The remaining portion of the Concert was devoted to Part-songs, Glees, &c., amongst which may be specially mentioned "Here in cool grot" (Mornington), "Hear, holy power," "Masaniello" (Auber), and "Who shall win my lady fair" (Pearsall). Messrs. T. Garside and Joseph Monday conducted.

Mr. Pyatt has engaged for his autumn tour: Madame Christine Nilsson, Miss Orridge, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Santley, Mr. H. Nicholson, and Mr. Sidney Naylor. The Concerts will take place at Liverpool, September 27; Glasgow, September 30; Edinburgh, October 2; Newcastle-on-Tyne, October 4; Manchester, October 8; Nottingham, October 11; Birmingham, October 15; Leeds, October 17; Bradford, October 22.

The marriage of Mdlle. Albani with Mr. Ernest Gye took place at the Bavarian Chapel, Warwick Street, on the 6th ult.

REVIEWS.

Die Musikgeschichte in zwölf Vorlesungen. Von W. Langhans. [Leipzig: F. E. C. Leuckart, 1878.]

THE publication of these lectures, which at the time of their delivery last winter at Berlin attracted a good deal of attention, will be welcomed by all who, like ourselves, recognise in the study of the historical development of music an essential element of musical education in general. Dr. Langhans is a professor at the New Academy of Music at Berlin, and his thoughtful writings upon topics connected with the art have brought his name deservedly into prominence among the younger generation of German musical savants. He attacks his subject with the confidence of one who has mastered its details, and with the determination to adhere strictly to the self-imposed limits of a "history of music in twelve lectures;" a resolution which, however, finally breaks down before the alluring name of Richard Wagner, to whose artistic importance an entire lecture has been devoted. We are not, however, prepared to find fault with this apparent inconsistency, which, moreover, may be justified by the maxim that the artistic efforts of a past generation are most clearly reflected by the more important strivings of the present. The result is, that in the volume before us we have at once something more and something less than an "abridgment" of musical history. The author does not pretend to supply a complete enumeration of all the important facts, but while judiciously selecting and grouping his material he has succeeded in placing before his readers a series of interesting pictures en miniature of the various epochs of musical culture, which are well calculated to stimulate further inquiry and to develop a taste here and there for original research. This is exactly what is needed for a subject the study of which may be said to have scarcely yet come of age, and which still presents whole tracts of virgin soil where even the mere amateur may venture to tread in the hope of rendering valuable service to the art. In his preface Dr. Langhans remarks: "To judge by the concert-programmes and operatic répertoires of the day one is almost led to believe that music as an art took its departure from Bach, Handel, and Gluck, and that the composers of more remote periods possessed merely an antiquarian interest." With the exception of some isolated efforts to revive the works of older masters which have been made in recent years, this remark is undoubtedly just; and the author's endeavour to show by these lectures "that the musical strivings of all ages are entitled to our consideration," and "to prepare the reader for the study of more comprehensive works on the subject," has been as well-timed as it has been successful. It would be scarcely fair on the part of the connoisseur to look for much new information in a book of such modest pretensions. In his cursory review of the progress of the art, from the earliest periods to the still fermenting art-principles of the present day, the author is to a great extent guided by the few standard works which musico-historical literature has to offer. Nor does he omit, whenever the occasion presents itself, to quote his authority; and here we are glad to notice the frequent reference to A. von Dommer's excellent "Handbuch der Musikgeschichte," a volume which we should like to see in the hands of all who desire to obtain concise, yet relatively complete and reliable, information in this direction. Nevertheless, Dr. Langhans's "Lectures" may claim a distinctive merit of their own, inasmuch as he presents his subject to the reader in an attractive and thoroughly well-digested form. Perhaps the most conclusive evidence of his qualification as a writer of history is furnished in the chapter headed "Richard Wagner," to which we have already referred, where the author's known predilections for the modern reformer have been successfully curbed by the objective view of the historian. The diction is throughout lucid and suggestive, and there is an enthusiasm underlying the author's necessarily brief exposition which gives promise of more ambitious work from the same pen at no distant future.

Primer of Pianoforte Playing. By Franklin Taylor. [Macmillan and Co.]

IT is a good sign when we find works explanatory of the rudiments of an art taken out of the hands of bookmakers and confided to men who have so mastered the principles of the subject upon which they write, that they can not only reproduce the opinions of others, but lay down some rules of their own. Modern pianoforte music has necessitated new laws of fingering; and we gladly welcome, therefore, a treatise by so able a pianist as Mr. Franklin Taylor, who—however some of his brother artists may differ from him in many of his views—has evidently thoroughly thought out the matter for himself. We cannot give too much praise to his remarks upon Touch and Phrasing—two of the most important, although perhaps two of the most neglected, points in what may be termed "fashionable teaching." Our author truly says, "Touch is to the pianist what a good management of the voice is to the vocalist, or a good action of the bow to a violinist—the means of producing agreeable sounds and of executing difficulties." Some very good examples are given in illustration of the legato touch, and also of the method which should be employed in playing melody and accompaniment with the same hand, especial stress being laid upon the necessity of exercising less pressure upon the subordinate part; although we cannot quite indorse the opinion that an occasional almost imperceptible breaking of the chord, where melody and accompaniment come together, can "by no means be allowed," for not only do many excellent pianists occasionally adopt this plan of bringing out the subject in their playing, but they also recommend it in their teaching. Many examples from classical music might be quoted where this method can be legitimately employed; but it will be sufficient to mention the commencement of the slow movement of Beethoven's "Sonata Pathétique." One of the most essential, and one of the most carefully considered, portions of the book is that devoted to the fingering of arpeggios, which is reduced to so perfect a system that few pupils who attentively study it can fail to grasp the whole subject. Admirable, too, are the exercises given for passing the third finger over the thumb, and the thumb under the fingers, Ex. 40 being especially valuable for the latter object. The observations upon phrasing, with the quotations from Mendelssohn's "Lieder ohne Worte," and other well-known works, evidence much knowledge of a matter too much disregarded; and we are certain that many who pass for "brilliant performers" will profit largely by attentively perusing Mr. Taylor's very sensible remarks. We cannot agree with our author in calling an acciaccatura, a short appoggiatura. An appoggiatura is a leaning note; and to say that a short leaning note is a note not leant upon is meaningless. "If the appoggiatura is long," he says, "it takes the accent; if short, the accent falls on the principal note." Precisely so, and therefore the latter is an acciaccatura (which comes from acciaccare, to crush), and the former is an appoggiatura (which comes from appoggiare, to lean, or dwell, upon). Again, it is laid down as a rule that a long appoggiatura is "made half the length of the principal note, which is consequently reduced to half its written value." Undoubtedly this is true in many cases; but we could cite one instance at least which occurs to us from Mozart in which an appoggiatura before a crotchet is written a semiquaver; this is certainly a short appoggiatura, but by no means an acciaccatura. Much more to the purpose is the description upon page 87, that "the long appoggiatura is written as a small note of the exact length which it ought to be made in playing, and the short one as a small quaver with a short stroke crossing the hook." The mode of performing the turn, trill, mordent, &c., is very clearly given, the latter grace, especially when combined with the turn, being dissected with praiseworthy minuteness, examples being selected from Bach's "Fantasia Cromatica" and Mozart's Sonata in F. The law, however, that "all ornaments are to be played during some portion of the value of their principal note, and are not to be introduced before it" is a dangerous one, we think, to give to students; for certainly we could add innumerable exceptions to the one quoted from Beethoven's Rondo in C by Mr. Taylor. But these are only minor objections to a very excellent little treatise; and the author is fully justified in expressing a hope that the student may find in his book "some grains of useful information, and may also by its perusal be led to think for himself, which is, after all, the surest road to excellence."

The Lark now leaves his watery nest.

Clergyman's Sore Throat, or Follicular Disease of the Pharynx: its Local, Constitutional, and Elocutionary Treatment. With a Special Chapter on Hygiene of the Voice. By E. B. Shuldham, M.D., Trin. Coll., Dublin, M.R.C.S., M.A., Oxon. [E. Gould and Son.]

FINDING that in his preface the author of this book expresses a hope that his "elocutionary suggestions may be of a practical character, and not clash with those that are purely medical," it may perhaps surprise the reader to find that he commences his first chapter by defining Clergyman's Sore Throat as an "Inflammatory enlargement and ulceration of the follicles embedded in the pharyngo-laryngeal mucous membrane." Those, however, who are tempted by the title to believe that this is a work especially addressed to sufferers from the disease upon which it treats, who wish rather to have plain and straightforward rules to guide them than to be lectured into placing themselves under a doctor's care, need not be frightened at this array of medical terms, for we can assure them that, although an M.D. himself, the writer of these "suggestions" is as free from professional pedantry as can possibly be desired; and that his little treatise, apart from its usefulness, may be recommended as a very agreeable gossiping book for all whose profession leads them to use their voice before a public audience. Many very valuable hints are given regarding the real causes of hoarseness, roughness, and scraping in the throat, and these are always conveyed in forcible and appropriately earnest language; but when speaking of remedies, good, bad, and indifferent, our author not only ceases to be "dry," but becomes amusing. "If the reader," he says, "wishes to read, sing, or speak well, he has simply to buy a box of Miles Doughty's lozenges, regardless of the musical suggestions of a Garcia or a Cummings. Has he a cough or hoarseness of voice, Brown's Bronchial Troche will extinguish the former and render the voice mellifluous. Then we have cayenne lozenges and cayenne jujubes, that sting the throat and bite the tongue, making us ask, amidst our medicated flames, for a finger tip of cold water. Besides this, we have astringent lozenges, with tannin and alum as a back-bone to them, that make the tongue rough and dry up the back of the throat as though we had been out in the woods and pic-nicked on acorns very old and very dry." And speaking of cod-liver oil, he truly says that it "only enters into serious competition with the milkman and butterman. The sphere of its usefulness is to fatten the lean, to warm those that shiver, and to soothe those that incessantly cough. To look upon it as the equivalent of beef and mutton, or of phosphorus and iodine, is to mistake its properties and misapply its powers." But although Dr. Shuldham treats at length, and with much ability, the general question of voice-production, the great merit of his book is the manner in which he handles the subject of what is popularly known as "Clergyman's Sore Throat." As all public speakers or singers are more or less liable to be impeded in their professional duties by temporary derangement either of the vocal organs or the throat, there can be no question that, as a clergyman is merely an orator, he should be no more subject to these attacks than vocalists, barristers, or lecturers. Our author, however, boldly asserts that the real reason of this is that, as a rule, the clergy do not study the "reader's art;" that they, therefore, take breath spasmodically and at random; that they usually choose too high or too low a pitch, speak in too constrained a fashion, and keep too exclusively to one unvarying tone. "We would advise," he says, "that before a single word is uttered in public, the art of breathing should be studied quietly at home. Let the elocutionary pupil take the sermon that is to be preached or the address that is to be delivered. Let him stand straight up, with head erect, shoulders thrown back, and chest well forward, and both feet firmly planted on the ground. . . . In this attitude of defence—defiance, if you will—let him take a quiet inspiration by the nose, and then let speech flow out of the mouth in quiet expirations." These are words of wisdom, and we feel confident that by adopting the method here given, a clergyman will acquire the habit of properly managing his breath; and if he also follow Mr. Hullah's suggestion of finding out the compass of his voice, and then taking a note as near the middle of this compass as possible, always pitching the voice to this note, allowing it to range above and below as occasion may require or inclination may direct, there can be no doubt that he would save himself much suffering, and materially mitigate the weariness of his congregation.

Musical Examination Cards. Packet 1, and Book 2. By Walter Spinney.
[Dudley: Walter Spinney. London: Weekes and Co.]

THESE Examination Cards are said to have been "submitted and dedicated to the Academical Board of Trinity College, London, by permission." How far the "Academical Board" may agree with the following answers to the questions propounded we cannot say; but certainly in our opinion they require some revision before they can be accepted as conveying accurate knowledge to tyros: "Question: What is meant by simple common time? Answer: Four crotchets in a bar.—Question: What is meant by simple triple time? Answer: Three crotchets in a bar.—Question: What is meant by compound common time? Answer: Two or four beats in a bar, either longer or shorter than four crotchets.—Question: What is meant by compound triple time? Answer: Three beats in a bar, either longer or shorter than three crotchets.—Question: Would a bar containing four quavers be in common time; also a bar containing four minims? Answer: No." After this explanation we cannot wonder that $\frac{3}{2}$ is termed "compound triple time." We should be glad to know also whether the examiners would be satisfied with this definition of a tone and semitone: "A tone is produced by passing over one note and the next." As some alterations in the papers sent to us are made in pencil, it is possible that the word acciactura may be one which has escaped correction by the author, but the replies we have quoted to the questions can of course not be misprints.

Mozart's Twelfth Mass.
Haydn's Second Mass.
Edited, and the Pianoforte Accompaniment revised, by Berthold Tours. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE object of this notice is not to descant upon the merits of the two works named above. One, especially, is common property. Every note of it is familiar to all who are in the slightest degree musical, and we are very sure that if the general public followed the lead of Herr von Köchel and struck the "Twelfth Mass" out of the Mozart catalogue as spurious, they would regard it none the less favourably as a work of art. Haydn's Mass cannot as yet boast of the same amount of favour. Nevertheless, to assume that even a casual reader of the MUSICAL TIMES needs telling what it is like, and where its beauties lie, would be an impertinence of which we shall not make ourselves guilty.

But while remarks upon the works themselves are superfluous, much may be said respecting the edition bearing the name of Mr. Berthold Tours. The special feature of this edition is not so much the accuracy of the vocal parts secured by careful comparison with the most authentic scores, as it is the entirely new and very valuable accompaniment. Everything has its day, and in the history of the most useful thing there surely comes a time when that which is better adapted to the changed conditions of life supersedes it. So in music. The accompaniment arranged by Mr. Vincent Novello for the classic works first issued in a popular form by the house bearing his name was admirably suited to meet the exigencies of the time then present. Mr. Novello had to keep two things in view, both arising from a comparatively low standard of executive skill. First, it was needful to avoid overtaxing the powers of the performer, and, next, the obligation was imperative so to arrange the accompaniment that it should give as much support as possible to the voices. Failure to meet either of these requirements inevitably meant non-success as regards making popular the works brought forward. Mr. Novello, as we all know, did not fail. He kept well within the means of any respectably endowed player, and never allowed himself to be tempted from the duty of prompting and sustaining the voices. In these respects his edition was, and to some extent always must remain, invaluable; but the fact cannot be denied that the advance of musical education among the people generally has removed no small part of its raison d'être. The standard of popular skill among both vocalists and instrumentalists has gone up, and with this has arisen an opportunity for readapting the accompaniment of popular works so as to reproduce as many features of the full score as possible. This task, with reference to the Masses now before us, Mr. Berthold Tours undertook, bringing to it, we need not say, all the qualifications necessary for its complete discharge. Let us add, at once, that his success lies beyond the possibility of doubt. Yet that the work was not easy those who have attempted to do the like will be first to grant. It required great taste and judgment in deciding what to include and what to reject, having regard to the claims of the composition on the one hand and the genius of the instrument on the other; but we believe that a comparison of the new pianoforte accompaniment with the full score will show that, while Mr. Tours has added nothing, neither has he omitted anything essential to the author's design. More to the present purpose, however, is a comparison between the edition before us and that of Mr. Novello. We do not go too far when saying that those who know the two Masses simply by the old pianoforte score will scarcely recognise the effect produced by the later arrangement. To estimate the difference let the reader take Mozart's work and place the "Credo" and "Sanctus" of the old edition by the side of the same movements in the new, or contrast the "Qui tollis" of the one with the "Qui tollis" of the other. These examples suffice to show the immense gain accruing from Mr. Tours's labours—a gain not only of effect but of fidelity to the original. Illustrations of equal cogency might be found in Haydn's "Second Mass," but they need not take up our space. Enough that the principle which has guided Mr. Tours in the new edition is one which all lovers of music can appreciate, and that from its carrying out nothing but good has resulted. In conclusion we must congratulate the editor upon the result achieved, and trust that his skill and taste may be yet further exercised in the same direction.

This is the birthday of my love. Song. Words by Sir J. Bland Burgess, 1790. Music by Charles Gardner. [Ashdown and Parry.]

THERE is much refinement of style, as well as true feeling for the quaint poetry chosen for illustration, evidenced in this little song, which, without pedantic obtrusiveness of scholastic knowledge, is evidently the work of an accomplished artist. The flowing theme in $^{12}_{8}$ time, with the triplet accompaniment, is happily contrasted with the change of key, the alteration from compound to simple time, and the new figure in the accompaniment on the words "The lovely earth is once a year dressed out in Spring's array." A composition so unpretentious, and yet so obviously the result of mature thought, should find favour with vocalists, even in the present overstocked state of the song-market.

Asking. Song. Words by Mary Cowden Clarke.
Be true to my love. Song. Words by Mary Cowden Clarke. Composed by W. Borrow. [Metzler and Co.]

THE first of these songs has a subject scarcely of sufficient interest to bear being, without the slightest alteration, set for three verses. "Be true to my love" has a better theme; but melody and accompaniment must not walk up from dominant to key-note as we find them do between bars 1 and 2, page 3; and we should like to substitute a G for the B in the bass (bar 10, same page), for, apart from the leading-note leaping down to the third of the tonic harmony, the melody requires a fundamental bass. In other respects the song is melodious and vocal.

Stars. Song. Written and composed by Suchet Champion. [Howard and Co.]

IF composers will insist upon writing their own verses without possessing any special gift for the task, they ought not to complain if both words and music of their songs rise not beyond mediocrity; for there is really no more reason why a musician should be a poet than that a poet should be a musician. Our greatest song-writers have been inspired by the poetry existing around them; and the attempt to heighten by a sympathetic musical colouring the effect of words already eloquent in their simple beauty has produced some of our richest vocal treasures. It is certainly a proof of modesty when a man has but little to say in music, to say that little through verses of his own making; but the question, as a mere matter of art, is whether we want such manufacture at all; and believing that it is really only as an art-work—great or small—that an honest reviewer should consider a composition submitted for his judgment, composers who are content with the "line of endeavour" (as Mr. Carlyle calls it) of Mr. Suchet Champion must not be surprised if we either pass over their works altogether, or take them as themes upon which to express our general convictions upon a very important subject. The song before us is neither better nor worse than many of the same class forwarded to us; but, as might be expected, the music is superior to the poetry. The harmonies are carefully written; but the author's attention should be drawn to the omission of the ♯ before the Gs in the voice part, where the melody commences in A, an error which, curiously enough, again occurs in the second verse.

Spring Flowers. Trio for Female Voices. Words by Knight Summers. Music by Theodore Drew. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

A MELODIOUS and smoothly harmonised Trio, well adapted for drawing-room singing. For the due expression of the words we think that the composer clings too much to his original key, especially as he does not hesitate to give variety of rhythm; but amateurs will no doubt be grateful for a composition which will enable them to give pleasure to their listeners at the expenditure of so little trouble to themselves.

Collection of Elementary and Progressive Pieces for the Pianoforte. In Two Books. By A. Ehmant. [Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

WE have never endorsed the opinion that the study of music should be considered an amusement, and consequently can conscientiously do no more than award that praise due to ingenuity and industry to those who invent "games" by which children in the hours which should be devoted to play are supposed to gain a thorough knowledge of notation, time, and accent. But, on the other hand, there can be no possible reason why the little lessons which are placed before beginners should be dry and uninteresting. That this fact is now beginning to be admitted may be proved by the number of small pieces for children by modern composers, and also by the republication of many in the classical form by the older writers, intended to replace the dreary arrangements of antiquated airs in the conventional "Instruction-Book," or (what may perhaps be considered still worse) easy transcriptions of "Royalty songs," the melodies of which are presumed to have made their way from the drawing-room into the nursery. The collection of progressive pieces now before us we can most decidedly recommend as admirably suited for their intended purpose. The early lessons are carefully considered, and the little sketches which follow—all of which have titles—are melodious and full of character. The Second Book contains some more important compositions, amongst the best of which may be mentioned "Undine," "Valse Mélancolique," and "Dance round the Maypole."

Modern Classics for the Pianoforte. Edited, revised, and fingered, by C. Wilhelm. No. 15, Promenade—Heller. [Wood and Co.]

ALL who know that this piece forms one of a set of sketches by Stephen Heller, called "Promenades d'un Solitaire," must be astonished to find it published in a detached form under the unmeaning title of "Promenade." The fingering is, of course, to amateurs, a boon; and the editing means, we presume, correcting the proofs; but in what manner has the composition been "revised"? Surely the accredited editions of these charming pieces have been before the public long enough to let us know what the composer meant; and although we may wish, for the sake of the art, that they should be from time to time republished, we care not that their original form shall be in the slightest degree disguised. As we see that these "Modern Classics" are to be continued, we venture to hope that in future the "revision" of the works included in the series will be conducted with a due reverence for their composers.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE congress periodically convened by the Allgemeine Deutsche Musikverein invariably presents some features eminently characteristic of German musical life and of modern art-consciousness in general which render it one of the most interesting events of the year. On these occasions debates and lectures on prominent musical questions are alternated by the performance of works chiefly by contemporary composers, and the consequent personal interchange of ideas forms not the least important item in the net result produced by these gatherings. It will be remembered that at the congress held last year at Hanover special attractions were offered to the assembled musicians in the performance of Byron's "Manfred," with Schumann's music, and of an opera by Peter Cornelius. The programme of this year's meeting, which took place some few weeks ago at Erfurt, included no operatic performances, but the proceedings were nevertheless of the highest interest, including moreover the active co-operation of Franz Liszt. During the six concerts given in connection with the Erfurt meeting, the performances consisted for the greater part of new works by members of the association, among which we will only instance the following: Te Deum (Friedrich Kiel); Symphony in G (Felix Dräseke); 13th Psalm, for Tenor solo, chorus, and orchestra (Liszt); "Phæton," symphonic poem (Saint-Saëns); Notturno and Allegro risoluto (H. von Bülow); 130th Psalm (Joachim Raff); Trio for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello (H. von Bronsart); Quintett for pianoforte and stringed quartett (Sgambati, an Italian pupil of Liszt); two Episodes from Lenau's "Faust," for orchestra (Liszt); Symphonic poem, "Hungaria" (Liszt). In the course of the congress, lectures on technical and educational subjects connected with the art were delivered by Herren A. Hahn (the energetic editor of Tonkunst), R. Krause, and Dr. Langhans; and the meeting generally is described as having been one of exceptional interest.

The operatic season is about to recommence on the Continent. The Royal Opera-house at Berlin was announced to reopen its doors on the 23rd ult., with a performance of Weber's "Oberon," to be succeeded by Cherubini's "Water-Carrier," and Wagner's "Lohengrin." The Imperial Opera at Vienna resumed its performances on the 15th ult., with a revival of Meyerbeer's "Le Prophète." At the same establishment first representations of Herr Wagner's "Siegfried" and M. Gounod's "Philémon et Baucis" are in sight for the coming autumn. It is stated that the previous season has left a deficit of 300,000 florins to the imperial institution.

"Meister Martin der Küfer" is the title of a new opera by W. Weissheimer, founded upon the well-known tale of C. T. A. Hoffman, which is shortly to be produced on the Carlsruhe stage. At Frankfort a new operatic work from the pen of A. Dietrich, entitled "Robin Hood," has likewise been accepted for representation during the coming campaign.

Madame Adelina Patti and Signor Nicolini have, it is stated, accepted engagements for the ensuing season, both at the Kroll'sche Theater at Berlin and at the Stadt Theater of Hamburg.

Mr. Sebastian Bach-Mills, an American pianist, who has already gained considerable reputation on the other side of the Atlantic, has recently made a very successful début at a concert held at Wiesbaden. He has been a pupil of the Leipzig Conservatorium.

The Deutsche Bade-Zeitung vouches for the accuracy of the following anecdote emanating from Kissingen: "Since the arrival here of Prince Bismarck the town is swarming with enterprising concert-speculators. One of their number, a certain Herr Julius Grauer, petitioned the prince on the very first day of his stay here to accept the patronage of an orchestral body which he was about to organise for the sole purpose of producing at the Kurhaus on four successive evenings a 'Sinfonia attentatica' (sic), of which Herr Grauer confessed himself the author. The 'symphony' in question is composed of three movements only, of which the opening one embodies the murderous attempt of Kullmann at Kissingen as the 'Leitmotiv,' while the two remaining parts, with the device of 'Unter den Linden,' illustrate in tones the two subsequent attempts made upon the life of the Chancellor at Berlin. It need scarcely be added that some pistol-shooting is likewise included in the score of this interesting work." Prince Bismarck has, it is added, "not yet vouchsafed a reply to the petition," being probably already sufficiently well acquainted with the original "leading motive" of the pistol-shooting alluded to in the above "symphony" to be able to dispense with its artistic interpretation at the Kurhaus.

The experiment recently tried at the Cologne Theater of sinking the orchestra below the floor of the house, after the model of the Bayreuth arrangements, is said to have been attended with complete success.

An interesting festival was recently celebrated by the eminent music-publishing firm of Breitkopf and Härtel, of Leipzig, the occasion being the fiftieth anniversary of the entry of the present senior partner, Herr Raimond Härtel, into the business. Among the numerous commemorative gifts of which Herr Härtel was the recipient, one of the most interesting was that presented by the personnel of his office, consisting of a handsome portfolio, adorned with the crest of the firm, and containing a photographic copy of the first official document written by the veteran member of the house, viz., a letter directed to the still flourishing firm of F. Lucca, at Milan. Congratulatory addresses (delivered either personally or through the medium of the telegraph) continued to arrive from all parts during the festive proceedings of the day.

Notices of the concerts of all nations, incidental to the Paris International Exhibition, continue to fill the columns of French music journals, but we must again limit ourselves to the selection of a few programmes which will be found, as usual, at the conclusion of these notes. Just now the vocal entertainments given by some 150 Swedish and Norwegian Students are creating a furore at the French capital, similar to that elicited by the Spanish Estudiantina some few months ago during the Carnival, with this difference, however, that the performances of the Scandinavian rivals of the latter possess a real musical value. They are the representatives of the exceedingly well-trained vocal societies of the Universities of Upsala and Christiania, led by Herren Hedenblad and Behrens.

The very interesting collection of manuscripts of great composers now being exhibited in Paris includes—besides numerous specimens from the pen of Haydn, Mozart (above all the original score of "Don Giovanni"), Gluck, Lulli, Rameau, Grétry, and others—the original score of Cherubini's "Les Deux Journées," a Cantata by J. S. Bach, and fragments from Handel's "Acis and Galatea."

The success of Verdi's "Aïda," in the French version of the libretto, has been such that the contemplated closing of the Théâtre-Lyrique had to be postponed. At the same establishment a new opera by the Marquis d'Ivry, entitled "Les Amants de Vérone," in which M. Capoul is to sing the principal rôle, is in course of preparation. The sujet of the new work is founded on Shakespeare's comedy of the "Two Gentlemen of Verona."

M. Victor Massé, the composer of "Paul et Virginie," has been relieved from his duties as chef des chœurs at the Grand-Opéra. He retires from his post on the small pension of 1,275 francs.

After an absence of six weeks Mdlle. Krauss made her reappearance at the Paris Opéra at the beginning of last month as Valentine in Meyerbeer's "Les Huguenots."

Recent numbers of Le Ménestrel contain a series of interesting explanatory articles relative to the new double-keyboard pianoforte of Messrs. Mangeot Frères, to which we have already referred in these columns. The articles are written by M. Zarebski, the able artistic exponent of the distinctive advantages possessed by this remarkable instrument.

The Paris correspondent of the Times, writing under date 22nd ult., says: "An acoustic experiment was made yesterday with the captive balloon. Twenty musicians went up in it and played Bilse's 'Storm,' while the other half of the band responded from below. The ruins of the Tuileries gave back a decided echo, and people in the street were surprised at hearing the 'music of the spheres after this fashion. The experiment is to be repeated under more favourable atmospheric conditions."

On the 7th ult. died at Vienna the only surviving sister of Franz Schubert, Madame Therese Schneider, at an advanced age. Of the eighteen brothers and sisters of the great composer only two brothers now remain alive.

The death is announced at Madrid of Don Hilarion Eslava, one of the most talented of Spanish composers, and for many years director of the Conservatorio of the Spanish capital. His compositions for the church, especially, are held in great estimation among his countrymen, but he was also the successful composer of several operas, as well as author of some theoretical works of merit. His publication entitled "Lira Sacro Hispaña"—a very interesting collection of religious music, including numerous compositions by old Spanish masters—reflects great credit also upon his critical knowledge. Eslava died on July 23, at the age of seventy-one.

We subjoin, as usual, the programmes of Concerts recently given at some of the leading institutions abroad:—

Paris.—Exhibition Concert, Sweden and Norway (July 24): Sonata for pianoforte and violin (Grieg); Octett for strings (Svendsen); Trio in E flat (Berwald). Concert Officiel of Chamber Music (August 2): Trio for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello (Lacombe); Quintett, D minor, (Onslow); Quartett, Op. 41 (Saint-Saëns). Grand Concert Officiel (August 8): Overture, "La Muette" (Auber); Fragments from a Mass (Ambroise Thomas); Symphony Romantique (Joncières); Marche Nuptiale (Wider); 6th Psalm (Lefèbvre); Andante and Finale from "Carnaval" (Guirand). Concert Officiel of Chamber Music (August 9): Trio (Op. 1) for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello (Auber); Stringed Quartett in A minor (Boély); Quintett in D minor for pianoforte and strings (Boisdeffre). Concert Officiel of Chamber Music (August 16): Quartett, Op. 15 (Léon Kreutzer); Concerto capriccioso for pianoforte (Dubois); Intermezzo for stringed quintett (Taudon); Trio (Op. 41) for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello (Lacombe). Grand Concert Officiel (August 22): Fragments from Symphonie Gothique (B. Godard); Scène Fantastique for orchestra and chorus, "Le Rêve d'Hoffman" (H. Salomon); Symphony for organ and orchestra (Guilmant); Airs de danse d'"Herculanum" (F. David); Fragments from "Sept Paroles du Christ," for chorus and soli, orchestra and organ (Dubois). Concert Officiel of Chamber Music (August 23): Quartett, Op. 5 (A. Luigini); Quintett No. 3 in G for wind instruments (Reicha); Andante in F for stringed quartett (Altés); Quartett for pianoforte and strings (Chaine).

Leipzig.—Concert in memory of F. von Holstein (July 12): Trio for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello; Scene from Schiller's "Braut von Messina;" Sonata (Op. 28) for pianoforte; Airs from "Rattenfänger von Hameln" and "Haideschacht;" Songs for mixed chorus (Holstein).

Dresden.—Conservatorium Concerts (July 4): Motett "Jesu meine Freude" (Bach); Overture "Freischütz;" Concerto for violin, No 6 (Spohr); Rondo for clarinet; Concerto in F minor (Weber); Concerto in G minor (Mendelssohn); Vocal soli. July 13: Jubilate (Handel); Concerto for pianoforte in D minor (Mozart); Air from "Mitrane" (Rossi, 1648); Hungarian Fantasia for violoncello (Grützmacher); Romances for chorus (Schumann); Choral Fantasia (Beethoven).

Baden Baden.—Concert of the Curcomité (August 20): Overture "Ruy Blas" (Mendelssohn); Violin concerto (No. 2), with orchestra, unpublished (Joachim Raff); Violin solos (Bach and Rubinstein); March from "Die Folkunger" (Kretschmer); Vocal soli.

Kissingen.—Concert of A. Eichhorn (July 17): "Faust" overture (Wagner); Tonbilder, from the "Nibelungen," for violin and orchestra (Eichhorn); "Danse macâbre" (Saint-Saëns); Gipsy melodies (Sarasate); Concert Fantasia for bass violoncello (Eichhorn).

CORRESPONDENCE.

GROVE'S "DICTIONARY OF MUSIC."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—On looking through the third part of Mr. Grove's "Dictionary of Music," I noted a few memoranda which perhaps you may like to publish.

CARTER, THOMAS, was the elder son of Timothy Carter, who was appointed a member of the choir of Christ Church Cathedral, Dublin, in 1740. His younger brother was Sampson Carter, Mus. D., for many years a professor of music in Dublin. The date of Thomas Carter's birth has been sometimes incorrectly stated. Mr. Husk's date, "cir. 1735," is right. But Mr. Husk implies, following probably the article on Carter in that very untrustworthy book, the "Dictionary of Musicians," published by Sainsbury, 1825, that Carter went to Italy at an early age, under the patronage of Lord Inchiquin, to complete his musical education. This, so far as the date is concerned, cannot be the case. Carter was appointed organist of St. Werburgh's Church, Dublin,* in December, 1751, and held the appointment till 1769, when he was about thirty-four years of age, and it was then that he visited Italy. This is confirmed by the statement in Sainsbury's "Dictionary" that when at Naples he was noticed by Sir William Hamilton,† Sir William not having been appointed ambassador to the Court of Naples till 1764. On his return from Italy Carter went to India, where he did not remain long, and finally settled in London about 1773. It may be well to notice here a doubt recently raised respecting the date of Carter's death, which is recorded in the Gentleman's Magazine for 1804 as having taken place on the 12th of October in that year. In looking through the records of the Irish Musical Fund Society Sir Robert Stewart discovered the name of Thomas Carter, and was at first led to think that it was that of the composer, no other member of the musical profession of the name being known in connection with Dublin. Sir Robert kindly sent me copies of all entries in the records relating to this person, from which it appeared that on June 6, 1803, "Mr. Thomas Carter, professor," was proposed as a member of the Society, and was elected on July 4 following. Dr. Sampson Carter was then president of the Society, and was present at the meeting in July. Thomas Carter attended various meetings of the Society until 1808, on July 18 in which year he was ordered to be expelled for non-payment of his subscription. This order was, however, rescinded. In 1809 Carter was fined for non-attendance at the commemoration concert on May 7, but the fine was remitted in the following month on the production of a certificate of illness. Carter may have died soon afterwards; at any rate his name disappears from the records from that time.

All this looked as if the composer might have returned to Dublin in his old age, and that the notice of his death in the London journals was premature. But on further investigation I found that the statement in the Gentleman's Magazine was perfectly correct. A notice of Carter (quoted in Nichols's "Literary Illustrations," vol. vii., p. 594) appeared also in the London Evening Post of the 18th of October, and this notice was copied verbatim into the Dublin Journal for October 25, with the addition that Carter died in London. The Thomas Carter of the Musical Fund Society was therefore a different person.

I may take this opportunity of clearing Carter's character from an imputation brought against it of plagiarism, or worse, in connection with his most popular ballad, "O Nanny, wilt thou go with me?" In 1847, a Mr. Williams, a grandson of Joseph Baildon, the composer, wrote a letter to the Gentleman's Magazine, in which he claimed this song for his grandfather. His story was as follows: That early in 1774 Baildon composed the air in question, and gave it to his daughter (afterwards Mrs. Williams) to copy; that on Baildon's death on May 7 following, his house and effects were sold by auction, when the manuscript was purchased by Carter, and immediately published by him as his own composition; that Miss Baildon, having married in the same year and left England, had no opportunity at the time of exposing the fraud; and that long afterwards she related the circumstances to her son, who about 1833 went to Sir George Smart and informed him of what he had learned. Mr. Williams also states that the first line of the song originally commenced "O Betsy, wilt," and that Baildon altered the name to Nanny, "as being more accented."

What Sir George Smart thought of the story does not appear, and the question seems to have slumbered for fourteen years more. Under any circumstances it seems strange that Mrs. Williams should never have said anything of the matter till 1833, when she must have been nearly eighty years of age, a time of life when the memory of past events is seldom trustworthy; but while her son no doubt wrote his letter in good faith, it is a signal example of the danger of trusting to "recollections," as well as of the impropriety of bringing charges against any one without substantial facts to support them. There was, however, a substratum of truth in the story, and this Mr. Williams might have ascertained had he been as well acquainted with his grandfather's works as in duty he ought to have been. The facts are these: Baildon did compose music to Percy's ballad, his daughter no doubt copied the manuscript, and the auction took place as stated; but the rest of the story is a mere baseless assumption. In place of having been sold to Carter or to any one else, Baildon's composition is to be found in print in a collection of his songs entitled "The Laurel," in two books, and published by Harrison and Co., 18, Paternoster Row. This collection bears no date, but was probably published in Baildon's lifetime, and if so the song must have been composed before 1774. It is headed, "A Song in the Scotch manner, sung by Mr. Beard," and there is not a shadow of resemblance between it and Carter's setting. I subjoin a quotation of part of the melody:—

* Parish Registers of St. Werburgh's.—GILBERT, "Hist. Dublin," i. 34.

† Sainsbury's "Dictionary" says, "Sir William and Lady Hamilton," but Sir William was not married till 1789.

A SONG IN THE SCOTCH MANNER.

Oh, Bet- sy, wilt thou gang wi' me, Nor sigh to leave the flaunt- ing town? Can si - lent glens have tr
charms for thee, The low - ly cot, and rus - set gown?

As regards the change of the name, Mr. Williams has exactly inverted the fact. The words as written by Percy commenced "O Nancy," but in Baildon's song they begin "O Betsy." This change therefore is due to Baildon, and I cannot think it creditable to his judgment.

Before dismissing the subject I may remark that in the Gentlemen's Magazine for 1847 a discussion arose as to whether the English or the Scottish form of the words is the original. The lines are said to have been addressed by Percy (afterwards Bishop of Dromore) to Anne, daughter of Barten Goodriche, Esq., of Desborough, whom he married in 1759. This gives us an approximate date for their composition and accounts for the name Nancy. Now, à priori, one would say that an Englishman addressing an English lady would write in modern English; but it may, perhaps, be suggested that, had the fancy taken him, the editor of the "Reliques" was not an unlikely man to have clothed his thoughts in either an archaic or a Scottish dress, as being more picturesque, though the song contains nothing Scottish either in thought or expression. In Nichols's "Literary Illustrations," vol. vii., p. 247, is a letter to Percy from his friend Dr. Grainger, dated February, 1758, in which Grainger, speaking of the Grand Magazine, then lately started, requests Percy to contribute some poetry to it; and adds that "they (the proprietors) were especially urgent with me for your Scotch song." The name of the song is not given, but the date of Grainger's letter, coupled with the fact of Percy's marriage to Miss Goodriche in the following year, gives colour to the belief that "O Nancy," was meant. If this be so, it would seem that the song was originally a pseudo-Scotch one, so far at least as the spelling is concerned. There is not a single word in it that is peculiar to Scotland. Whatever the "Scotch song" to which Grainger refers may have been, it did not appear in the Grand Magazine;* but in the same year, 1758, "O Nancy," was inserted in the sixth volume of Dodsley's "Collection" in a purely English form. This then is the form in which it was first published. May we suppose that Percy was unable to comply with his friend's request, in consequence of having already promised or given the song to Dodsley, and that on its publication in the "Collection" (and perhaps by Dodsley's advice) he stripped Nancy of her Scottish masquerade dress. Between the Scottish and English texts a solitary difference of reading is found, but it is one which seems to me worthy of notice. In the Scottish form the second stanza begins thus—

O Nancy, when thou'rt far awa',
Wilt thou not cast a wish behind?
Say, canst thou face the flaky snaw,
Nor shrink before the warping wind?

Now the expressions "flaky snaw" and "warping wind" go well together. They are suitable to a supposed residence in a highland cottage, and harmonise with the "silent glens" spoken of in the first stanza; but in giving the words an English form, "snow" would not rhyme to "away," and a change was therefore necessary. Accordingly, in Dodsley, for "flaky snaw" we find "parching ray," which is rather suggestive of a journey to India, and somewhat inconsistent with the expressions employed in the preceding stanza. In Baildon's setting of the song, which no doubt is older than Carter's, the words preserve the Scottish character throughout, and the composer has given the same to his music. This Carter has not attempted to do, and it is likely that he adopted the words as he found them in Dodsley's "Collection." His melody was probably published about 1775, and was sung by Joseph Vernon at Vauxhall. In an old copy of the song in score for instruments I find it headed "Sung by Mr. Vernon," and the words purely English.

Some confusion has been caused by the absurd practice which some publishers adopted of printing the words in a mixed form, by Scotticising the first line only. The song ought to be in either Scotch or English from beginning to end. I have only to add that the change of the name from "Nancy" to "Nanny" was probably made for the purpose of avoiding the sibilant in singing. The success of "O Nanny" induced Carter, some years afterwards, to publish another song as an answer to it, entitled "Oh William, I will gang with thee," but, like most answers, it is inferior to the original.

Catley, Ann.—Without any wish to rake up old scandals, and still less to say a word in favour of a man of the character of Sir Francis Delaval, I may add that the action brought against him by Miss Catley's father has very much the appearance of an attempt to extort money, and that when Lord Mansfield commented on the case he was not fully informed of the young lady's previous history.

It is a common error to connect the tune to the Advent Hymn, now commonly known as "Helmsley," with either Miss Catley or the "Golden Pippin." The hymn-tune was published by John Wesley in 1765, under the name of "Olivers," when Miss Catley was in Ireland, and long before the "Golden Pippin" was written. Its first strain, however, seems to have been suggested by a popular song of the day entitled "Guardian angels, now protect me," and the melody of this song, adapted to the words "Where's the mortal can resist me," was introduced into the "Golden Pippin" in 1776. It was not in the burletta as first produced in 1773. A hornpipe constructed from the same tune appears also to have been danced by Miss Catley in the "Golden Pippin," but this was several years after the publication of the hymn-tune.

Parke, in his "Musical Memoirs" (ii. 252), has the following reference to Miss Catley: "The staccato style of singing, hitherto ridiculed by the Italians, first introduced on the opera stage by Mdlle. Sontag, was practised with equal success fifty years ago by Miss Catley. That lady, who was a prodigious favourite with the public, sung the whole of Fischer's minuet staccato in the burlesque opera of 'Tom Thumb,' first performed 1780, with most extraordinary power of voice and articulation, and in it was at all times vehemently encored."

Clarke-Whitfeld, John.—The statement that Dr. Clarke removed to Dublin shortly after his appointment as organist of Armagh Cathedral is incorrect. He succeeded Richard Langdon at Armagh in 1794, and held the appointment for three years. He states this himself in a preface to the second volume of his "Cathedral Music," 1805.* He was succeeded by Dr. Jones in 1797. Whether he became connected with the Dublin Cathedrals in that year I do not know, but it appears from the Chapter Acts of St. Patrick's Cathedral that, on March 17, 1798, "by concurrence of the Chapters of Christ Church and St. Patrick's, Dr. John Clarke was appointed master of the boys."* Soon afterwards the rebellion which broke out in that year was probably the cause of his leaving Ireland, and he became organist of Trinity and St. John's Colleges, Cambridge. It should also be added that Clarke's degree of Doctor was conferred by the University of Dublin in 1795. The Cambridge degree, which he received on December 14, 1799, was ad eundem.†

"ELIJAH" IN NEW YORK.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—I notice in the MUSICAL TIMES for July a note to the effect that Mendelssohn's "Elijah" was performed in New York for the first time, complete, during the past season. This is a mistake. On referring to my book of programmes, in which I preserve a programme of every opera and concert at which I attend or sing, I find record of the complete performance of "Elijah" on the following occasions: November 29, 1875, by the Centennial Choral Union, under the direction of George F. Bristow; June 7, 1867, by the New York Harmonic Society, directed by F. L. Ritter; Oct. 31, 1871, by the New York Harmonic Society, directed by Dr. James Pech. On this occasion the soloists were Miss Edith Wynne, Madame Patey, Mr. W. H. Cummings, Mr. J. G. Patey, and Mr. Charles Santley. The chorus numbered 300, and the orchestra 62.

"Elijah" has been performed on other occasions also of which I have no record. Selections from this Oratorio have frequently been given.

Very truly yours,

ALFRETON HERVEY.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

BANBURY.—An Organ Recital was given at the Parish Church by Mr. G. A. Hardacre on the 17th ult., when a collection was made in aid of the Pulpit Fund. The programme was exceedingly interesting, including the Sonata in B flat No. 4 (Mendelssohn), Toccata in F (Bach), Overture in F (Thorne), &c.

BARBADOS, WEST INDIES.—A Concert, in aid of the "Goodridge Home," an institution founded by Mrs. Hinds Howell, of Norwich, England, for the relief of ladies who have fallen in circumstances, was given by Mr. J. S. Bowen, Organist of St. Ambrose, at the Albert Hall, on Tuesday evening, July 23. The programme included instrumental extracts from the works of Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Ketterer, and Schmidt, and vocal selections from Haydn, Blumenthal, Weber, Gounod, and Pinsuti. The audience was large and appreciative. Encores were accorded to songs by Mrs. Lawrence and Mrs. Greaves; a selection from Beethoven's Septett, arranged for clarinet, violoncello, and piano, played by Mr. Doorly, Mr. Clarke (of the Army Control Department), and Mrs. Trowbridge; Galop de Concert (Ketterer), for piano, by Miss Nightingale; and Gounod's "Serenade," sung by Miss Shute. Mr. Bowen's solos were much appreciated by the audience, and his efforts have realised about £36 for the deserving Charity.

BRADFORD.—An Inauguration Service in connection with the organ recently erected in the Wesleyan Chapel, Otley Road, was held on Thursday evening, the 1st ult. The Rev. W. O. Simpson, of Horton, preached a most impressive sermon, prior to which Mr. J. H. Rooks, of Richmond, performed the Fantasia, with Choral (Henry Smart), and Sonata No. 2 (Mendelssohn), and, after the sermon, "Hommage à Beethoven," adapted for the Organ by J. H. Rooks; Andante No. 2 in F (Sir F. A. G. Ouseley); "Triumphal March," Naaman (Costa). The new organ reflects great credit upon Messrs. Conacher and Co., the builders, and its beauties were most effectively brought out by the organist. The chapel choir sang several hymns and anthems in a very creditable manner.

BRIGHOUSE.—On Tuesday evening, the 5th ult., the Brighouse branch of the Church of England Temperance Society held its first Festival in the parish church. A procession of members and choir formed at the school and, preceded by four brass instruments, marched to the church singing "Brightly gleams," &c., to Sullivan's tune. Arriving in the church the organist played the Andante from Mozart's Quartett, which was followed by a hymn. The prayers were monotoned by the Rev. G. Oldacres, M.A., curate. The psalms were chanted to Patten and Jacobs, the Magnificat to Hackett, and the Nunc dimittis to Roberts. The anthem, "The Lord is loving" (Garrett), was well rendered by the choir, augmented by that of St. James's. After singing a few special hymns the service was brought to a close by the Organist, Mr. J. H. Pearson, playing "Marche Triomphale" (Moscheles).

BRISBANE, AUSTRALIA.—The large attendance at the School of Arts on the occasion of Mr. Jefferies' farewell Benefit Concert was a decisive recognition of the value of his services as Conductor—and, indeed, founder—of the Brisbane Musical Union. The compositions chosen for performance were Handel's Acis and Galatea and Mendelssohn's Athalie, both of which were excellently rendered, the choral portions, especially, evidencing the care with which the works had been prepared. At the conclusion, Mr. Jefferies received from performers and audience a burst of applause as warm as it was well deserved. At the conversazione, held at the School of Arts for the purpose of wishing a pleasant voyage and safe return to Mr. and Mrs. Jefferies, various musical selections were given by members of the Union, and a most enjoyable evening was spent.

BUXTON.—An extra Concert was given by Mr. Julian Adams at the Pavilion on the 1st ult., the principal vocalists being Madame Sinico, Mdlle. Ronayne, and Mr. Lascelles (who replaced Signor Campobello, absent from indisposition). The solo violin playing of Mr. Carrodus was a conspicuous feature in the programme; and in his Concertante duet with Mr. Julian Adams (pianoforte) both performers received warm and well deserved applause. Madame Sinico's singing was thoroughly appreciated; and Mdlle. Ronayne (who has a fine contralto voice) made an excellent impression upon the audience. The orchestral pieces were most effectively rendered under the intelligent conductorship of Mr. Julian Adams.

CHARD.—Mr. L. N. Parker, Associate of the Royal Academy of Music, recently gave his second annual Lecture on behalf of the Musical Union, a Society established about three years ago through his instrumentality and exertions, and of which he has since been the hardworking and zealous honorary Conductor. The subject chosen was "Mozart," that on the first occasion being "Beethoven." Dr. Williams occupied the chair. Mr. Parker treated the subject in his usual free and effective style, and his illustrations on the pianoforte were excellent. The chairman at the close warmly thanked Mr. Parker, and said that the members of the Sherborne Vocal Union could not sufficiently testify to the untiring energy, persevering zeal, and self-denial, which had always been shown by him in conducting with such success the efforts of the Society. He then handed to Mr. Parker, in the name of the Union, a handsome drawing-room timepiece. In returning thanks for the present, Mr. Parker said that when he came into the town some few years ago he found it full of strangers; now he ventured to think it was full of friends. The timepiece was supplied by Messrs. Cole and Son, and on a plate in the front the following inscription was very neatly engraved:—"Presented, together with a purse of gold, to L. N. Parker, Esq., A.R.A.M., on his marriage, by the Sherborne Musical Union, Aug. 7, 1878."

GUELPH, ONTARIO.—Mr. Philp recently gave an excellent Concert of Sacred Music at the Dublin Street Methodist Church, when the organ playing of Miss Cossitt, Miss Goodfellow, and Mrs. James Clarke were conspicuous features in the programme. The vocal solos of Miss Willoughby and Mrs. Caldwell were also much admired; and the choir gave ample evidence of Mr. Philp's careful training in several pieces. No admission fee was charged; but a voluntary collection at the door realised a handsome sum.

LEEDS.—The arrangements are now nearly complete for the re-opening of the Victoria Hall (after complete redecoration, the addition of new electric sunlights, cleaning and repairs of the organ, &c.) with two grand Festival Concerts on Friday and Saturday evenings, the 20th and 21st inst. The principal vocalists already engaged are Miss Rose Hersee, Madame Enriquez, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Signor Federici, who will take the solo parts in Rossini's Stabat Mater, which will occupy the first part of Friday evening's Concert. The band will number between sixty and seventy performers, selected from the first orchestras in London, Liverpool, Manchester, Leeds, &c., and the chorus will include most of the best and most experienced singers in the town and neighbourhood, forming altogether a grand orchestra of three or four hundred voices. The Organist is Mr. J. K. Pyne, of the Cathedral and Town Hall, Manchester, and the Conductor, Dr. Spark, Borough Organist. The arrangements are being carried out with great spirit and liberality by a large and influential committee of aldermen, councillors, and private gentlemen—the honorary secretaries being the Town Clerk and Alderman Gaunt. The proceeds of the festival will be devoted in aid of the medical charities of the town, and the prices of admission will, we understand, be extremely moderate.

OTLEY.—The twelfth Annual Festival of the Choirs belonging to the Choral Union connected with the rural deanery of Otley was held on Saturday afternoon, the 27th of July, in the Parish Church. The service, which was full choral, commenced at three o'clock, and may be chronicled as a musical success. The total number of singers was 204, and, with the exception of four, all were surpliced. The Rev. W. E. Seaton, of Cleckheaton, officiated as Precentor; Mr. W. Stables, Kirkstall, conducted; and Mr. A. Longfield presided at the organ. Sir John Goss was present, and was not only delighted with the manner in which the music was rendered, but expressed his surprise at the volume and richness of tone possessed by the united choirs. The processional, which was perhaps the most effective hymn sung, commenced with the words, "To God, ye choir above, begin" (Tallis). The responses, which were taken up with promptitude, were creditably sung; and the chanting of the Psalms was extremely good, the pointing being faultless. The anthem, "Sing praises unto the Lord," was by Gounod, taken from the 4th, 5th, and 13th verses of the 30th Psalm. The hymn before the sermon was "The roseate hues of early dawn" (E. J. Hopkins), that after the sermon "Thou art coming, O my Saviour," which was certainly the favourite tune, as it was taken up with so much heartiness by the vast assemblage. The Te Deum was next sung to a composition by Dr. Dykes. The recessional, "See the Conqueror mounts in triumph" (H. Smart), was rather unsteady, but the fact of the choir being extended from one end of the church to the other will in part account for this, as it renders strict time almost impossible. The sermon, which was a very impressive one, was preached by the Rev. W. E. Dutton. A collection was made at the close of the sermon, and upwards of £9 realised.

PENMAENMAWR.—The tenth annual Concert in aid of the National School took place on the 19th ult., when an excellent programme was performed. The Rev. W. Randall, M.A., rector of Handsworth, presided. The singing of Alaw Llechid, Eos Idwal, and Eos Eliden was very good, and the audience encored every piece they sang. The Penmaenmawr glee party sang exceedingly well, and Miss and Masters Ralli and Mr. Burrowes proved themselves excellent instrumentalists.

RHYL.—On Saturday the 9th ult. a Concert was given in the Town Hall. The performers were Madame Edith Wynne, Miss Cordelia Edwards, Mr. E. M. Rowland (Eos Maelor), of Bangor Cathedral, Mr. S. J. Hughes, and the Rhyl glee party. Mr. J. L. Hughes was the accompanist. There was a large attendance.

SHERBORNE.—The forty-fourth Concert of the Musical Society was given on Tuesday evening, the 30th of July. The music-hall was found not sufficiently large to accommodate the scholars and a number of visitors, and so it was arranged to hold the Concert in the schoolroom. The Society numbered about its usual strength—100 voices—and the orchestra was highly efficient. The programme was interesting, Mr. Parker, who conducted, gaining well deserved applause in his pianoforte solos. At the conclusion of the Concert, Mr. Young said their heartiest thanks were due to Mr. Parker for so successfully carrying out the musical arrangements. During the day the members of the Musical Society presented to their Conductor a set of silver entrée dishes as a token of their esteem and regard, and with their best wishes on his approaching marriage. They are very handsome, and were supplied by Mr. Adams, and nicely engraved.

TEIGNMOUTH.—Miss C. E. Linter, Organist of St. Michael's, gave her annual Concert at the Assembly Rooms on the 13th ult., when she was assisted by the members of her Madrigal Society and lady and gentlemen amateurs. The programme was well selected, and the part-music, carefully and correctly rendered, reflecting much credit on the performers. In Mendelssohn's Hear my Prayer the solos were taken by Mrs. Templer, Miss Brine, Miss Stamp, Miss Tickell, Mr. T. Pedrick, and Mr. Wills, who acquitted themselves admirably, and were enthusiastically applauded. The instrumental selections were artistically performed, especially a Duet for two pianos, by Saint-Saëns (Miss C. E. Linter and Miss Cleminshaw), and the Overture, Die Lustigen Weiber von Windsor (Nicolai), for eight hands (Miss C. E. Linter, Mrs. Arnold, Miss Cleminshaw, and Miss D. Saul). Mr. Arnold presided at the piano, and Miss C. E. Linter conducted.

TEWKESBURY.—A new organ has just been erected by Sweetland, of Bath, in the Wesleyan Chapel, the funds for which were raised as a memorial to Mr. J. Priestley, a former member of the congregation. The instrument was opened on the 11th ult. by Mr. C. J. Frost, Mus. Bac., of London, who played a selection of pieces by Mendelssohn, Hiles, Guilmant, Merkel, Smart, Handel, and Frost.

TIMARU, NEW ZEALAND.—The first Annual Meeting of the Harmonic Society took place in the Oddfellows' Hall on the evening of June 12, when the report read by the Secretary, Mr. C. S. Fraser, showed that the Association was prospering as much as its most enthusiastic well-wishers could desire. At the Concert given on the 6th of September last Mendelssohn's Athalie was performed; and at Christmas Handel's Messiah. Two representations of Barnett's Cantata, the Ancient Mariner, have also been given, under the able direction of Mr. Ziesler, who, as a token of esteem, was presented at the meeting with a handsome clock.

WARMINSTER.—A Morning Concert was given at the Town Hall on the 8th ult. in aid of the Rev. W. Hickman's Mission School, when the following artists generously gave their services:—Miss Lottie Cowen, Miss Agnes Fielding, Mr. Alfred Foley, Mr. W. F. Fussell, Mr. Barnett, and Mr. W. Chalke. The Concert, which was under the patronage of Prince Leopold, was fashionably attended and thoroughly appreciated.

WEST HARTLEPOOL.—A Concert was given in the Athenæum on July 29 in aid of the fund for sending three detachments of the Fourth Durham Volunteers to Shoeburyness. The principal vocalists were Miss Esther Ferry, Mr. Thompson, and Mr. Hunter. The Volunteer band was also present. One of Mr. J. H. Lewis's popular glees was sung by the parish church choir. Mons. Reidal played a violin solo, and other artists of note rendered their services. Mr. J. H. Lewis was the pianist and Conductor. The Concert was a decided success, and a handsome balance was realised.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. Wm. Johnson, Organist and Choirmaster to the Parish Church, Grappenhall, Cheshire.—Mr. J. W. Honneyman, Organist and Choirmaster to the Parish Church, Brampton, Cumberland.—Dr. W. T. Belcher, Organist and Choirmaster to Handsworth Parish Church, Birmingham.—Mr. Charles Freeman, to the Episcopal Church of St. Andrew's, Fife, Scotland.—Mr. A. J. H. Barber, to Reading School.

CHOIR APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. Walter Taylor (Principal Alto) to the Cathedral Church, Ripon.

(NEW SERIES)

A COLLECTION OF GLEES AND PART-SONGS FOR MALE VOICES.

Notwithstanding the popularity of the ORPHEUS in its former shape, it is believed that its issue in separate Voice Parts is scarcely in accordance with the present taste; it is therefore the intention of Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co. to publish a New Series of this favourite Collection, in which every composition will appear in the popular Octavo form, in single numbers printed in Vocal Score, with a carefully revised Pianoforte Accompaniment. In many instances the translation of the words will also undergo revision.

The ORPHEUS will now consist exclusively of Part-Music for

MALE VOICES ONLY.

The whole of the original Series, with a few unimportant exceptions, will be published in the new form, and new compositions by the best composers will be added from time to time, as well as a number of pieces which have become popular in other forms or in other Collections. The Part-Songs for Mixed Voices hitherto contained in the Series will in future appear in the "Part-Song Book."

The whole of the compositions by Mendelssohn, until now included in the ORPHEUS, will be issued as a separate publication, forming a complete collection of his Part-Songs.

NEW SONG,

THE FERRY MAIDEN.

THE WORDS BY

F. E. WEATHERLY.

THE MUSIC BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

Sir Roland to the river came,
Full blithely there he cried,
"O row me o'er the tide, lassie,
O row me o'er the tide!
A piece of red, red gold, lassie,
I'll gladly give to thee,
For yonder tow'r 's my lady's bow'r,
And there she waits for me!"

She rowed him o'er the water wide,
She saw him leap to land;
He left a piece of red, red gold
Within her lily hand.
And many a time she ferried him
Across the water wide,
And ev'ry time she dropt the gold
Adown into the tide.

"O row us o'er the tide, lassie,
O row us o'er the tide;
I'll fill thy lap with red, red gold,
For I have won my bride!"
The water laps among the reeds,
No maiden makes reply;
There, in the river, by her boat,
They see the maiden lie.

THE LEEDS TUNE-BOOK

A MANUAL OF 274 HYMN-TUNES OF ALL METRES FOR ALL DENOMINATIONS,

COMPILED AND ARRANGED IN SHORT SCORE FOR VOICES OR ORGAN, BY

JOSEPH LANCASTER,

ORGANIST, MILL HILL CHAPEL, LEEDS.

Quarto. Large type. Price 4s. 6d. Congregations and Choirs supplied at Reduced Rates.

"The harmonies evince an amount of technical knowledge and careful arrangement which is creditable in the highest degree to the compiler."—Musical Times.

"This collection contains 274 tunes, selected with taste and judgment, including not only the principal ancient and modern tunes in general use, but a number of new and original tunes, some of which are of great merit."—Illustrated London News.

"It is an admirable collection of very choice tunes for congregational worship, and we most heartily commend it for use in the church and in the home, believing it will be found very widely acceptable. The book is clearly printed, and can be had to order of any book or musicseller."—Kent Herald.

"Mr. Lancaster has reproduced many of the standard tunes, both ancient and modern; and he has mingled with them many original compositions. The work, which is not at all sectarian or denominational in character, is thoroughly legitimate in its purpose, and in many respects highly creditable in its execution."—Globe.

"'The Leeds Tune-Book' is a handsomely printed quarto volume, with the tunes in short score, and contains the usual amount of ancient and modern favourites, with about ninety tunes composed expressly for the collection, and printed for the first time. Many of the original tunes are remarkably good. We may particularly instance those by Dr. Naylor, Mr. Hird, and a many of the Editor's contributions."—Choir and Musical Record.

"It is charmingly printed in duodecimo; a handy book, and a good collection. We heartily recommend it."—Yorkshire Post.

"An excellent tune-book, and will be found a most useful supplement to the tune-books already in use."—Leeds Mercury.

"This collection consists of 274 tunes of all metres, all bearing the true stamp of the effective music so generally heard in places of worship in Yorkshire. It is printed in beautifully clear type, is well bound, is moderate in price, and in every respect a very acceptable addition to the present list of such publications."—Yorkshire Orchestra.

"We welcome the appearance of this new tune-book, as a valuable compendium, either for a complete collection or as a supplement to any other tune-book."—Scarborough Gazette.

London: NOVELLO, EWER and Co., 1, Berners Street, W.; Leeds: HOPKINSON BROTHERS and Co., Commercial Street.

Price 3s. 6d., cloth, red edges.

THE TUNE-BOOK, with the additional Tunes, as used at ST. ALBAN'S, HOLBORN; containing nearly 270 Tunes, for Long, Common, Short, and Peculiar Metres; together with several Gregorian Hymns and Antiphons; the Eight Gregorian Tones; the Music of the Reproaches; the Seven Last Words; and Litany Tunes, &c. London: Novello, Ewer and Co.

THE BURNLEY TUNE-BOOK.—NOTICE.—An ADDENDA of nearly 500 Tunes, inclusive of all the old favourite and standard Tunes, will shortly be added, and every known metre will be provided for. MSS. received. Address, the Editor, Burnley.

Revised Edition. Price 7s., cloth.

PARR'S PSALMODY. 392 Tunes, 301 Chants, various Responses, &c., with Memoirs of the Composers and Histories of the Pieces.

London: NOVELLO, EWER and Co.

A MORNING SERVICE, Te Deum, Jubilate, and Kyrie. By the Rev. EDWARD YOUNG. Tenth edition, abbreviated for Parochial use. Organ and Choir copies, 4d. each.

"Melodious, vocal, and nicely harmonised—that is, without pretence or straining at effect; and they declaim the words devoutly and emphatically."—Musical Times.

"Good points and tuneful passages."—Musical Standard.

"The intelligent, devoted, and devotional spirit in which every note seems to have been composed furnishes one of the best guarantees for excellence."—English Churchman.

"All competent criticism will be found in accordance with the verdict of a high professional authority as to 'abundant proof of imagination, poetical conception, and musical feeling.'"—Christian Observer.

"The strain is devotional, and harmonies full, solemn, and massive. . . . . He fairly claims to have dug a channel for the devout utterance of the words."—Bristol Times.

THE MANCHESTER GENTLEMEN'S GLEE CLUB'S PRIZE GLEES, 1878.

HENCE, LOATHED MELANCHOLY!

A CHEERFUL GLEE FOR FIVE VOICES.

COMPOSED BY HENRY LAHEE. PRICE SIXPENCE.

"Mr. Lahee's setting of the opening lines of Milton's 'L'Allegro' obtained the Manchester prize for a 'cheerful' composition of its class. It begins with a movement in C minor, directed to be sung 'heavily and in firm time,' massive as to character, and decidedly effective. Let us add that the music is none the worse for suggesting Handel, while it is not unworthy, by reason of the correct and easy flow of the parts, to be in the manner of the great old master. The invocation to Euphrosyne has, of course, a very different character. Here all is lightness and grace (the key changing to C major), and we consider that Mr. Lahee has been particularly happy in his setting of the passage 'Jest and youthful jollity,' &c., a simple phrase, airily treated in imitation, producing the best effect. At 'These delights if thou canst give,' another change takes place. The music becomes more sedate, and a tuneful, plainly harmonised movement ends the work. We should add that the composer has been careful not to exact too much from his executants. The glee is an easy one, and as pleasing as easy."—Musical Times, June, 1878.

HUSHED IN DEATH.

A SERIOUS GLEE FOR S.A.T.B.

COMPOSED BY DR. H. HILES. PRICE SIXPENCE.

"We have great pleasure in noticing the excellent manner in which Dr. Hiles's admirable work was given. The Glee fulfils all the requirements of a work of the kind, and if the judges who awarded the first prize to it were present they could not but be gratified to hear their verdict confirmed by the emphatic approval of the audience. Scholarly writing one always expects from Dr. Hiles, whose experience as a choirmaster has also given him peculiar advantages as a writer of vocal harmony, and his Prize Glee could only have been written by an accomplished musician. The melody of the first part of the Glee is flowing and graceful, and the fugue at the end is exceedingly effective. It cannot but be gratifying to Manchester that a local composer should have been successful in a competition in which he had to contend against not a few distinguished composers."—Manchester Examiner and Times, May 9, 1878.

SHORT IRON GRAND PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

"The improvements made in English pianos have caused this trade rapidly to increase, until one pianoforte manufactory after another has been built to supply the growing demand. One of the largest of these, lately erected by Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons, of Wigmore Street, covers nearly an acre of ground in the Grafton Road, Kentish Town, and is intended to accommodate 300 workmen. These works alone can supply 3,000 pianos annually, and there are at least three manufactories in London capable of making an equal number."—Illustrated London News.

THE STEINWAY PIANOFORTES
(STEINWAY HALL, NEW YORK).

THE SUPERIORITY OF THE STEINWAY PIANOFORTES—artistic, scientific, and structural—over all pianofortes in the world, is a fact which has long since passed beyond the arena of discussion, and been accepted as an established principle by every competent authority throughout civilisation.

THE STEINWAY PIANOFORTES have been supplied to almost every Royal Family in Europe; have been pronounced UNRIVALLED by every contemporary Pianist, Composer, and other Musician of world-wide fame; have received similar recognition on the scientific side from the leading authorities in the Science of Acoustics—Helmholtz, Lissajous, Sir William Thomson, Professor Joseph Henry, &c.; have been the subjects of the special éloges of the three principal Art Societies of Europe—viz., the Royal Academies of Berlin and of Stockholm and the National Academy of Paris—in each case the honour of Membership being also conferred upon their makers; have been awarded the highest honours of the four representative International Exhibitions of the World—London (1862), Paris (1867), Vienna (1873), and Philadelphia (1876); are copied by every pianoforte-maker throughout Europe and America who has made any improvement in the construction of his Instruments within the past quarter of a century; and enjoy not only the widest distribution, but also by far the largest annual sale of any pianofortes throughout the world.

LEADING CHARACTERISTICS.—A brief description of some of the more important of the Steinway patented inventions will be found in the larger Illustrated Catalogue of the Pianofortes, which may be obtained on application. Amongst them should be noticed the Patent Metal Cupola and Pier Frame, of which the material (Steinway Steel) as well as the form is produced in the Steinway foundries; the Patent Metallic Action-Frame, which encases the entire "action" or inner mechanism, and renders this highly complex and important portion of the pianoforte utterly impervious to the deteriorating influences of humidity or of friction; and the Patent Resonator applied to the Sound-board, by means of which not only is its reinforcing power enormously increased, but also its perfect elasticity is permanently retained, and its indestructibility under the vicissitudes of even the severest climates fully secured. Attention may also be directed to the Patent Overstrung Duplex Scaling (based on Helmholtz's law of "quality" in tone); to the Patent Double Repeating Action, which secures a "touch" that is "simply perfect;" and to the Patent "Tone-Sustaining" or Organ Pedal, which materially enhances the artistic resources of the pianoforte. These inventions, with many others of obvious utility, will be found in all three types of the STEINWAY PIANOFORTES—Grand, Upright, and Square—investing each and all of them with "the highest degree of excellence" (to use the words of the Official Report of the Philadelphia International Exhibition); endowing them with a permanent endurance utterly unknown in the previous annals of the manufacture; and rendering even the Steinway Upright Pianoforte far superior in power, duration, and sweetness of tone to the largest horizontal Grand Pianoforte constructed on the older or pre-Steinway system, whether of English or Continental manufacture.

CAUTION.—It is hardly necessary, perhaps, to issue a Caution in reference to the plagiarisms and imitations of the STEINWAY Inventions—e.g., that of the STEINWAY "Overstrung Scaling," or system of crossing the strings; inasmuch as the Instruments which contain them (and which now include fully three-fourths of the entire pianoforte manufacture of the world*) are professedly imitations, and bear the names of their respective perpetrators. But the public are respectfully cautioned against the forgeries of the STEINWAY PIANOFORTES manufactured in France and Germany and falsely professing to be made, wholly or in part, by MESSRS. STEINWAY & SONS; and informed that all genuine STEINWAY PIANOFORTES are solely manufactured in the STEINWAY factories and foundries in and about New York, and that the firm have no manufacturing operations whatsoever in any part of Europe. Agencies for the sale of the STEINWAY PIANOFORTES will be found not only throughout the British Empire and the United States, but also in almost all the principal cities and towns of the Continent; and in fact in every civilised and semi-civilised country throughout the globe.

* "Not only by his absence does STEINWAY shine in Vienna [International Exhibition, 1873], but also in a more real manner—viz., by his influence upon the entire European manufacture. His Overstrung System is now so universally adopted that we not only find the majority of the German and Austrian pianos constructed after STEINWAY, but also those of Spain, Italy, Sweden, and Russia. It is, indeed, impossible to speak in detail of the pianos in our Exhibition without referring to STEINWAY; and if we cannot show any genuine STEINWAY Pianofortes to strangers visiting the Exhibition, we can answer the stereotyped question, 'Where is STEINWAY?' by replying, 'Here et ubique, everywhere, in the pianos from all quarters of the globe.'"—Dr. EDWARD HANSLICK, Vice-President of the Music Section of the Paris International Exhibition, 1878.

CHALLEN AND SON'S
GOLD MEDAL PIANOS,

20, OXFORD STREET, LONDON.

ESTABLISHED 1804.

PRIZE MEDAL, LONDON, 1862. | GOLD MEDAL, SOUTH AFRICA, 1877.

The only Firm who obtained the International Exhibition Medal for the special distinction of "excellence of touch and tone."

CHALLEN & SON'S GOLD MEDAL PIANETTE,
WITH CHECK ACTION, IN ELEGANT WALNUT OR ROSEWOOD CASE.

FROM 25 GUINEAS.

"The Pianettes manufactured by CHALLEN & SON are most satisfactory instruments."—Anton Rubinstein.

"I can testify in the strongest manner to the qualities of the Pianette as manufactured by CHALLEN & SON. In every point, as to tone and touch, they are excellent; and I can also certify from experience as to their durability under hard wear."—William Henry Monk, Professor of Music in King's College, London.

CHALLEN & SON'S GOLD MEDAL SEMI-COTTAGE,
WITH CHECK REPEATER ACTION.

FROM 32 GUINEAS.

"The Pianos I have selected from Messrs. CHALLEN & SON have invariably given complete satisfaction, some of them having had to bear the severe test of an Indian climate."—William H. Cummings.

"As a customer of some years' standing, I speak with confidence of the quality of the instruments supplied by Messrs. CHALLEN & SON. The two I have for my own use have had a great deal of wear, and in this respect have entirely satisfied me as to their durability; and the tone and touch of all those selected by me for myself or pupils have been much commended."—Alfred Gilbert, R.A.M.

CHALLEN & SON'S GOLD MEDAL COTTAGE;
TRICHORD THROUGHOUT; BRASS BRIDGE; CHECK REPEATER ACTION.

FROM 60 GUINEAS.

"I hold a very high opinion of Messrs. CHALLEN & SON'S Pianos. Their qualities of tone and touch can be at once estimated; but I can furthermore bear testimony to their great durability."—Lindsay Sloper.

"CHALLEN & SON is a name synonymous with wonderful durability, great beauty of tone, and moderation in price. We know of not one single maker whose Pianos excel theirs in the qualities most desirable in a good and lasting Piano."—Cape Argus, May 7.

EXCELLENCE IS GUARANTEED, AND EVERY INSTRUMENT WARRANTED TO BE OF THE HIGHEST CLASS WORKMANSHIP AND MATERIALS.

WARD'S
ROYAL PIANOFORTE AND HARMONIUM LAMP,
FOR PROVIDING A CENTRAL & DIRECT LIGHT FOR THE PERFORMER.

The inconvenience of the present mode of lighting a performer at a pianoforte or harmonium by means of sconces fitted at the extremities of the instrument has long been a subject of complaint. The requirement is a central light to fall direct upon the music-book. This can be obtained by using Thomas Ward's Royal Pianoforte Lamp, which can be fitted to any form of instrument without defacing the same. Vocalists also will thus find a convenience which does not exist in other modes of lighting.

THE MUSICAL TIMES AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.
OCTOBER 1, 1878.

MEDIOCRITY.

By Joseph Green.

During the month attention has been directed to a communication from the composer Richard Wagner, which appeared in a Bayreuth paper. It has pleased him to rail at the sluggishness and stupidity of the German public in receiving the seed of the musical gospel he has been preaching. The communication may have possibly been inspired by that irritable vanity which in many distinguished men seems to chafe at a momentary eclipse of notoriety; or it may have been the genuine outcome of the impatience of the intuitive mind at some sudden reminder of the general dulness and mediocrity of the world.

It is not perhaps very agreeable to many of us to find ourselves glanced at as an atom in a mass of mediocrity, which for an instant, may have attracted the disdainful gaze of the eye of genius. The flout of the composer has already been resented; and some have solaced themselves in the contemplation that if individually they are miserable petrifactions, yet in the aggregate they form a highly respectable mass, which has stood for almost a geological period, and is not likely to be easily moved by Herr Wagner. Mediocrity is perfectly safe in that position. It is the old question between the practical and the ideal. The idea must be submitted to the tedious tests of experience before it is sufficiently incarnate to be made visible and tangible to the vulgar; and it is easy to conjecture how painful it must be to the originator to await the process, with the constant fear, too often realised, that he may never live to see the embodiment of his conception.

Generation after generation we have the same complaint of the stupidity, not only of a particular public, but of the age. We may feel pretty well assured that cerebral developments are more or less the same in at least all historic periods. If in art or learning the reproaches of a "Dunciad" are considered appropriate to certain decades or countries, there must be causes at work, independently of distinctions of race, of the general state of education, or of propinquity to the great centres of intellectual activity.

To secure the highest appreciation of music as an art or science, no condition seems wanting at the present moment in Germany. Yet it is the Germans, —the fellow-countrymen of Bach and Beethoven, Schubert and Schumann, and of Wagner himself—the irate composer stigmatises as sluggish, indolent, stupid, and debased by a press which lives on degrading itself to the same level of mediocrity and commonplace.

Supposing that after all there may be some truth in Wagner's complaints, whether they be addressed to a German or a British public, where are we to look for the specific causes which would justify them at this epoch? We are sometimes told that in Germany the breaking up of the old political and social organisation, after the late war with France, gave rise to new ambitions more material in their objects than the pleasures of the intellect and the imagination, which in Germany once annihilated, and nobly annihilated, that sense of humiliation a more vulgar-minded people might experience in comparative poverty. Again, as regards civilised Europe in general, we are asked to believe that the present-day eagerness in the pursuit of the physical sciences has a tendency to consign art and artists to an inferior position. That can scarcely be true; because the pursuit of science, when not a mere pottering with facts, utilises the imagination, and is itself only a species of intellectual indulgence not unlike what we all enjoy in the serious study and practice of an art. Moreover, science, only in a little less violent language, makes on her own account precisely the same complaints Herr Wagner has recently addressed to the German people. Not long ago the scientific world was startled by a little discovery known as the "liquefaction of oxygen." It was understood to be, in its way, remarkable; yet probably there was not one in a hundred amongst us to whom it had the slightest significance without a considerable amount of elementary explanation. The inventor himself, in imparting to us the details of his successful experiment, says: "Still the scientific world is not the world. A suppressed titter has rippled on the faces of the ignorant, followed by the query, What's the use of it? Well, it is perhaps the fault of the scientific world if so grovelling an exclamation is all but universal. Books, and especially manuals treating of physics, chemistry, and other sciences lay more stress on tangible results than on the workings of the creative mind."

Of course they do, and it is the same in "manuals of music," if they are intended to sell. They are written for immediate and practical use. In the next generation what is valuable in the discovery of the liquefaction of oxygen or in its results to science will be duly incorporated in manuals of chemistry. In the same way Herr Wagner may be persuaded that his cogitations are not wholly lost to the world, even if his poetic ideal is not instantly realised by the aid of some all but impossible stage accessories he may have had in view when writing or composing in the seclusion of his own study.

In the direction of general conditions we fail to see any specific reason why in the present day the power of appreciation of music or of art with the public should be a subject of lamentation. Nor can we comprehend why Herr Wagner, of all composers—many of whom have before now lived and died without due recognition—should exhibit himself in the light of a "blighted being;" and thus imitate deserving mediocrities who convey to the sympathising ears of wives and families complaints of the same nature Wagner has addressed to a hard-hearted public. There is nothing more ludicrous than the unsuccessful composer's whimper that "the public don't understand good music." The fact is that the public does understand it, and in many cases better than the musicians themselves, who frequently take a cramped and prejudiced view of their art.

For a very brilliant summary of what Wagner has written to the Bayreuth Blätter we are indebted to a leading article in the Daily Telegraph. We find in the composer's communication the usual characteristics of his literary style and tone of thought, a curious medley of the feminine and the virile, the philosopher and the critic, the musician and the littérateur. We have little bits of Schopenhauer, some now rather antique Germanisms about the "good," and a sneer at the notion of a man imagining himself a virtuoso in language when that language is German.

We think we are not mistaken in the assertion that, in regard either to language or music, it is the word virtuoso, which instantly inflames the anger of the great music-dramatist. The mediocrity he rails at is not the innocent mass of stupidity we have always around us. We can quite comprehend that with the lofty, if occasionally extravagant, ideas Wagner seems to entertain as to the possibility of blending the common attributes of the musical art with what we must admit to be the higher aims of poetry, he looks with jealous contempt on the disproportionate amount of favour absorbed in our time by mere "virtuosity" in music. The virtuososhiip of the present day is all the more dangerous in affecting to despise its own specialty; and arriving almost unconsciously at the delusive notion that high executive skill must necessarily be accompanied by creative power. That delusion has been mainly assisted, as we all know, by the facilities the improved keyboard instruments have afforded us in our harmony wanderings and day-dreams in extemporisation. Pianist and composer are nowadays convertible terms. Nearly all the great German composers have been skilled performers on keyed instruments. Nine-tenths of the development of modern music is perhaps due to that simple fact. Whilst old traditions, principally Italian, still existed, the result was a happy and wondrous advance even in orchestration. But in the scores of Beethoven there are one or two pages, and in the scores of some who pass for great composers in our time there are a great many, in which the pictorial effect at least is that of a pianoforte fantasia. The "too many notes" of the German Emperor may have been rightly snubbed by Mozart, but the Emperor was shrewd enough in his way. What is bright and limpid and pearly on the piano, is apt to become meaningless buzz when transferred to the orchestra. The acoustician will tell us that the unpleasant "buzz" he hears in the orchestra is owing to the want of "just intonation." There may be something in that; but the acoustician will admit that there are certain orchestral passages played in good equal temperament in which there is little to offend his sensations. Czerny, who naturally speaks from the virtuoso point of view, tells us in his "Pianoforte School," that a mere general knowledge of music is of little avail; and that the main object is to play well. No doubt, if we are to improve our style by the study of the works of great masters in pianoforte transcriptions, we must have sufficient mechanical skill to interpret them properly; and, moreover, accuracy in playing generates accuracy of thought. We can even trace that fact in the cleverness of detail in the rhythmic divisions in symphony or overture by a modern virtuoso. His polyphonic mosaïques please him. His rests and disjointed semiquavers in the figuration look original. They delight even the artist in the orchestra who, if he is not at the triangle or drum, is apt to judge of the beauty of a composition by the difficulty or pictorial effect of his own part. The connoisseur in the auditorium, who listens for the music, is not so easily deceived. In chamber music, in the string quartett, such things are well enough as adornments in a work of genius; but they are sorry substitutes for ideas in the confections of talent.

There is something of Berliozism—of the "orchestral virtuoso"—even in the music of Wagner; but its "poetical basis," gothically romantic and unclassical as it may be, is essentially sculpturesque. That is precisely the quality which is wanting in modern art; and we can appreciate the disdain, we can honour even the wounded vanity and jealousy of Wagner, as in the silence of Bayreuth he mentally listens to the fiddling of the virtuosi at the Gewandhaus in Leipzig. The critics themselves, delighted as they or any of us might be with the charm of well-written music in any shape, will tell us of this or that concerto or symphony that it is delicate, that it is artistic, that it is pleasant, that in workmanship it is admirable, but as music it is disappointing and without vitality. In short, it is "mediocrity," the outcome of virtuosity. Were it even light music—were it Wieland or Weber, Watteau or Offenbach—we could worship it. But a great deal of it is pretentious and striving, illustrating the startling reminder of the Frenchman, that there is a certain resemblance between profundity and vacuity.

A practical question at the present moment is in what way and to what extent does a conservatorium or State subsidy promote the advancement of art? The more obvious advantages of such aids need not be touched upon here; it is more consistent with our immediate object to simply suggest the inquiry whether the particular organisation of subsidised institutions has not intensified the virtuosity and mediocrity complained of. Even if it be so, the fact is not necessarily a condemnation of the principle of State aid, upon which subject the mind of the public is undergoing a remarkable change, pregnant with perhaps rather unlooked-for results. Excepting in one or two places in Italy the conservatorium is a recent introduction. European experience has proved that musical genius is as likely to issue from the monastic cell or parish choir as from the State or municipal schools. The old German philosophy, which had a tendency to look under the fact—and in many instances to remain there—is curiously opposed to the practical necessities of our age, even in the working of musical institutions. The whinings of Schumann anent the "orphanism" of music, as well as the Schopenhauerisms of Wagner, seem to be based on the notion that musical ideas are permanent contradictions to an old aphorism—the ex nihilo. Surely the philosophers overlook the circumstance that if the musician does not draw his inspirations directly from external facts he does so from memory, which is after all only the reflection of externals. Many a Bach and Beethoven may be born in an African jungle, and if they are bred there they will write for the tam-tam, and will only get beyond it in proportion as they receive new impressions. The French have perhaps been the most successful in applying the engine of the State to art progress. If in music they have not attained all that could have been expected, and if the recent demand for a further grant in favour of "symphonic music" indicates some previous error of omission, what they have done is due to the principle of universalism they have followed and their liberality, at one time at least, in nominating to professorships the best men from all countries. It is not easy to define the difference between a "music-school" and a "conservatorium." We arrive, however, at something like a distinction when we assume that the "music-school" is for the purpose of teaching the student, and the "conservatorium" is intended to give him, when taught, fair play and opportunity. It presupposes, or should do, the existence of orchestra, choir, and theatre on the grandest scale, and in some degree self-sustaining and apart from the teaching institution. It is under the supreme direction of a minister of State, or not necessarily of a musician. It should in short be a State university, with endowments or scholarships for the encouragement of music-schools, public or private, in all parts of the kingdom. It is not essential to the principle of centralisation that individual efforts should be discouraged. The object of a conservatorium is not to suppress but to focus individual efforts.

A conservatorium should have no idols, no creed; it should be a temple open to the world, and where every style and every idea would soon find its own level. Anything less than that in England would be only another training-school, fruitful enough in what M. Raoul Pictet, whom we have quoted, calls "tangible results," but contributing little to the "workings of the creative mind," and perhaps a great deal to local vanity and general mediocrity.

Far better than that in this country would be to attack the question at the other end, and agitate for a complete revision of the licensing system, or of the branch of legislation which is more or less in the same category. It is perverseness to preach in favour of self-government or self-help and volunteer paternalism and protection where they are not wanted. We abuse the music-halls for their inanities whilst we bar their improvement. There may be economical reasons, but there is no moral, no musical reason, why we should not have fifty "Sorcerers" or fifty "Pinafores" going at the same time, and providing increased employment for artists, authors, and composers. The Café Chantant and our vulgar imitations of that institution are unsuited to our habits as well as our climate. Remove restrictions and the entertainment will adapt itself to both, and to the desires of thousands who do not choose to be cooped up in a hot theatre for a whole evening. Only the unimaginative mediocrity will rant about debasing the public taste by light music. It is the glory of the art that the public taste is not debased by music of any description so long as it be good of its kind. The rest is a question of police.

In music or morals the over-worship of "the correct" has the same evil tendency—it makes one and the other artificial. In music, at all events, it is the artificiality that is born of the adoration of the form rather than the spirit, of the interpretation and even of the interpreter rather than of the thing interpreted, which is one element in the genesis of mediocrity in all epochs and countries wherein a high state of culture makes people disposed to be amused, but not taught, or unsettled in their self-composure by novelties the critics are apt to call "crudities." Material civilisation itself is calculated to foster mediocrity by promoting a self-consciousness in the creative artist, who will not wait for fame when a world-wide notoriety and its recompense are so easily attained. It is curious that the authorship of some of the greatest works, modern as well as ancient, is contested; as if they were more the sum of the opinions of a generation than the reflex of one individuality. In our times we have often more of the author than anything else in his book. Hence, in music, the school once called the "Monotone," including amongst other celebrities the names of Mendelssohn and Chopin.

There is another possible cause for present-day mediocrity in music which possesses a melancholy interest. We allude to the natural exhaustion of the materials of the art. It is useless for arithmeticians to comfort us with simple problems in permutation, because the musician knows too well that all his materials are not of the same value. It is not exactly a question of things that are like or unlike as in permutation, but of things that have any particular meaning. For example there are literally only one or two successions of chords which have very distinct meanings. By distribution and the aid of chromatics, we can get some variety, but we soon fall into "crudities," if not into the unintelligible, except to the composer himself, whose meaning may have depended on associations unknown to us and not capable of being interpreted. It is marvellous to think of the lapse of time it takes to popularise an innovation in harmony; to make current a mauve or magenta, which in the sister art is at once made appreciable. To those accustomed to analyse harmony, the history of the art from the Middle Ages to the last thing at this day, by Rheinberger, Grieg, or Scharwenka, is the history of some half-dozen innovations in the way of added sounds, and augmented and diminished intervals. In spite of the obvious objection that the same thing has been said at all periods, and particularly at the moment when some great luminary was about to appear, there does seem a natural limit to new harmony combinations which is now about reached. In our opinion, Schumann, Wagner, and the rest, so far from marking a new era, are signs of exhaustion. It is not the business of any of us to say what the music of the future may be, but it will certainly not be "chord music," of which the latest subtleties begin to pall on cultivated or, it may be, jaded auditors.

THE LITERATURE OF NATIONAL MUSIC.

By Carl Engel.

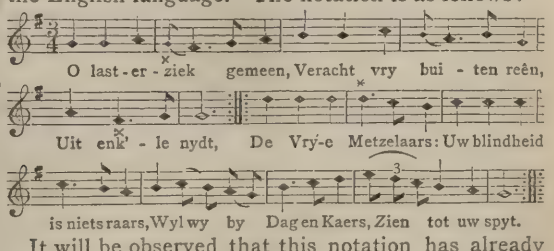
If I purpose to introduce here a tune, the patient reader will perhaps surmise that I do it with the intention of somewhat relieving the unavoidable monotony of a long survey. I candidly admit that I should be glad if thereby I could render the survey more entertaining. This is, however, not my only reason for inserting the tune; if it were, should I choose the air of "God save the Queen," which every English musician may be supposed to know by heart, and most unmusical Englishmen too? But, it may interest the reader to learn a few facts respecting the adoption of the tune on the Continent, which, as far as I am aware, have not been noticed in any of the discussions and disputes on the origin of the famous song. It is in itself interesting to trace the introduction of a national air into a foreign country where it has taken root, and blossoms like a tree transplanted into a new soil; and the interest in tracing its growth is, of course, the greater the more highly the air is appreciated in its native country.

The earliest notation of the tune in question printed on the Continent occurs, as far as I am aware, in a song-book for Freemasons, published in Holland. The book contains songs in French and in Dutch, and is entitled "La Lire Maçonne, ou Recueil de Chansons des Franc-Maçons; revu, corrigé, mis dans un nouvel ordre, et augmenté de quantité de Chansons qui n'avoient point encore paru; par les frères De Vignoles et Du Bois. Avec les Airs Notés, mis sur la bonne Clef, tant pour le Chant que pour le Violon et la Flute. Nouvelle Edition" (A la Haye, Van Laak, 1766; sm. 8vo). In this book the tune is given to a Dutch poem entitled D'Ongeveindsheid ("Sincerity"), on page 166. According to an indication in the index the same song occurs also in the first edition of the work, which appeared three years previously to the present one; the tune was therefore printed in the year 1763. Under the Dutch heading are the words, "Stem, God seav' great George our King," which, to judge from the odd spelling of save, was evidently written by a foreigner unacquainted with the English language. The notation is as follows:—



O last-er-ziek gemeen, Veracht vry bui-ten reên, Uit enk'-le nydt, De Vry-e Metzelaars: Uw blindheid is niets raars, Wyl wy by Dag en Kaers, Zien tot uw spyt.

It will be observed that this notation has already the triplet in the last bar but one, which, by filling up the step of a fifth, recorded to have been at first in the melody thus,  renders the singing easier. It must be borne in mind that this air is intended pre-eminently for all faithful subjects, be they musical or not; and, in order to be effectively sung in a grand unison, its steps of intervals require to be as convenient for the uncultivated voice as possible. It is interesting to see how the untutored people have unpremeditatedly smoothed over the original wide steps.

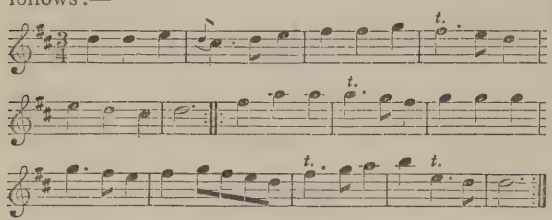
The air occurs also in an old Dutch collection of dance-tunes, which is perhaps of an earlier date than the first edition of the Freemasons' song-book. The collection alluded to is published in six small oblong octavo volumes, the first of which is entitled "De Nieuwe Hollandsche Schouwburg, zynde een Verzameling van verscheyden vrolyke en serieuse Danssen, nevens enige van de nieuwste Zang Airen, die voor de Viool, Dwarsfluyt, en anderen Instrumenten gebruykt kunnen worden; Eerste Deel; te Amsterdam, by Johannes Smit, boek en muziek verkoper op de Fluweele Burgwal by de Halsteeg." The fifth volume professes to contain only dance-tunes. Its title is "De Nieuwe Hollandsche Schouwburg, zynde een Verzameling van verscheyden vrolyke en serieuse Danssen, Menuetten, &c." There is no date of publication to the collection; however, to judge from the notation of the tune in question, which is printed in the fifth volume, and is headed "God bles (sic) the King," it is probably a very early importation from England. The notation is as follows:—



I am not aware that it was ever called in England "God bless the King;" but English musicians will probably be better informed about this, and may perhaps even be able to determine from the peculiar heading the age of the Dutch notation. That the Dutch should have used the air as a dance-tune is not surprising, considering that they had, as the title of the present collection intimates, serious dances. Nay, it is recorded that in olden time they danced, or shuffled about, to sacred tunes. The French, about the end of the sixteenth century, danced to psalm-tunes. The favourite dance-tune of King Charles IX. was the melody of Psalm cxxix: "Many a time have they afflicted me from my youth; yet they have not prevailed against me." It is therefore not so singular as it may appear, that in the eighteenth century the Dutch should have used the English National Anthem as a dance-tune.

In the year 1790, Heinrich Harries, a clergyman in Schleswig, made a free translation into German of the English hymn of "God save the King," retaining the original air. The version was intended for the celebration of the birthday of King Christian of Denmark. From this hymn, Balthasar Gerhard Schumacher, a native of Holstein, and a Doctor of Law, constructed, in the year 1793, the hymn for Prussia, commencing "Heil dir im Siegerkranz," ("Hail to thee in victor's wreath!") And thus the famous English air became naturalised in Germany. According to Hoffmann von Fallersleben ("Unsere Volksthümlichen Lieder," Leipzig, 1869, page 182) the second verse of the Prussian hymn—

Nicht Ross' und Reisige	Not horse and rider bold
Sichern die stolze Höh'	The lofty height may hold
Wo Fürsten stehn;	Where princes stand:
Liebe des Vaterlands,	Love of the fatherland,
Liebe des freien Manns	Love of the patriot band,
Gründet den Herrscherthron	Our royal throne shall keep
Wie Fels im Meer.	As sea-girt rock.

has often been objected to, and was actually suppressed on various solemn occasions, even as recently as in the year 1863, in many places. This, he says, induced a certain public singer of celebrity to substitute for its first word Nicht the word Nur, and to sing the obnoxious verse thus:—

Nur Ross' nur Reisige	True! horse and rider bold
Sichern die stolze Höh'	Alone the height may hold
Wo Fürsten stehn;	Where princes stand:
Liebe des Vaterlands,	Love of the fatherland,
Liebe des Burgermanns	Love of the patriot band,
Thun es allein nicht mehr	Is nought—an empty word,
Ohne das Heer.	But for the sword.

However, at the present day, every patriotic German may sing the proper verse from the bottom of his heart.

After this digression, which is perhaps longer than many readers care for, it is time to resume our survey. There are still the collections of songs of extra-European nations to be enumerated. This task will soon be accomplished, since there are comparatively but few publications of the kind worthy of consideration. The specimens of airs given in some treatises, which will later be mentioned, are the most reliable, and are certainly worthy of careful perusal. For instance, useful specimens of songs of the Arabs are given in an elaborate essay on the musical system of the Arabs, written by G. A. Villoteau, and printed in "Description de l'Egypte." Villoteau was a member of the scientific expedition which accompanied Napoleon Bonaparte to Egypt, in the year 1798. As regards separate collections, the student ought to make himself acquainted with the following:—

"The Oriental Miscellany; being a collection of the most favourite Airs of Hindustan, compiled and adapted for the Harpsichord, &c," by William Hamilton Bird (Calcutta: printed by Joseph Cooper, 1789; folio). This interesting publication, which is scarce, contains thirty tunes, preceded by a short introduction in which the editor explains the characteristics of the different kinds of songs of Hindustan. To some of the tunes the editor has added variations of his own composition; nevertheless, the work deserves the special attention of the collector of Hindu music. Similar, but less important collections are: "Hindoostanee Songs, dedicated to Mrs. Bristow," by C. Trinks, organist of St. John's Church (Calcutta; folio); contains fifteen tunes. "Twelve Original Hindoostanee Airs, compiled and harmonised" by T. G. Williamson (London, about 1797; folio). "Second Collection of Twelve Original Hindoostanee Airs, compiled and harmonised" by T. G. Williamson (London, 1798; folio). "Twelve Hindoo Airs with English words adapted to them" (London: Birchall; folio), &c.

"The Hindustani Choral Book, or Swar Sangrah; containing the Tunes of those Hymns in the Gít Sangrah which are in Native Metres"; compiled by John Parsons (Benares: printed and published by E. J. Lazarus and Co, 1861; 8vo). In the instructive preface the editor remarks: "This collection of tunes has been made in the hope that it may render the collection of hymns entitled Gít Sangrah, to which it is adapted, more generally useful to the native congregations where those hymns are usually sung. The natives of Hindustan having no system of musical notation current among them, the native Christians are only able to learn the tunes of the hymns published for them by hearing them sung. In this volume melodies for the hymns in native metres in the Gít Sangrah are given in the usual musical notes; and if missionaries or others, who have the requisite skill, will acquire these tunes from the notes, and then sing them to the native congregations, they will find that they will learn them with much greater facility than English tunes, and sing them with particular pleasure. The air only of the tunes has been given, because it is not customary with the natives to sing more than one part. Almost all the melodies have been taken down as they are sung by the persons who either composed them or first sang them to Christian hymns, and no attempt has been made to improve or modify them, Those tunes which are distinguished by an asterisk are standard Hindu tunes taken down from professional singers."

The Chinese airs which have been brought to Europe are not published in a separate collection. The same remark applies to the airs of the Siamese and Burmese. A number of Japanese airs, which P. F. von Siebold noted down during his sojourn in Japan, have been arranged for the pianoforte by J. Küffner (Leyden, 1836; oblong 8vo). Persian airs are contained in "Specimens of the Popular Poetry of Persia," by Alexander Chodzko (London: Allen and Co., 1842; 8vo). Airs of songs from Tunis and Algeria have been collected, and arranged for the pianoforte, by Salvador-Daniel (Paris: Richault; folio).

In America we have to notice the songs of the Canadian boatmen, who are hunters and fur-traders, and are of French extraction. Several collections of these songs have been published in Canada and in the United States, such as "La Lyre Canadienne," "Chants de Voyageur Canadien," "Chansons Canadiennes," &c. Many of the airs are old; some, which were brought to Canada by the French settlers about three hundred years ago, are still sung to the original French words. A selection of them which has appeared in England is entitled "Canadian Airs, collected by Lieutenant Back, R.N., during the late Arctic Expedition under Captain Franklin; with Symphonies and Accompaniments," by Edward Knight (London: J. Power, 1823; folio, two vols.). These airs have English poetry substituted for the original French poetry of the voyageurs.

In the United States we find among the popular songs several which evidently were imported into the western hemisphere by the German immigrants. The country is too young to possess old tunes of its own growth, if we except the airs of the Indian aborigines. No doubt, the ultimate characteristics of the national airs of the United States will depend much upon the songs which the children at the present time are taught to sing. A melody which we have learnt in early childhood, and with which pleasant recollections are associated, remains to us endeared through lifetime. The song-books for children, of which many have appeared in the United States, are therefore suggestive to the student of national music. As a curious specimen may be noticed "School Melodies; containing a choice Collection of Popular Airs, with original and appropriate words," by J. W. Greene (Boston, 1852; oblong 12mo). In the preface the editor says: "The leading characteristics of the present work are that the airs are almost exclusively popular;" and of one of the songs he remarks: "It has long been a favourite in the Boston schools." This little song, called "John Brown," is evidently intended to teach little children to count as far as ten. The tune to which it is sung is almost identical with the air of "O, dear! what can the matter be?" which was rather in vogue in London towards the end of the last century. However, the words are the most characteristic feature of the American ditty; for the children, before they have learnt to count their ten fingers, are led by it to regard an Indian child as if it were a puppy:—

John Brown had a little Indian—
Had a little Indian boy.
One, two, three little Indian—
Four, five, six little Indian—
Seven, eight, nine little Indian—
Ten little Indian boys.
John Brown had ten little Indian—
Ten little Indian boys.

The initiatory lesson embodied in this song perhaps explains certain conceptions which occur in a particularly noteworthy book entitled "Slave Songs in the United States" (New York: Simpson and Co., 1867; royal 8vo), which affords an insight into Negro music. The greater number of the songs in this book were written down from the lips of the coloured people by its editors, W. F. Allen, C. P. Ware, and L. M. Garrison. A few of the songs were composed since the emancipation of the slaves; all the others are old. Most of them are sacred songs, the poetry being in the Negro dialect. Funny as this corrupted English may appear in certain humorous songs which one occasionally hears by so-called Negro minstrels in England, the impression it produces in the touching hymns and sacred songs is very different; there will probably be but few readers among those who peruse these artless and sincere effusions who will not be deeply impressed with the words as well as with the airs. In an annotation to the touching song called "Nobody knows de trouble I've had," we are told by the editors: "Once, when there had been a good deal of ill-feeling excited, and trouble was apprehended, owing to the uncertain action of the Government in regard to the confiscated land on the Sea Islands, General Howard was called upon to address the coloured people earnestly and even severely. Sympathising with them, however, he could not speak to his own satisfaction; and to relieve their minds of the ever-present sense of injustice, and prepare them to listen, he asked them to sing. Immediately an old woman on the outskirts of the meeting began 'Nobody knows de trouble I've had,' and the whole audience joined in. The General was so affected by the plaintive words and melody, that he found himself melting into tears, and quite unable to maintain his official sternness."

Turning to Mexico, we have especially to notice: "Coleccion de 24 Canciones y Jarabes Mexicanos, arreglados para Piano" (Hamburg: Böhme; folio), a publication which contains interesting specimens of those little Mexican airs in which an unaccented note of the bar is emphasised. To appreciate fully these charming melodies, one must imagine them sung, with the accompaniment of the guitar, by a sentimental serenader on a serene Mexican night. An attention to such associations is indispensable in order to ascertain exactly the true spirit of national songs. An inquirer who has no lively imagination, and is deficient in poetical conception, probably will not experience a high degree of enjoyment in the examination of these treasures.

In "Zwölf Brasilianische Volkslieder, herausgegeben von J. H. Clasing" (Hamburg: Cranz; oblong folio), we have a selection of Brazilian airs resembling the Portuguese modinha, from which they are evidently an offspring. The "Alyra Pernambucana," by M. J. R. Vieira (Pernambuco; folio), consists of a series of popular pieces. Here may also be mentioned: "Seis Canciones Españoles del Perú y Chile," edited by G. de la Perdiz (London: Peck, 1846; folio), which contains an English translation of the original words. Airs of the Indian aborigines in South America have been published in a Supplement to "Reise in Brasilien," by Spix and Martius (Munich, 1823; 4to), and in "Voyage dans l'Amérique Méridionale," by Alcide d'Orbigny (Paris, 1839-43). Twelve songs of the South American Indians, arranged for the pianoforte by C. E. Södling, have been published in Sweden (Stockholm: A. Hirsch; folio).

There remains a word to be said concerning the so-called transcriptions of national airs by eminent pianists. Some of these are very interesting. F. Liszt, for instance, has rendered the characteristics of the Hungarian music most faithfully; perhaps he succeeded in this all the better since he is himself a native of Hungary. However, the present division of our research is already so long, that I am loth to enter upon any topic which is of secondary importance for the object in view.

Poetry.

National poetry is so closely associated with national music that it must not be entirely ignored here. In the books of poetry the musician will often find the words to those airs of songs which have been printed separately; and without an acquaintance with the words it is generally impossible to form a correct opinion of the air. Besides, many of the books of poetry contain introductory essays or annotations, in which an account is given of the music and manner of singing of the people whose poetry is discussed.

Carefully edited publications of this kind are of earlier date, and are more numerous, than carefully edited publications of national tunes. Musicians have been in this respect rather behind the poets and scientific men. In Germany, it was especially J. G. von Herder, during the latter half of the eighteenth century, who gave an impulse to a more universal research by his German translation of songs of different nations (Leipzig, 1778), of which a new edition by Johannes Falk appeared in the year 1825, and again another in 1840. Among subsequent German compilers of similar works deserves to be particularly named O. L. B. Wolff, whose "Halle der Völker" (Frankfurt a/M., 1837) and "Hausschatz der Volkspoesie" (Leipzig, 1853, fourth edition) contain metrical translations of national songs from many countries. Moreover, to the musician perhaps the most useful publication of this kind written in German is a dissertation entitled "Versuch einer geschichtlichen Charakteristik der Volkslieder germanischer Nationen," by Talvj (Leipzig, 1840; 8vo), which contains specimens of songs of uncivilised races as well as of European nations. Talvj is the wife of the well-known American scholar, Edward Robinson; her maiden name was Therese Amalie Louise von Jacob, from the initials of which she formed the nom de plume Talvj. It would require much space, and would probably interest but few musicians, were I to insert here the titles of even only the most important collections of national poetry which have been printed in different countries. I shall, however, give the names of some of the principal editors, and the date of publication of their works; thus the student will be enabled easily to find any book he desires to consult on the subject under consideration:—

Denmark.—Adam Oehlenschläger (Copenhagen, 1841). Svend Grundtvig (Copenhagen, 1853).

Faroe Isles.—H. C. Lyngbye (Randers, 1822).

Germany.—Arnim and Brentano, "Des Knaben Wunderhorn" (Heidelberg, 1806; second edition, 1846; third edition, Berlin, 1857). J. G. Meinert (Vienna and Hamburg, 1817). F. K. von Erlach (Mannheim, 1834). L. von Soltau (Leipzig, 1836). J. Görres (Frankfurt a/M., 1817). L. Uhland (Stuttgart and Tübingen, 1844). P. M. Körner (Stuttgart, 1840).

The Netherlands.—Le Jeune (The Hague, 1828). J. A. A. Thijm (Amsterdam, 1850).

France.—Lerous de Lincy (Paris, 1841). Silvestre (Paris, 1840). P. Paris (Paris, 1833). "La Fleur des Chansons Nouvelles" (Lyons, 1586; new edition, Paris, 1830). C. Nisard (Paris, 1867).

The national songs of Little-Russia (including the Ukraine, Volhynia, and Podolia) are in a peculiar Russian dialect. Collections of them have been published by the following editors: Tzertelef, 1819; Maximovitch, three books, 1827, 1837, 1843; Sreznefski, 1833 and 1838; Metlinski, 1857; Kostomarof, 1859; Zakrefski, 1860.

The Chumaks are wandering carriers who, with their carts drawn by oxen, travel to the Crimea to fetch salt, and to the Black Sea and the Sea of Azof to fetch fish for sale in the villages of the Ukraine. These carriers have peculiar songs of their own, a collection of which has recently been published, in Kief, edited by J. Y. Rudchenko, and entitled "Chumatskiya Narodnuiya Pyesni."

Several of the collections in languages little cultivated in England, or selections from them, have been translated into German; and, as these may be found preferable, the most important of them shall be indicated here:—

"Altdänische Heldenlieder, Balladen und Märchen, übersetzt von W. C. Grimm" (Heidelberg, 1811; 8vo).

"Volkslieder der Schweden, von G. Mohnike" (Berlin, 1830; 8vo). "Altschwedische Balladen, von G. Mohnike" (Stuttgart, 1836; 8vo).

"Schwedische Volksharfe, von J. L. Studach" (Stockholm, 1826; sm. 8vo). This interesting book contains also some airs in notation.

"Schwedische Volkslieder der Vorzeit, von Rosa Warrens" (Leipzig, 1857; 12mo). Contains some airs. "Norwegische Islandische, Färöische Volkslieder, &c., von Rosa Warrens" (Hamburg, 1866; sm. 8vo).

"Alt-islandische Volks-Balladen und Heldenlieder der Färinger, von P. P. Willatzen" (Bremen, 1865; sm. 8vo). Most of the old Icelandic ballads in this work are translated from "Islenzk Fornkvädi ved Svend Grundtvig og Jón Sigurdsson" (Copenhagen, 1854).

"Niederländische Volkslieder, von Hoffman von Fallersleben" (Hanover, 1856; 8vo).

"Altfranzösische Volkslieder, mit Anmerkungen von O. L. B. Wolff" (Leipzig, 1831; 12mo).

"Volkslieder und Romanzen der Spanier, von Emanual Geibel" (Berlin, 1840; sm. 8vo).

"Portugiesische Volkslieder von C. F. Bellermann" (Leipzig, 1854; 12mo). "Die alten Liederbücher der Portugiesen, von C. F. Bellermann" (Berlin, 1840; 4to).

"Proben Portugiesischer und Catalanischer Volksromanzen, von F. Wolf" (Vienna, 1856; 8vo).

"Anthologie neugriechischer Volkslieder, von Theodor Kind" (Leipzig, 1861; 12mo).

"Neugriechische Volksgesänge, von J. M. Firmenich" (Berlin, 1840; 8vo).

"Liebes-und Klagelieder des neugriechischen Volkes, von A. Passow" (Magdeburg, 1861; 8vo).

"Stimmen des russischen Volks, von P. von Goetze" (Stuttgart, 1828; 8vo).

"Die Balalaika; Russische Volkslieder, von Julius Altmann" (Berlin, 1863; 12mo).

"Die poetische Ukraine, ein Sammlung Kleinrussischer Volkslieder, von F. Bodenstedt" (Stuttgart, 1845; 8vo).

"Ehstnische Volkslieder, von H. Neus" (Reval, 1850; 8vo). Esthonian popular songs, in the original and with a German translation, published by the Esthonian Literary Society.

"Runen finnischer Volkspoesie, von Julius Altmann" (Leipzig, 1856; sm. 8vo).

"Volkslieder der Serben, von Talvj" (Leipzig, 1853; sm. 8vo, two vols.).

"Die Gesänge der Serben, von S. Kapper" (Leipzig, 1852; sm. 8vo, two vols.).

"Serbische Hochzeitslieder, von E. E. Wesely" (Pesth, 1826; 8vo).

"Gusle; Serbische Nationallieder, von L. A. Frankl" (Vienna, 1852; 8vo).

"Romänische Volkslieder, von J. K. Schuller" (Hermannstadt, 1859; 12mo).

"Ungarische Volkslieder, von M. A. Greguss" (Leipzig, 1846; sm. 8vo).

"Slawische Volkslieder, von J. Wenzig" (Halle, 1830; 12mo).

"Altcechische Leiche, Lieder und Sprüche, von Julius Feifalik" (Vienna, 1862; 8vo).

"Sammlung altböhmischer lyrisch-epischer Gesänge, von W. A. Swaboda" (Prague, 1829; 8vo).

"Böhmische Granaten, von Alfred Waldau" (Prague, 1858; 12mo, two vols.).

"Agrumi; volksthümliche Poesien aus allen Mundarten Italiens, von A. Kopisch" (Berlin, 1838; sm. 8vo).

"Volkslieder aus Venetien, von A. Wolf" (Vienna, 1864; 8vo).

"Italienisches Liederbuch, von Paul Heyse" (Berlin, 1860; 8vo).

"Proben der Volkslitteratur der Türkischen Stämme Süd-Sibiriens, von W. Radloff" (St. Petersburg, 1866; 8vo).

"Die Wüstenharfe; eine Sammlung arabischer Volkslieder, von J. Altmann" (Leipzig, 1856; 8vo).

"Hamâsa; oder die ältesten arabischen Volkslieder, von F. Rückert" (Stuttgart, 1846; 8vo, two vols.).

"Schi-King, Chinesisches Liederbuch, von F. Rückert" (Altona, 1833; 8vo).

"Schi-King, für's Deutsche Volk, herausgegeben von J. Cramer" (Crefeld, 1844; 8vo.)

THE GREAT COMPOSERS, SKETCHED BY THEMSELVES.

By Joseph Bennett.

No. IV.—BEETHOVEN (continued from page 490).

Having traced the connection between Beethoven and his nephew as far as is permitted by the master's letters to others, I now ask the reader to accompany me through the series addressed to the lad himself. If he do not find the way more than commonly interesting, the fault will be that of his guide alone.

Beethoven's first published letter to Carl is dated August, 1823, and was written from Baden, the pleasant village near Vienna whither the great composer often went to spend his holiday. At this time he was beginning to more than ever occupy himself and his epistles with personal ailments or the petty troubles of his small household; and here we read a good deal about catarrh, rheumatic constitutions, digestive organs, medicines, and such like. Poverty, however, is only hinted at. "Send your linen here at once," he writes; "your grey trousers must still be wearable, at all events at home; for, my dear son, you are indeed very dear to me." We can fancy the grim chuckle with which the master underscored the italicised word lest the point of his joke should be lost. But, in the midst of all, his paternal affection for the owner of the still serviceable grey trousers is plain. "Get on, and make every preparation for your examination, and be unassuming, so that you may prove yourself higher and better than people expect." This is his advice, and adding, "I wish a certain Carl may prove worthy of all my love and unwearied care, and learn fully to appreciate it," he signs himself "Your faithful and true father." A year later he writes again from Baden, making more complaints about bad digestion, a discoloured tongue, a poor appetite, and a stupid doctor who could find little the matter. "Continue to love me, my dear boy," pleads the poor man in his yearning for affection; "if ever I cause you pain it is not from a wish to grieve you, but for your eventual benefit. . . . I embrace you cordially. All I wish is that you should be loving, industrious, and upright. Write to me, my dear son." It is not difficult to gather from this that the master had felt called upon to exert his authority over Carl in some unpleasant fashion; nor are we at loss to divine the character of his interference, judging from a lettter written not long after to the person under whose immediate charge the lad was placed. "It strikes me as very remarkable," urges Beethoven, "that Carl cannot be persuaded to go into good society, where he might amuse himself in a creditable manner. This almost leads me to suspect that he finds recreation, both in the evening and at night, in less respectable company. I entreat you to be on your guard as to this, and on no pretext whatever to allow him to leave the house at night, unless you receive a written request from me to that effect." Already coming events were casting their shadows before, and it is about this time we find Carl relaxing in attention to his devoted, if somewhat exigeant, relative. Here is evidence on the point: "I daily become thinner, and feel far from well, and no physician, no sympathising friends! If you can possibly come on Sunday, pray do so; but I have no wish to deprive you of any pleasure, were I only sure that you would spend your Sunday properly away from me. . . . I must strive to wean myself from everything. If I were only sure that my great sacrifices would bring forth worthy fruits." Shortly after, we find Beethoven again begging for marks of confidence and affection: "Study assiduously and rise early, as various things may occur to you in the morning which you could do for me. It cannot be otherwise than becoming in a youth, now in his nineteenth year, to combine his duties towards his benefactor and foster-father with those of his education and progress. I fulfilled my obligations towards my own parents." To supplement his suspicions with reference to Carl's moral character came a report that the lad was in communication with his erring mother. The perfect naturalness of this does not seem to have qualified in any degree Beethoven's intense indignation. His passion blazed up like a fire of thorns, and one can see the flashings of it even now, between the lines of the furious epistle he straightway wrote to the youth. "I have been assured, though as yet it is only a matter of conjecture, that a clandestine intercourse has been renewed between your mother and yourself. Am I doomed again to experience such detestable ingratitude? No! if the tie is to be severed, so be it. By such conduct you will incur the hatred of all impartial persons. . . . If you find the pactum oppressive, then, in God's name, I resign you to His holy keeping. I have done my part, and on this score I do not dread appearing before the Highest of all Judges. Do not be afraid to come to me to-morrow, for as yet I only suspect; God grant my suspicions may not prove true, for to you it would be an incalculable misfortune, with whatever levity my rascally brother, and perhaps your mother also, may treat the matter." There is reason to believe that Beethoven's fears were only too true, inasmuch as he wrote a few days later in a style which, if less passionate, is more touching, because more despairing. The truth was being borne in upon the master that his cherished boy was the true son of his mother. "Misled as you have been," he argues, "it would be no bad thing were you at length to cultivate simplicity and truth, for my heart has been so deeply wounded by your deceitful conduct that it was difficult to forget it. Even were I disposed to submit like an ox to so hard a yoke without murmuring, if you pursue the same course towards others you will never succeed in gaining the love of any one. As God is my witness, I can think of nothing but you, and my contemptible brother, and the detestable family that I am afflicted with. May God vouchsafe to listen to my prayer, for never again can I trust you!" This letter is subscribed, "Your Father, alas! yet, fortunately, not your Father." A few days passed and then the master wrote more briefly, but quite as despairingly: "I wish you at least to come here on Sundays. In vain do I ask for an answer. God help you and me." This was all he at first intended to say, but, as though fearful that the breach would be widened by such curtness, the master added a long postscript, in the course of which he remarks, half apologetically, "Farewell. If I reproach you it is not without good cause, and it would be hard to have sacrificed so much merely to bestow a common-place man on the world." Then follows a complaint of his lonely and suffering state, concluding with, "Oh! do not further grieve me, for the scythe of Death will grant me no long delay." Carl seems to have obtained pardon with ease, and was probably induced to be civil for the sake of a new suit. At any rate, the next letter inclosed a sum of money to be spent at the tailor's, and administered a characteristic bit of advice: "Give me an exact account of how you spend the money, for it was hard to earn; still it is not worth while for the sake of a florin a yard not to select the best material; so choose, or get some one to choose for you, the best of the two at twenty-one florins. Order the highest quality for your trousers; also remember you ought never to wear your best clothes at home; no matter who comes, you need never be well-dressed in the house. The moment you come home change your good clothes, and be at your ease in those set aside for the purpose." Let me remark here, in passing, that Beethoven's precept and example coincided to a hair's breadth. He most assuredly did not wear his best clothes in the house. In a second letter the master further conciliated the young man by giving him leave to order not one but two pairs of trousers. Whether Carl cared as much for the endearment of the final paragraph is open to doubt, though it might have touched even his degenerate nature. Thus it ran: "Now, farewell, my darling; deserve this name. . . . I embrace you, and hope you will ever be my good, studious, noble son."

Several of the letters written at this time by the uncle to the nephew have chiefly to do with household matters, but in all of them we find additional evidence of Beethoven's parental solicitude. The composer is never weary of pouring his love and his counsel together into the young man's ear. At one time he says, "Do not involve yourself in any clandestine doings with my brother; above all do nothing clandestine towards me—towards your attached father." At another, writing from Baden, and longing to see his boy, "If it is too hard a task for you to come here, give it up; but if you can by any possibility do so, I shall rejoice in my desert home to have a feeling heart near me." At a third, he sends money, remarking, "As in this heat you may perhaps wish to bathe, I send you two more florins;" and at a fourth he pleads, "Be good and honest. . . . Be my own dear, precious son, and imitate my virtues but not my faults; still, though man is frail, do not, at least, have worse defects than those of your sincere and fondly attached father." Sometimes the man's love seems too intense to find adequate expression in the serious language natural to him, and he becomes actually playful under its influence, as thus: "Farewell again, my good fellow; we are well affected towards you. . . . Ah! au diable avec ces grands coquins de neveux; allez-vous en, soyez mon fils, mon fils bien-aimé. Adieu! je vous baise, votre père sincère comme toujours." In another instance, after asserting that his end was near, he burst out with "Good-bye, you scamp;" and in another he closed a lesson on economy by exclaiming, "Thriftless boy, farewell." Carl had now determined, as far as he ever determined anything, upon a commercial life, and entered the Polytechnic Institution with that object in view. The effect was redoubled solicitude on the part of his uncle, especially as regards money matters, concerning which the lad displayed the full carelessness of youth. "Only observe moderation," urged Beethoven. "Fortune crowns my efforts, but do not lay the foundation of misery by mistaken notions; be truthful and exact in the account of your expenses, and give up the theatre for the present. Follow the advice of your guide and father; be counselled by him whose exertions and aspirations have always been directed to your moral welfare, though without neglecting your temporal benefit." Nothing is more pathetic in this most touching series of letters than the constant yearning the master had for the companionship of his nephew, and the tone of apology in which he often begged for the pleasure. So much did he love Carl that he shrank from putting him to what he mournfully suspected was the trouble of a visit. At the close of one epistle we find him writing: "I impress my affection, as with a seal, on your attachment to me. If you are likely to miss your work by coming here, stay where you are." Then, as though fearful lest Carl should avail himself of the excuse put within reach, he adds: "Come soon. Come soon. Come soon"—all the desire of his heart bursting out in passionate repetition. But it is clear that even intense attachment could not rid Beethoven of doubt with regard to its object. His love was perfect, but it failed to cast out fear. Hence the nervous injunctions which almost every letter contains. "Spend your money on good objects alone," urges the master in one case. "Be my dear son. What a frightful discord would it be, were you to prove false to me, as many persons maintain that you already are. May God bless you." These words seem to have been dictated by presentiment, for shortly after they were written the master's affection received a cruel shock. His graceless nephew, who had before borrowed money from the "old witch" of a housekeeper and had incurred great displeasure in consequence, committed the same offence again. The amount obtained was only one florin fifteen kreutzers, but Beethoven did not care for the sum so much as for Carl's disobedience and want of principle. Bitter mortification and almost despair appear throughout the letter in which his feelings were expressed: "I do not wish now that you should come to me on September 19. It is better to finish your studies. God has never yet forsaken me, and no doubt some one will be found to close my eyes. . . . I also know that you have no pleasure now in coming to me, which is only natural, for my atmosphere is too pure for you. Last Sunday you again borrowed one florin fifteen kreutzers from the housekeeper, from a mean old kitchen wench; this was already forbidden; and it is the same in all things. I could have gone on wearing the out-of-doors coat for two years—to be sure I have the shabby custom of putting on an old coat at home—but Herr Carl! What a disgrace it would be! and why should he do so? Herr Ludwig van Beethoven's money-bags were expressly for this purpose. You had better not come next Sunday, for true harmony and concord can never exist with conduct such as yours. Why such hypocrisy? Avoid it, and then you will become a better man, and not require to be deceitful or untruthful, which will eventually benefit your moral character. Such is the impression you have made on my mind; for what avail even the most gentle reproofs? They merely serve to embitter you. But do not be uneasy; I shall continue to care for you as much as ever. . . . Farewell. He, who though he did not give you life has certainly provided for it, and above all striven to perfect your mental culture, and been more than a father to you, earnestly implores you to pursue steadily the only true path to all that is good and right." Now mark the inconsistency of affection. "You had better not come on Sunday," said the first part of the letter, and "Bring back the letter with you on Sunday" are the words with which it closes. There is reason to believe that Carl, who knew very well how to bring his uncle down from the "high horse," did not take the hint conveyed in the words last quoted, for, some days later, we find Beethoven again writing: "I hope . . . to see you positively on Saturday. I wish you never may have cause to feel ashamed of your want of love for me; if I alone suffer, what matters it? . . . Rest assured that you may at all times expect every possible kindness from me, but can I hope for the same from you? When you see me irritable, ascribe it solely to my great anxiety on your account, for you are exposed to many dangers. I hope, at all events, to get a letter from you to-morrow; do not cause me uneasiness, but think of my sufferings. I ought not properly to have any such apprehensions, but what sorrow have I not already experienced?" As though these words were not thought sufficient to touch the young man's feelings, Beethoven added in a postscript: "Remember that I am all alone here and subject to sudden illness." At last Carl broke silence, and appears to have threatened some desperate deed. Anyhow, the fond uncle, thinking of nothing but his love, went down in the dust before the young scamp and begged to be forgiven. "Say no more!" he exclaimed, "only come to my arms; not one harsh word shall you hear. For God's sake do not bring misery on your own head. You shall be received as lovingly as ever. We can discuss in a friendly manner what is to be done and settled as to the future. I pledge you my word of honour you shall meet with no reproaches from me, which indeed could no longer avail. You need expect only the most affectionate care and assistance from me. Only come. Come to the faithful heart of your father." But even this was not enough. Writing at the bottom of the page, "Volti sub.," he begins again on the next leaf: "Set off the moment you receive this letter. Si vous ne viendrez pas, vous me tuerez sûrement. Lisez la lettre et restez à la maison chez vous. Venez embrassez votre père, vous vraiment adonné. Soyez assuré que tout cela restera entre nous. For God's sake come home to day, for we cannot tell what risks you run—hasten, hasten to me." This passionate appeal, quite maternal in its utter denial of self, satisfied Carl of triumph, and the youth accordingly wrote to his uncle in reassuring terms. Straightway the old man breathed freely again, and felt all the joy of the father of the Prodigal. "Dear and much-loved son," he wrote, "I have just received your letter. I was a prey to anguish, and resolved to hurry into Vienna myself this very day. God be praised, this is not necessary. Follow my advice, and love and peace of mind, as well as worldly happiness, will attend us; and you can then combine an inward and spiritual existence with your outer life. But it is well that the former should be esteemed superior to the latter. So I am to see you on Saturday. Write to say whether you come early or in the evening, that I may hasten to meet you. I embrace and kiss you a thousand times over, not my lost but my new-born son. . . . Live, and my care of the son I have found again will show only love on the part of your father." Carl went out to Baden and saw his uncle, but not on Saturday. On the Sunday, as late as the young man could conveniently make it, the two met to part again as soon as he could decently get away. What took place during the short interview can only be guessed from a letter written a few days later, in which we read: "I rejoice at the thought of seeing you again, and if you detect any heavy clouds lowering, do not attribute them to deliberate anger, for they will be wholly chased away by your promise to strive more earnestly after the true and pure happiness based on active exertion. Something hovered before me in my last letter, which, though perhaps not quite justly, called forth a dark mood. This, after all that has passed, was indeed very possible; still, who would not rejoice when a transgressor returns to the right path? And this I hope I shall live to see. I was especially pained by your coming so late on Sunday, and hurrying away again so early." With these words of complaint the last published letter of Beethoven to his nephew closes, and they are typical of the whole unfortunate connection. Carl went his own way utterly aimless; gave the poor master more and more trouble, and at last, three months before Beethoven's death, joined the army as a cadet. This, however, did not hinder the devoted "father," as he loved to call himself, from appointing the young man his sole heir.

Reading the extracts quoted above without any previous knowledge of the writer, we should have no difficulty in concluding them to be the sentiments of a man conspicuous for the tenderness of his nature. It is hard indeed to associate them with the stern, morose, and well-nigh "impossible" Beethoven; into whose presence men ventured with fear and trembling. But here, I make bold to think, we have the true man revealed. And a grand man he is; animated alike by a noble regard for truth and honour, and a not less noble purity and strength of affection. We may regret that he lavished his love upon an unworthy object—that the wealth of feeling squandered upon a heartless youth was not possessed by some good woman who might have beautified his life. But none the less—rather, all the more—must we admire the faithful devotion shown by Beethoven to his adopted son; a devotion that endured to the end unaffected by the folly, and worse, of him whose undeserved fortune it was to possess it.

A SECOND MUSICAL RETROSPECT.

By Henry C. Lunn.

Diving once more into the musical records of the past, in addition to some interesting matter from the volumes of the Harmonicon—which, from want of space, I was compelled to omit from my former "Musical Retrospect"—I have now also to extract a few curious passages from a work on the art published in 1762, by C. Henderson, "Under the Royal Exchange." The picture of the time is so faithfully reflected in the pages of the Harmonicon—which, in spite of its defects, must have been in advance of its day—that I will commence with some quotations from this periodical, telling my readers, however, to bear in mind that, as far as the criticisms are concerned, many of the compositions now stamped with the public approval were at the time this journal was published "music of the future." In 1831 Mr. Thomas Monck Mason opened the "King's Theatre" as an avowed "corrector of abuses;" and in his prospectus we are told that all the Operas acted must be in the Italian language, and that to some of the works of the "authors of the elder schools" the director, with the assistance of composers of the first ability, has "replenished the orchestral accompaniments;" citing as a precedent that Mozart had done the same thing. "A variety of new ballets shall be presented," it is said, "and a novel species of comic ballet introduced. Full dress for gentlemen will alone ensure admission, and ladies are requested not to come in toques, hats, or bonnets." It is also announced that "none but bonâ fide subscribers will of right be admitted behind the scenes." We have no list of prices in this prospectus; but as a specimen of the amount sometimes demanded for admission at musical entertainments, we give the following scale of charges at Paganini's Concert. "Boxes, pit tier, eight guineas; ground tier, ten guineas; one pair, nine guineas; two pair, six guineas; three pair, four guineas; stalls, two guineas; orchestra, one and half guineas; admission to the pit, one guinea; ditto to the gallery, half-guinea."

Perhaps our readers, in perusing the following announcement, may be reminded of a similar gigantic undertaking promulgated, but not yet accomplished, in the present day. "A new Institution is projected which is to combine in itself a lyric theatre, a grand assembly and concert-room, reading-rooms, and refectories; a grand panorama, and an ornamented garden, with bridges, fountains, cascades, temples, &c. The theatre to be devoted to two distinct purposes: first, as an academy for young professors and pupils for the stage; secondly, as an elegant subscription theatre for evening entertainments, comprehending Opera and Ballet performances. Every Monday and Thursday it is proposed to perform an English Opera; on Tuesdays and Fridays, a grand Concert; and on Wednesdays and Saturdays, an Italian Opera by English candidates for the Italian stage. This institution, which is to be called 'The Royal Panarmonion,' is to be situated at the top of Gray's Inn Lane." Whether this building was ever commenced, or, being completed, was applied to some other purpose, we cannot tell; but the above is the only record we can find respecting the "Royal Panarmonion." Amongst the interesting items of news we light on a paragraph noticing Weber's Concert at the Argyll Rooms, on Friday the 26th of May, 1826, where his "Jubilee Cantata," with English words by Hampden Napier, was given, and at the end of the performance the composer was so exhausted that he threw himself upon a sofa and created "a considerable alarm in the by-standers." Ten days after this event he died. At his funeral the singing is criticised as if it were at a concert, for we are told that Miss Cubitt was "heard to peculiar advantage in music of this description," and that "Braham and Phillips were in fine voice." Even in those days the price of music appeared to be a subject agitating the public mind, for it is said that "if the public do not soon open their eyes to the state of the music trade as it is now carried on, and take measures for reforming it, why then we hope that the present prices, enormous as in most instances they are, will be doubled; for if people have a passion for paying a hundred per cent. more than necessary, let them, in the name of justice and freedom, indulge so singular a passion." The high "pitch" too is also debated in a number of letters; and it is said that this evil, which has gradually crept in, is steadily increasing, and it must cease therefore to be a matter of wonder "either that the voices of the Opera should be spoiled, or that screaming should take the place of singing." In 1824 appeared a "Biographical and Historical Dictionary of Musicians," and in this it was asserted that Samuel Wesley "died about the year 1815." Shortly after the publication of the Dictionary an amusing letter from the composer who had been thus unceremoniously disposed of was inserted in a newspaper, in which he says that he would feel much obliged if the publishers of the work will give a minute detail of his funeral and also a description of the "present place of sepulture." A lengthened correspondence then took place, for extracts of which I cannot at present find room. Innumerable announcements of coming musical prodigies appear, some of whom were certain to create astounding effects; but one of the most singular of these is a one-armed flute-player, and a young lady from Bordeaux, with neither arms nor feet, who played the pianoforte with her nose. Amongst the criticisms many are found which, as I have already said, must be considered according to the light of the time in which they were written. Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony is spoken of generally in an encouraging but patronising spirit, although it is said that "in spite of its merit, the termination of it is wished for some minutes before it arrives." The same composer's Symphony in F is said to have "but few striking points," but another critique affirms that it bears many marks of the composer's genius in all the movements save the first, "which might have been written by any one skilled in the mechanism of a score." The notices of Madame Malibran's singing are curiously contradictory; for in one we are told that her shake is "one of the most imperfect we ever heard;" that she is an imitator of Madame Pasta although she "has not reached the excellence of the original, being inferior to her in pathos and discrimination, both in acting and singing;" and in another (which appears very shortly afterwards) that "to great flexibility of voice she adds a delicacy of expression we have seldom heard equalled, and her lower tones are as soft and melodious as the upper notes of her voice; nor is there any apparent effort or strain in producing that articulation by which every one of them is distinctly heard. When to these perfections we add great feeling, we think we have said enough." Modern readers would think that they had said too much, without some preliminary apology for the previous criticism. But it is evident that the writers in the Harmonicon were tolerably outspoken; for of Signor Rubini's appearance at the Philharmonic Concerts it is said "a worse specimen of singing we never witnessed than Signor Rubini's 'Il mio tesoro;' it was so bad as to be quite comic." Those in the habit of attending the Italian Opera at that time will remember that the vocalist's fame survived this critique. All this however is at least musical opinion, although time has proved its fallacy; but what can be thought of the notices in some of the leading newspapers when in one we read—speaking of a prima donna—that "the exact compass of her voice was from E below the lines to F in the upper key;" in another that Miss Stephens "led off the Hailstone Chorus in fine style;" and in a third that a Duet by Rossini "was executed by Mdlle. Sontag and Madame Garcia in the most delightful unison"?

Leaving now the interesting pages of the Harmonicon, I come to the book I have already mentioned, which although upwards of a century old, contains many remarks upon the art which might be read with much profit in the present day. It is entitled "Observations on the present state of Music and Musicians," and is written by John Potter, who says in his preface that most of the "observations" in the work were interspersed in his lectures read at Gresham College. Commencing by deploring the fact of so few good treatises on the science being written, he boldly says that this must arise from one of two reasons—either that "the practical part of music is more pleasing than the theory, and therefore is too apt to draw us off from it," or that there is a desire amongst professors "to conceal its mysteries, in order to reap the greater advantage from it;" and in support of the probability of this last reason being the true one, he says that when Geminiani published his Treatise "some musicians complained to him that he had explained too much; and added that such things ought to be kept secret for their advantage." And here follows a bit of plain-speaking, the truth of which has been repeatedly proved during the hundred and fifteen years which have elapsed since it was written: "It cannot be denied but we sometimes meet with music compos'd in a pretty taste, tho' not strictly agreeable to principles; which discovers the author to have been directed by a taste he has acquir'd from the works of others; and some compose from a knowledge of the principles without any taste at all, either natural or acquir'd: yet tho' the compositions of the latter are seldom elegant, they are generally more correct. Now if those who understand the practical part of music can compose by having a taste only and no judgment; and they that have judgment are capable of it without a taste, what a figure must he make that has both." His analysis of the music of various countries contains much good sense; but the manner in which his remarks are tinged with the prejudices of the time may be gathered from the following sentence: "As to the music of our inveterate enemies the French, I need not attempt to characterize it, as it will not be serviceable to my present design; it being universally known to have little taste or merit." Our author has a very commendable love for the compositions of his countrymen; but readers will smile when, after praising Handel and Dr. Arne, he alludes in the highest terms to the "ingenious Mr. Stanley," and naively asks, "Why will not the English Operas composed by Mr. Smith please as well as the Italian?" The book concludes with "A Scheme for erecting and supporting a Musical Academy in this Kingdom;" and as it is proposed to establish such an Institution by authority of the Government, that public subscriptions should be solicited, that the first masters should be selected as teachers, and that "they should make choice of proper compositions to be made use of by the pupils, so that they might from the very beginning be grounded in a true taste"—it may be inferred that the author had well thought out his subject. But we cannot close our article without quoting the most important proposition of all: "An authority should be granted by the legislative power to the masters of this Academy to have a right to command the sight of all musical compositions intended to be made public by all, even out of the Academy; and to make such alterations and corrections as they should think necessary, without which, and a licence from the Academy, no music should be suffered to be printed. By this means nothing would hereafter be made public but what is correct and compleat, and fit to be left for the use of posterity." Were it possible for Mr. Potter to visit his "posterity," he would find that up to the year 1878 we are still looking forward to the establishment of some such musical tribunal as he suggests.

We quote the following from the Times of the 24th ult. The Bishop of Gloucester, from his position in a city so long associated with sacred music through the Three Choir Festivals, can exercise a highly beneficial influence upon the art both by precept and example; and we have much gratification therefore in drawing the attention of our readers to his recent speech on distributing the prizes gained by the Gloucester students at the musical examinations in connection with Trinity College, London; his warm tribute to the power of music being perhaps even more forcible from the fact of his declaring his entire ignorance of the science. "In addressing the competitors his lordship said nature had denied him the gift of what is called 'an ear for music;' and while he could feel the pleasure that flowed from hearing a melody he could not penetrate into the mysteries of harmony, and therefore he was a singular specimen of one who respected, though he did not thoroughly love, music. In answering the question, What is music? he reviewed the progress of musical art since the Renaissance age, and pointed out that from the middle of the sixteenth to the end of the seventeenth centuries musical composers endeavoured not only to please the ear, but also to touch the sensibilities. At the beginning of the present century the power of music to express sentiment began to be clearly recognised. Every one hearing very fine music must have felt that it expressed some inward feeling, something hardly to be analysed, expressing a realm of thought in part felt and in part lying beyond. A distinguished German, addressing music, said: 'Away, away, thou speakest to me unutterable things that I have lifelong sought for and never, never found.' That was saying in highly poetic language that music had powers of expression that went beyond even the power of words. Some of our composers had made this a subject of very careful study. Haydn had done this in the first movement of his first Symphony. But music was something more than a means of expressing sentiment and feeling. There was a power in music to call out the emotions, the nobler and the better feelings. It was in touching the inner life, in penetrating the inner chambers of the soul, and in awaking nobler feelings, that music showed its greatest and its noblest power; and no music deserved to be thoroughly admired and honoured except in a great measure it expressed that power. If music only appealed to his ear he should not care to hear any more; if it only expressed his inner feelings he should not care to hear much more; but if he could sit in the concert-room or in the spacious minster, and listen to music which called his better emotions and feelings to the surface, then he began to say to himself, 'This is truly a divine art,' and, imperfectly constituted as he might be, he uncovered his head and honoured and revered the great, the divine art of music."

We look for singular doings at an Eisteddfod. They are in harmony with the Gorsedd, and accord with one's sense of the fitness of things. But we did not expect that, at an Eisteddfod held out of Wales, and therefore subject in some measure to the influences of common sense, it would be held criminal for a singer to catch cold. At the first of the Birkenhead Evening Concerts, "Mr. Councillor John Hughes" came forward, and said, "I am very sorry to have to announce to you, but I am afraid it is an old story, that Mr. Sims Reeves as usual has disappointed us." Hearing these words the audience burst out with "hisses and groans," at which we do not complain further than is necessary to deprecate the uncharitable conclusions evidently at once formed. No doubt many present made up their minds sur-le-champ, as our neighbours say, that Mr. Reeves, having engaged to appear, deliberately stayed away. In that case inarticulate noises were, perhaps, natural. But Mr. Councillor John Hughes went on: "We have received this telegram: 'Since my return to England have taken cold, which will positively prevent my appearing for ten days or a week at least. Extremely sorry.'" How are we to interpret the roars of laughter with which the assembled Welshmen greeted these words? It could not have been an expression of scornful unbelief, because our Cambrian friends would find it hard to compass the thought of a man telling lies to avoid earning some hundreds of pounds in four days. Then it must have been an expression of surprise and wrath at the fact of the great tenor catching cold. But the matter did not end here. Mr. Councillor John Hughes was ingenious enough to see in Mr. Reeves's behaviour a mark of disrespect to the Eisteddfod, and, through it, to the sensitive Welsh nation. Hence, he added, when the people before him had stopped laughing: "Now, ladies and gentlemen, having regard to the fact that the Eisteddfod is a national meeting in connection with Wales, I think it shows very little respect on the part of Mr. Reeves to send us at the last moment this intimation, when everybody was expecting that the great tenor of England would present himself." To this the audience said, "Hear, hear." It follows that not only must a singer engaged by Welshmen keep clear of colds, but that, having sinfully neglected to do so, he must assume at the earliest possible moment that his cold will disable him, or put up with the consequences of showing "very little respect." This is hard on Mr. Reeves, who, with the best intentions, waited till the last moment. But our famous singer can find comfort in the happy fact that by not going to the Eisteddfod he escaped being made a bard.

We never interfere with the opinions of "special correspondents" who attend at the Festivals to report the proceedings for our contemporaries; but when they relate circumstances which never took place, a slur is thrown upon the veracity of those who differ with them, and we therefore believe it our duty to set them right. In a notice of the late Worcester Festival a weekly musical journal tells us, speaking of the morning when "Elijah" was given, "Mr. Santley was manifestly unwell, and retired during the performance, his place being taken by Mr. Wadmore;" although it was evident, we should have thought, to any person in the Cathedral that Mr. Santley sang every note throughout the part of Elijah, and never quitted the orchestra save between the parts. In the same journal we are told that at the first evening concert Mr. Santley appeared "in good form;" the truth being that he did not sing at all, Mr. Lloyd giving a song in place of that set down for Signor Foli. In another contemporary, the smart musical critic of which prides himself upon supplying "exclusive information," an excellent notice of the singing of Mr. Santley in "Elijah," copied from a daily contemporary, is held up to ridicule because (relying upon the account to which we have drawn attention above), he says, "Mr. Santley's voice was so hopelessly choked by illness that he was compelled to withdraw during the performance." But as this writer knows nothing about the subject upon which he is informing us—avowedly penning his remarks upon the Festival in London, instead of at Worcester—he is resolved to be circumstantial, and triumphantly says, "One 'daily' gave us a description of how Mr. Santley sang 'The trumpet shall sound,' when, as a matter of fact, it was sung by Mr. Wadmore." Now we affirm that, "as a matter of fact," this piece was sung by Mr. Santley; and we trust therefore that if the critic of this journal prefer to remain at home during a Three Choir Festival, he should at least make sure of the truth of the news he may pick up before he flatly contradicts the assertions of those who journey to Worcester in the performance of their duties.

"How fortunate it is," said Rossini, after hearing some of the works of Berlioz, "that this man did not become a musician." We confess to have made some such remark after perusing a paper which has been forwarded to us, headed "Illustrations of the Compositions of the Great German Masters in Music;" for insane and Quixotic as the idea of improving what is perfect may be, there would at least have been a method in the madness of an individual who holds up to ridicule the music of Beethoven and Handel if he could have brought any amount of knowledge to his task. "The High Priest of the abomination of desolation will be surprised," he says in his prefatory remarks, "if the regions so long held closed against intellect and natural emotion are penetrated by the enemy;" and then he gives the "Amen" from the "Quoniam Tu Solus," in Beethoven's Mass in C, Handel's song from the "Messiah," "I know that my Redeemer liveth," and a portion of the same composer's chorus, "Worthy is the Lamb." Beethoven, he asserts, has in his "Amen" written "a very short passage, but what a tale it discloses of the degradation and corruption of music;" in Handel's quoted song he says, "the progressions are frightful from beginning to end," and if the vocal score in the chorus be lawful and pure, he affirms boldly that "such an accompaniment would be appropriately rendered by incurable maniacs." Unfortunately for his case, however, as we have already said, he "corrects" these compositions, putting them, according to his jargon, "in comparative form, and in lawful and natural progression;" and then we have a succession of harmonies—including the most glaring consecutive fifths—which would frighten a musician out of any neighbourhood where he had once heard them. "When the whole subject," it is said—"the 'Quoniam Tu Solus'—of the Mass in C is published in comparative form, the great facts here involved will be better understood; it will be a very painful disclosure." Undoubtedly it will, but scarcely more painful than the "disclosure" already made.

"Lothair, by the Right Honourable B. Disraeli" is a novel reflecting the experience of a man who moves in the circle of society which he pictures; and yet, vividly as the scenes are coloured, and truthful as is the language employed in describing the life around him, whenever music is mentioned the author unmistakably proves not only that he is unacquainted with the rudiments of the art, but that he does not hesitate to use terms of which he cares not to inquire the signification. When he writes that "two fair sisters burst into melody as they tried the passages of a new air," and that the "Duke sometimes took a second," we have little doubt that, musically speaking, he does not mean at all what he says; but the remark that "many things were said and done amid accompanying melodies, that animated without distracting even a whist player," we fear that he gives too accurate a description of the manner in which music is often treated in the drawing-rooms of the aristocracy. Occasionally, however, he becomes more minute, as, for example, when he seems to infer that a "fine Mass of Mozart" is sung by a single vocalist, who must possess "skill as well as power to render it;" but the climax seems reached when he thus relates the effect produced upon him by the voice of Theodora: "Deeper and richer, and richer and deeper, it seemed to become, as it wound with exquisite facility through a symphony of delicious sound, until it ended in a passionate burst, which made Lothair's heart beat so tumultuously that for a moment he thought he should be overpowered." Apart from the important fact that we are extracting from the work of one of our most prominent legislators, we cannot but wonder whether upon any other art or science writing like this would be hazarded by a person of such general culture as the author of "Lothair."

The many pressing demands upon our space have hitherto prevented our doing as much justice as we could wish to the efforts of those who have so zealously laboured to establish and place on a permanent footing an Academy exclusively devoted to the musical education of the blind. The success of these efforts may be estimated by the fact that at Westow Street, Upper Norwood, an institution termed "The Royal Normal College and Academy of Music for the Blind," accommodating eighty-two pupils, has been for some time in operation. Dr. Armitage, at the recent annual festival, asserted that of those trained in the College seventy or eighty per cent were enabled to maintain themselves, and that they earned from £50 to £100 a year. Music, when properly taught, absorbs so much time and attention that it becomes an impossibility to combine its study with any manual labour—basket-making, for instance—and, as the speaker already mentioned truly observed, the attempt to do so must inevitably result in producing "bad basket-makers and bad musicians." The cost for each pupil is £60 a year, which certainly does not exceed that at other institutions where the pupils are rendered less fit for success in life. Of course in the ordinary exercise of the musical profession, however clever an artist may be, blindness must to a certain extent act as a bar to his progress; but as a pianoforte-tuner he should find ample employment; and we earnestly hope that the zealous promoters of the College to which we have called attention will be effectually seconded by those who have the power to place its duly qualified pupils in such positions as will enable them to feel that their natural affliction has not been deepened by the world's neglect.

"Mr. Mapleson is not P. T. Barnum, and his opera-company is no cattle-show." In these words the New York Music Trade Review closes an article headed "Beware of your Friends," which may be read with edification by a good many persons on our side of the Atlantic. It appears that the well-wishers of Mr. Mapleson's American enterprise are doing it all the harm they can through the means of fulsome eulogies. Among them the New York Herald is the most mischievous. It tells the public that Madame Gerster is not surpassed even by Patti or Nilsson; praises the other artists in proportion; avers that American amateurs are, at last, to know what an operatic chorus is, and finishes by contrasting the excellences of the English manager with the demerits of the rivals against whom he will have to contend. In view of all this our contemporary hints that Mr. Mapleson ought to "gag his friends." "He ought to forbid them to meddle with his business; he ought to prevent them from hurting his cause by publishing hyper-eulogistic articles which make Col. Mapleson actually appear a charlatan in the eyes of those who do not know him sufficiently to be sure of the contrary." This is very true, but the Music Trade Review takes no account of the fact that some managers like to be injured in this fashion. Their press friends cannot invent terms too laudatory nor, in prospect of a fresh venture, go too far beyond the utmost possibility of realisation. They have been known to write their own paragraphs; and this is, probably, how we were able to read in a London weekly not long ago that a certain choral body was next to perfection, and in another column of the same paper to learn that it "wretchedly butchered" its share of a classical work.

We sincerely hope that, however the residents of Worcester and its neighbourhood may allow themselves to be guided by the criticisms of the local papers upon the recent Festival, they do not rely too securely upon the facts put forward by some of them respecting the works performed. We have no desire to point out all the errors; but one piece of information, in the Worcester Herald, is too good to be lost. Speaking of "Elijah" it is stated that "the first interpreter of the chief character in it—Elijah—was Mr. Weiss, who was succeeded by Lockey." It has often been sarcastically said that when a man volunteers to tell you all about a thing he usually knows less of the subject than you do yourself, and here is a notable illustration of the fact. Many persons who meet with this paragraph will doubtless be able to correct the writer of it; but when we tell those who are ignorant of the matter that the "first interpreter" of Elijah was Herr Staudigl, and that "Lockey" was a tenor, who sang in the Oratorio on its production at Birmingham, we are certain that they will not only be grateful for the information, but fully agree with us that this double mistake is almost unique.

THE WORCESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(From our Special Correspondent.)

Not only those who feel with us how powerfully the highest music enforces the true meaning of the sacred words with which it is allied, but all who have experienced the effects of its important aid in the cause of charity, must rejoice at the fact of Worcester once more uniting with Gloucester and Hereford in the noble mission of helping, by means of its time-honoured Musical Festival, the widows and orphans of those who have devoted their lives to the service of the Church. Although we have felt strongly, we have dealt tenderly with the circumstances causing that temporary estrangement which is now happily a thing of the past, because we know that those who opposed the Festival in its present form, and those who upheld it, were actuated by the same good feeling towards the Charity; and that the difference of opinion which existed as to the method of contributing to its support, although it might be modified if met with calm consideration, would certainly be deepened by uncompromising opposition. The Three Choir Festivals effect a benefit to art apart from that of mere large musical meetings; for not only are the great works then heard amidst surroundings which materially heighten their effect, but many residents in the neighbourhood who, notwithstanding the modern facilities in travelling, rarely visit the metropolis, become thus acquainted with compositions which perhaps before they only knew by name, or by the imperfect local performances they were enabled to attend. We care not, therefore, here to discuss the details of a compromise by which a feud threatening at one time positively to uproot these Festivals has been healed. If religious scruples which enter not into our creed are appeased by the fact of tickets being "subscribed for," instead of "bought," and by a few other minor alterations in the general plan of the Festival, we see no reason for offering a shadow of objection to such arrangements. In deference to public opinion the Dean and Chapter have this year granted the use of the Cathedral, and it would serve no good purpose to throw a slur upon such a concession by too strictly criticising its not very exacting conditions.

The opening day of the 155th Festival of the Three Choirs—the 10th ult.—it might be supposed was marked by an unusual demonstration. The morning was devoted to a Choral Service; and as the Mayor had invited the Mayors and Corporations of the sister cities, with many of the leading families of the neighbourhood, to breakfast with him at the Town Hall before the Service, quite an imposing procession was formed, the bustling entrance of which into the Cathedral caused the whole congregation to rise; and it might be said that although the frantic attempts to catch a glimpse of the show would not have been so out of place had a performance of an Oratorio been about to commence, such a scene scarcely accorded with the solemnity which we expect at a Church Service. As admission was on this occasion free, under regulations issued by the Dean and Chapter, it is almost unnecessary to say that every seat was occupied; but, with the exception already alluded to, no congregation could possibly be more thoroughly devout or enter more sincerely into the feeling and spirit of the Service. The Concerto by Handel, chosen as an organ voluntary by Mr. C. H. Lloyd, was well played, but it is perhaps to be regretted that he did not select one more suitable to inaugurate a Musical Festival of such importance. As a matter almost of course, Tallis's Responses were used; the "Venite" was sung to the Grand Chant, and Psalms 50 and 52 to Chants by Dr. Elvey, in F major, and 51 to that by Morley, in D minor. The effect of Handel's "Dettingen Te Deum" was so great as almost to crush the fine "Jubilate," in D, of Purcell. Both however were well chosen for place in a Service where such perfect justice could be done to them by band, choir, and principal singers. In the first-named work the solo parts were sustained by Miss Mary Davies, Madame Patey, Messrs. Guy, Wadmore, and Santley; Mr. Wadmore creating a most favourable impression by his fine rendering of the solo, "Vouchsafe, O Lord," and Mr. T. Harper's trumpet passages giving much brightness to the instrumental portion of the composition. In the "Jubilate" Miss Bertha Griffiths, Messrs. Guy and Wadmore were the principal singers. The choir in both these works was excellent, every point being brought out with clearness and accuracy, "When Thou hadst overcome" especially being a triumph of chorus-singing. One of Bach's Motetts for double choir, "Blessing, glory, wisdom, and thanks," was chosen for the Anthem. The programme states that this work is "attributed to Bach," and certainly, although portions of it appear stamped with the master's style, it is on the whole not one of the best of his numerous Motetts. The sermon, preached by the Right Rev. the Bishop of Worcester, proved how thoroughly he had resolved to act as a peacemaker; for although strenuously advocating the absolute necessity of calling in good music to aid in the service of the Church, he touched but lightly upon the mode of conducting the Festivals, merely expressing a hope that the alterations made this year might commend themselves to the authorities of Hereford and Gloucester. The "Hundredth Psalm" was sung before the "Benediction," with the ingenious, but somewhat over-elaborated, harmonies by the late Dr. S. S. Wesley, many of the congregation joining in.

At the first Oratorio performance at the Cathedral in the evening the bad effect of the low platform for the choir and orchestra—placed in the centre of the north and south transepts, instead of beneath the west window as on former occasions—became more apparent than at the morning Service. By this arrangement the voices of the choralists were never thrown forward into the nave, and the body of sound seemed confined within a narrow space, some indeed even playing and singing behind the pillars. That this defect will be remedied on a future occasion we sincerely hope; for, with all deference to the clerical authorities, there can be no question that, if a platform is to be erected at all, it matters little how high it is or where it is placed. The first part of Haydn's "Creation"—preceded by a set form of prayer by which each performance during the Festival commenced and terminated—introduced Madame Albani, whose exquisite voice was heard to much advantage in "With verdure clad" and in the solo portions of the Chorus, "The marvellous work," although we cannot but feel that she has yet to train herself to that fervid and devotional style demanded for the due rendering of sacred music. The tenor solos were well sung by Mr. Guy; and Mr. Santley (who was engaged at the last moment to replace Signor Foli, absent from severe indisposition) created a marked effect in the Air, "Rolling in foaming billows." In Mozart's "Requiem" Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, and Messrs. Lloyd and Santley sustained the solo portions with much success, the "Benedictus," especially, being sung with exquisite expression; and the choruses throughout were remarkably well given. Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," which concluded the programme for the evening, displayed both the excellence of the orchestra and the intelligent conducting of Mr. Done, for every one of the beautiful instrumental movements was taken in the right time, and every point was effectively brought out. In the solo portion Madame Albani was extremely effective, the music being especially suited for her voice, and she was ably supported in the Duet, "I waited for the Lord," by Miss Anna Williams. Mr. Lloyd sang with good dramatic feeling the recitative passages, "Watchman, will the night soon pass?" and the choruses were given with much precision and beauty of tone.

The second morning was devoted to the performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah," Mr. Santley singing the music of the Prophet throughout, in many parts as finely as ever, but occasionally showing some signs of fatigue, especially in the portions requiring positive physical power. Miss Anna Williams distinguished herself by her dramatic rendering of the music of the widow; Mr. Guy's delivery of the Solo, "If with all your hearts," created a highly favourable impression; Miss Bertha Griffiths sang with good expression "Woe unto them;" and, instead of allowing the representative of the Widow to sing the music of the "Youth" (a custom too often adhered to, even at these Festivals), we had Miss Mary Davies, whose clear and sympathetic voice gave the utmost effect to the Recitative, "There is nothing," fully realising the intention of the composer. Madame Albani sang the whole of the soprano music in the second part—"Hear ye, Israel" of course delighting all whose recollection of Mdlle. Titiens was not too vivid; Madame Patey was equally good in the declamatory part of Jezebel and the tranquil Air, "O rest in the Lord;" Mr. Lloyd gave in his best style the Solo, "Then shall the righteous;" and Miss Mary Davies, especially in the Trio "Lift thine eyes," proved herself a thoroughly reliable and conscientious artist.

At the secular concert in the evening, at the College Hall, the first part of the programme included Sterndale Bennett's Pastoral Cantata, "The May Queen," the very excellent performance of which appeared to give unqualified delight to the large audience assembled. Miss Mary Davies thoroughly won the sympathy of her hearers by the purity of her voice and style, eliciting much applause in the solo portion of the beautiful number, "With a laugh as we go round," and also in the Duet, with Mr. Guy, "Can I not find thee a warrant for changing?" The tenor and bass parts were sung by Messrs. Guy and Wadmore respectively with excellent effect, and Miss Bertha Griffiths lent efficient aid in the small part of the Queen. The characteristic bass Solo, "'Tis jolly to hunt" (well sung by Mr. Wadmore), and the melodious Trio, "The hawthorn in the glade," produced their usual effect; and the choruses were on the whole satisfactorily given, the brief time allowed for the preparation of the work being considered. The other items in the concert calling for special notice were the fine rendering of the Scena, "Softly sighs," by Miss Anna Williams; the remarkably vigorous and artistic playing of the first movement of Beethoven's Violin Concerto, by M. Sainton (who was recalled amidst thunders of applause); the brilliant singing of Madame Albani in Bellini's Aria, "Qui la voce," and the excellent performance of Mozart's Symphony in G minor, to which we are glad to say the Worcester audience paid due respect by silence during its progress and applause at the conclusion of each movement.

Dr. Armes's Oratorio "Hezekiah" occupied the first part of the programme at the performance in the Cathedral on the third morning of the Festival. This composition was not a novelty, having been produced last winter at some concerts at Newcastle, under the direction of Mr. Rea; but since then the composer has materially improved the score, and also made some additions. As Organist of Durham Cathedral Dr. Armes holds a deservedly high reputation, and he will not perhaps think that we are materially disparaging his work when we pronounce "Hezekiah" an "organist's Oratorio." Creditable as it is for one who has especially devoted himself to Cathedral work to produce at a Festival a sacred composition which challenges from its magnitude the highest criticism, it must always be remembered that in returning a verdict we can but judge by the evidence; and that the fairest way of estimating a work is to throw aside the antecedents of the worker. True, "Hezekiah" is not long, but it is moulded in a form which demands something more than the faculty of writing good music. A number of choral pieces, interspersed with solos, duets, and quartetts, is not necessarily an Oratorio, even when they evidence such careful workmanship as we find throughout Dr. Armes's composition. The power of grasping the whole meaning of a libretto, so as to invest it with that variety of musical colour which gives life to the words, and moves an audience to sympathise with the feelings of the text throughout, is so rare that even accomplished musicians like Dr. Armes should not be surprised when they are told that, although they have written a clever work, they have not written a clever Oratorio. In "Hezekiah" the want of continuity and development in the most important pieces cannot fail to strike all whose musical training has been based upon that grand school of sacred writing of which the great masters have bequeathed us such noble specimens; and even the solo portions are, as a rule, rather tuneful and pretty than appropriate to the words. As we have already indicated, too, the work suffers from being written from an organist's point of view, the instrumentation being in many cases weak and unsatisfactory, much of the accompaniment indeed being more suited to the requirements of Opera than for those of Oratorio. As abstract music, however, Dr. Armes's work is entitled to much praise. The instrumental Introduction, descriptive of the march of Sennacherib's army on Jerusalem, is melodious and well scored; one other merit being that it is no imitation of any of the well-known Marches so often taken as models by young composers. Two Recitatives—the first for bass and the second for contralto—lead to a Chorus of the people, in E minor, opening with some good imitative passages, initiated by the bass, and moving upwards through the divisions of the choir, the latter portion being in full harmony. A contralto Solo, "Enter into the rock," in the tonic major, is smooth and vocal, without, however, much distinctive character; but the Recitative and Solo for the tenor, Hezekiah, is extremely well written, the prayer, in the relative minor, having much devotional feeling. The Chorus, "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace," is one of two choral numbers added to the work since its performance at Newcastle, and is decidedly more creditable to the composer's musicianship than to his inventive power. The monotonous feeling produced by a constantly recurring orchestral figure somewhat mars the effect of some really good vocal writing, especially in the fully harmonised portion, and the general impression of the listener is consequently one of weariness. The Duet for soprano and contralto, "The virgin, the daughter of Zion," is charmingly written, and, indeed, is one of the most spontaneous numbers in the work; the harmonies cling naturally and appropriately round the vocal parts, and the accompaniment is in good keeping with the character of the piece throughout. The Chorus, "And the remnant that is escaped," contains much smooth choral writing; but scarcely arrests the attention as much as the text seems to demand. A bass Recitative, narrating the destruction of the Assyrian army, and Isaiah's command to Hezekiah to set his house in order; a Prayer, for the King, in F minor, and a Quartett, in the tonic major, may all be cited as extremely favourable specimens of the composer's writing, the Quartett especially containing many points of interest. The following Chorus, "The meek shall increase their joy in the Lord," is the second piece added to the work since its first performance, and may be accepted as a proof of Dr. Armes's power over those contrapuntal resources which should be applied to heighten, and not to stand in the place of, the many high qualifications demanded for such a task as the composition of an Oratorio. Technically speaking, this Chorus is a Canon "four in one;" and we may say that in every respect it is a clever and praiseworthy example of this class of composition; but to produce a Canon in itself of extreme interest is a matter of rare occurrence, and our warm praise of the workmanship of this one is as much, therefore, as perhaps even the composer might expect. The bass Air, "I have blotted out," introduced by a Recitative, is simply a fairly satisfactory setting of the words; but there is much clever part-writing in the Chorus, "O Lord, I will praise Thee," which, commencing unaccompanied, has afterwards some exceedingly effective instrumentation, the climax, especially, being appropriately jubilant in character. The bravura Air for soprano, "Therefore with joy shall you draw water," is simply a vocal display; but the last Chorus, "Sing unto the Lord," is a good specimen of the composer's faculty of successfully handling both voices and orchestra, the fugue on the words "Cry out and shout," however, being too little developed for the final choral piece of an Oratorio. Dr. Armes, who conducted his work, must have been more than satisfied with the manner in which it was rendered. The solo vocalists were Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, Messrs. Lloyd and Wadmore. Miss Williams in the difficult Air, "Therefore with joy shall you draw water," especially distinguished herself, as did also Madame Patey in the expressive Solo, "Enter into the rock." Mr. Lloyd must also be warmly commended for his fine delivery of the Solos "O Lord of hosts" and "Remember now, O Lord," and Mr. Wadmore for his intelligent singing of the Air "I have blotted out," the effect of the last-named solo indeed being mainly due to the vocalist. The choruses were most carefully sung throughout, every point being as firmly attacked as if the choral body had been thoroughly familiar with, instead of comparatively strange to, the music. After the Oratorio Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer" was given, the solo part being finely sung by Madame Albani, whose clear voice penetrated through every part of the Cathedral; and the morning's performance concluded with Spohr's "Last Judgment." It is satisfactory to find that the fashion of underrating the music of this composer has not spread so widely as to prevent the "Last Judgment" from taking its place with the standard sacred works; for unquestionably there are portions of this Oratorio which, especially when heard in a Cathedral, have as powerful an effect as anything we could name; indeed, if we cite only the Quartett, "Blest are the departed," we have no hesitation in saying that not throughout the whole Festival was the truly devotional feeling of the hearers more strongly excited than during the singing of this piece. The solo parts were most effectively rendered by Miss Mary Davies, Miss Bertha Griffiths, Messrs. Guy and Santley; and the choruses were sung throughout with due attention to gradations of tone and remarkable clearness and decision.

The second secular concert at the College Hall in the evening brought forward Miss Done, the daughter of the Conductor, as the exponent of Sterndale Bennett's Pianoforte Concerto in F minor, and we may at once say that she achieved a success by no means dependent on the favourable local influences by which she was surrounded. This is saying a great deal, but no more than is justly her due; for not only by her very excellent mechanism, but by her highly intelligent reading of a work which has taxed the powers of the greatest pianists, she thoroughly proved her right to the responsible position she assumed; and we can assure her that the warm applause her playing excited was heartily joined in by the many in the room whose good opinion was worth earning. The orchestral pieces in the programme were the Overtures to "Euryanthe," "Egmont," and the "Merry Wives of Windsor;" Madame Albani was encored in Donizetti's air, "O luce di quest' anima," and all the vocalists engaged at the Festival sang with their accustomed success. The choral pieces included Beethoven's "A Calm Sea and a Prosperous Voyage," to which but scant justice was done; a Part-song by the Rev. E. V. Hall, sung by the Cathedral Choir, and two Part-songs by Pinsuti and Leslie respectively, carefully, but somewhat roughly, given by the Yorkshire choralists, that by Pinsuti being redemanded.

Little need be said of the performance of the "Messiah" on the closing morning of the Festival. Madame Albani, Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, Messrs. Lloyd, Santley, and Wadmore gave the principal solos; and the choruses, especially "For unto us" and the "Hallelujah," produced their accustomed effect. The attendance was enormous; scarcely a vacant seat indeed was to be seen throughout the Cathedral, but the demeanour of the vast assemblage was such as to silence any clerical misgivings, if any still existed, as to the propriety of granting the use of the Cathedral for future Festivals.

The closing Service in the evening included three new works composed expressly for the Festival, a "Magnificat" and "Nunc dimittis" by Sir F. G. Ouseley, and an Anthem entitled "The Daughter of Jairus," composed by Dr. Stainer. Both of the Oxford Professor's contributions were thoroughly worthy of his reputation. More especially in the "Magnificat" the clear and masterly writing for voices and orchestra produced a deep impression upon the hearers; and not only the massive choral effects, but the solo portions, showed that the composer, whilst resolved to give ample evidence of his scholastic training, had worked throughout with a due reverence for his text. The quartetts were finely sung by Misses Anna Williams and Bertha Griffiths, Messrs. Guy and Wadmore; and the orchestra, under the skilful direction of Mr. Done, was sufficiently subdued to allow their voices to be heard. It appears strange to be called upon to criticise a work of such importance as that by Dr. Stainer in a Choral Service. Unquestionably it should have been termed a "Sacred Cantata," and worthily indeed it might have taken its place at one of the morning performances in the Cathedral. So modest an appeal, however, may be accepted as a proof that Dr. Stainer prefers rather to win than to force his way to public favour; and if so, let us assure him that "The Daughter of Jairus" has made its mark, even as an Anthem in a Service, and that it will be most cordially welcomed apart from the surroundings of the locality in which it was first heard, not only on account of its own worth, but as an earnest of what may be expected from so accomplished a composer in the future. The text, selected by Dr. Stainer from the Holy Gospels of SS. Matthew, Mark and Luke, illustrates the miraculous restoration to life of the child of Jairus through the interposition of Jesus; and this episode, short as it is, has sufficient dramatic interest to absorb the attention throughout; one remarkable merit being that, although much resembling in incident the restoration of the Widow's Son in "Elijah," the music has not a shadow of resemblance. The instrumental Prelude prepared all hearers for a composition out of the conventional groove of what is termed "sacred writing," the calm and melodious themes being harmonised with a masterly hand, and the orchestration throwing a rich glow of colour over the movement thoroughly in consonance with the nature of the subject of the work. The opening Choral Recitative is most sympathetically expressive of the words, much effect being gained by the occasional division of the choir. The tenor Solo, "My hope is in the Everlasting," preceded by some brief Recitatives, has a tender and expressive melody, not too elaborately harmonised; an enharmonic modulation in the symphony, after a close upon the dominant, giving much freshness to the succeeding vocal phrases, the return to the key being effectively managed. The oboe phrase in E minor, expressing the "wailing," leads into a Chorus, founded on the same theme, for female voices, "Sweet, tender flower," which is certainly one of the gems of the work, the melody, simply harmonised in four parts, being allowed to make its own way unaided by more than an occasional light accompaniment. We care not so much for the following Chorus of Unbelievers; but for invention, vigour of writing, and masterly orchestration, the choral piece, "Awake, thou that sleepest," stands pre-eminent, and would be alone enough to stamp the composer as an artist of original thought and power. The Duet for soprano and tenor, "Love divine," has a graceful and refined theme, and contains some excellent writing for the voices, several changes of key being introduced with good effect. The subject of the fugue—or rather fugato—in the final chorus is bold, and well expresses the words, but not being very amply developed, it may be presumed that the composer was fearful of prolonging his climax beyond reasonable limits. What he has done, however, is well done; and heartily as we congratulate Dr. Stainer upon the success of his present essay, we have little doubt that he merely desires to indicate his power of treating a subject of more importance, and that his next work—produced, let us hope, under more important conditions—will thoroughly prove that he has by no means over-estimated his abilities. In the solo portions of the composition Miss Anna Williams, Messrs. Guy and Wadmore much distinguished themselves, and the choruses were sung with a vigour and precision which must have delighted the composer, who conducted his own work. The Chants used to the Psalms during this Service were by Cooke and Lawes, the responses by Tallis, and during the Offertory a Hymn was sung to the well-known tune "Hanover," arranged by Sir F. G. Ouseley.

There is certainly much to be said in favour of commencing and concluding these musical gatherings with a Choral Service: in this respect, indeed, we agree with the orthodox authorities, who feel that, although during a portion of the week the Three Choirs may be employed in the interpretation of the more important musical works, the Cathedral ought, at the inauguration and termination of the Festival, to be set apart for pure Service music at which the whole of the choral body should assist, and to which the general public should have free access. Those who remember that it was the custom to end the proceedings with a Ball will see that the Festivals are gradually assuming a character which, whilst fully satisfying the music-lovers who look forward to these meetings as a means of hearing the finest compositions in sacred art, must at the same time enlist the sympathies of all whose religious convictions may have urged them to dissent from certain secular associations which had been suffered to grow around them. Let us hope then that the differences which have arisen on this subject may be productive of good in the end: there has been truth in the arguments of both parties, and the re-establishment of good feeling proves that by both parties has this fact been admitted. The Three Choir Festivals are now safer than ever; and that this has been the most successful upon record may be proved by the fact that upwards of £1,300 was collected for the Charity, and that further donations are still expected.

It now remains to award the warmest praise to Mr. Done, who conducted throughout the Festival with a care and intelligence which proved that he had his heart in his work. To Mr. C. H. Lloyd, who presided at the organ during the Oratorio performances and Choral Services, and Mr. Colborne, who was pianoforte accompanist at the secular concerts and organist at the early morning services, a word of commendation is likewise due. We also bear willing testimony to the excellence of the general arrangements for the accommodation of the audience, and especially do we place on record the valuable services of the Rev. Richard Cattley, of whose unfailing courtesy and kindly consideration we had personally many proofs in the performance of our duties.

The prospectus of the twenty-third season of the Crystal Palace Saturday Concerts is scarcely as fruitful in promises as usual, the Directors telling us "there is little more for them to do beyond stating that in the selection of the programmes and in the maintenance of the performances they will be governed by the same principles which have rendered the Concerts so successful in former seasons." The performances will be twenty-five in number; eleven before, and fourteen after, Christmas, commencing on the 5th inst. The programmes are to contain the works of the "recognised classics," with other less known pieces of older writers for the orchestra, such as Handel and Bach, and of living composers who have not yet "attained the universally acknowledged eminence of their great predecessors in the art." It is also stated that "the instrumental portions of Wagner's Operas, as arranged by him for the concert-room, will receive due attention," an announcement so carefully worded as to make us believe that the Directors intend to do their duty in the Wagnerian cause, and to do no more. The pianists at present announced are M. Louis Brassin (from the Brussels Conservatoire), Madame Arabella Goddard, Miss Agnes Zimmermann, Mdlle. Janotha, and Mr. Charles Hallé. Herr Joachim, Mr. Carrodus, Herr Ludwig Straus, and Signor Piatti are also mentioned; but as the programmes of only four Concerts are given, many instrumentalists not named may appear during the season. Amongst the vocalists engaged are Mrs. Osgood, Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Mrs. Davison (her first appearance), Miss Redeker, Miss Emma Thursby, Mdlle. Sartorius, Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, Mr. E. Lloyd, Herr Henschel, and Mr. Santley. Brahms's new Symphony in D, Beethoven's Choral Symphony (with an exceptionally strong cast), Verdi's Requiem, and Berlioz's descriptive Symphony, "Harold en Italie," the solo viola part being played by Herr Ludwig Straus, are included in the prospectus; and at the "Mendelssohn Commemoration Concert," on November 2, a Symphony in F minor for string orchestra (composed by Mendelssohn in 1823, and still in manuscript) is promised. It is almost unnecessary to add that Mr. A. Manns retains the post he has so long and worthily occupied as Conductor.

A correspondent sends us a description of the great nave organ of Trinity Church, New York, U.S.A., which will, we think, be read with much interest by English organists. The instrument was built in 1846 by Erben, of New York. It is a curiosity of the past, without a composition pedal, with its touch of 5½ lbs., only thirty-six stops for the manuals, and only one for the pedals. All the stops of the great organ are complete throughout the 5½ octave compass of the manuals, which extend down to CCC. On account of this extension, all stops usually 8, 4, and 2 feet are in this organ respectively 16, 8, and 4 feet. The Great is coupled by unison and octave couplers to the Swell, which has 6½ octaves. The 32 on the pedals is of a large bold scale, and it can be made to play its own octave above. Each pedal, by the aid of couplers, commands nine notes on the keyboards, viz., two on the Great, three on the Swells, two on the choir, and two on the solo. The stops are as follows:—Great Organ: open (2), 16 feet; stopped diapason, 16 feet; principal (2), 8 feet; flute, 8 feet; twelfth, 3 feet; fifteenth, 4 feet; sesquialtera; mixture; trumpet, 16 feet; clarion, 8 feet. Swell: open and stopped diapason, dulciana, principal, hautboy, trumpet, vox humana, double cornet. Choir: stopped diapason, dulciana, principal, flute, bassoon, and clarinet. Solo: melodia, gamba, horn, harmonic, flute, double clarion and cornopean. Swell Bass: dulciana, 16 feet; serpent, 16 feet. Pedal: open, 32 and 16 feet. Couplers: Great and swell unison; Great and swell octave; Great and choir; Great and solo; choir and swell unison; choir and swell octave; pedal and Great, 8 feet; pedal and Great, 16 feet; pedal and swell; pedal and choir; and pedal and solo; four manuals and three sets of bellows.

Harvest Thanksgiving Services were celebrated in the Church of St. Andrew, Tavistock Place, W.C., on Sunday the 22nd ult. In the morning the trio, "On Thee each living soul awaits," and chorus, "Achieved is the glorious work," from Haydn's "Creation," formed the anthem, and the Communion Service was sung to Schubert in F. At Evensong the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were sung to Parry in D, and in place of an anthem Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" was given in its entirety. An excellent band of thirty-five executants, including among others, Messrs. Buziau, Gibson, Barrett, Ould, Young, Horton, Hutchins, C. Harper, Smith, and Cheshire played the symphony and accompaniments; and the choir, augmented to one hundred voices, did their part in admirable style. The solos were well rendered by Masters Fred. Dunster and Manning, and Mr. Stedman. Gounod's new "Marche Solennelle" was played as a processional, and a "Marche Héroïque" by Mr. H. M. Higgs as a recessional. The whole was under the musical direction of Mr. Stedman; Mr. H. Parker being conductor, Mr. H. M. Higgs, organist, and Mr. Buziau, leader of the band. The Ven. Archdeacon Dunbar, D.D., preached the sermon. The church was crowded, and large numbers of people failed to gain admission.

The Brixton Choral Society has now, we understand, been placed entirely under the management of Mr. William Lemare; and as, in the series of four Concerts which are to be given during the season, he announces that Haydn's "First Mass" and Handel's Oratorio, "Judas Maccabæus," will be performed with "orchestral accompaniment," it may be presumed that he is at length resolved to listen to the counsel of those who, like ourselves, have so often dwelt upon the strength of his vocal and the weakness of his instrumental resources. The prospectus also promises J. F. Barnett's Cantata, "Paradise and the Peri," and Randegger's Cantata, "Fridolin." It must likewise be mentioned that Mr. Lemare has organised a series of Organ Recitals, to be given at the Angell Town Institution every Saturday evening, upon the new instrument built expressly for the above Hall by Mr. Hunter, of Kennington. For these performances the most eminent organists are engaged, and each Recital will be interspersed with vocal music. The admission will be free, a small sum, however, being charged for reserved seats.

At the Norfolk and Norwich Musical Festival the first Concert, on Tuesday evening, the 15th inst., will consist of Handel's Serenata, "Acis and Galatea" (with Mozart's additional accompaniments), and "Spring," from Haydn's "Seasons." Wednesday morning will be devoted to Professor Macfarren's Oratorio, "Joseph," and Mozart's First Mass in C, and in the evening there will be a Ballad Concert. "Elijah" will be performed on Thursday morning, an Operatic Concert being given in the evening; and the Festival will conclude on Friday morning with the "Messiah." The vocalists engaged are Madame Albani, Miss Catherine Penna, Miss Anna Williams, Madame Antoinette Sterling, and Madame Trebelli; Messrs. E. Lloyd, H. J. Minns, W. Shakespeare, R. Hilton, and Santley. The band and choir will be complete in every department, under the able direction of Sir Julius Benedict, Dr. Bunnett presiding at the organ.

Mr. Frederic Archer, Organist and Musical Director of the Alexandra Palace, has accepted the Conductorship of the Glasgow Select Choir, and will be resident in Glasgow during the forthcoming musical season there, which extends from October till April; Mr. Archer's connection with London during the "off season" will not however entirely cease, as matters have been so arranged that he will still be able to attend any really important engagements at the Palace.

The annual grand Datchelar Festival Service was held at the Church of St. Andrew Undershaft, Leadenhall Street, on Friday afternoon, the 13th ult. The Service was Garrett in D, Spohr's Cantata, "God, Thou art great," being performed at the conclusion of the Service. The solos were sung by Master Pavier (treble), Mr. Faulkner Leigh (tenor), Mr. Dutton (alto), and Mr. Winn (bass). The choir consisted of fifty voices, conducted by Mr. Faulkner Leigh.

The Concerts at Manchester, under the conductorship of Mr. Charles Hallé, are advertised to commence on the 31st inst. Twenty performances will be given, for which the best available talent has been secured. Mr. E. Hecht is the chorus-master. Mr. Charles Hallé also announces ten Classical Chamber Music Concerts at the New Town Hall, the first of which will take place on the 21st inst.

Harvest Festival Services at S. Stephen's, South Kensington, will be held on St. Luke's Day, the 18th inst., and on Sunday, the 20th. Spohr's sacred Cantata. "God, Thou art great," will be rendered at the evensong, when the choir will be accompanied by a full orchestra, in addition to the organ, under the direction of Mr. Albert Lowe.

At the Harvest Festival to be held at Christ Church, Clapham, on the 10th inst., Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion" will be given as the Anthem, under the directorship of Mr. Richard Lemaire, the Organist and director of the choir. Mr. G. C. Martin, Mus. Bac., Oxon., Sub-Organist of St. Paul's Cathedral, will preside at the organ.

Master Henry John Cockram, who had twice gained the honour of election to the "Sterndale Bennett Scholarship" at the Royal Academy of Music, was, we regret to say, one of the passengers drowned in the recent steamboat collision on the Thames. He was but fifteen years of age, and one of the most promising students in the Institution.

The intensity of the "heated term" in the United States may best be estimated by the fact that in one number of Mr. John S. Dwight's Journal of Music three leader columns were filled with a reprint of a criticism which appeared in the same paper twenty-five years ago.

The excellent "Saturday Popular Organ Recitals," at the Bow and Bromley Institute, were resumed on the 28th ult., Mr. Hoyte being the organist announced to inaugurate the season.

Mr. Willem Coenen, the well known pianist, announces three Concerts at the Pavilion, Brighton, on Wednesdays, October 9, 23, and November 6.

Her Majesty's Theatre will open for an autumn season of Italian Opera, at reduced prices, on the 19th inst.

REVIEWS.

Rienzi: the Last of the Tribunes. By Richard Wagner. [Schott and Co.]

Were Richard Wagner entirely consistent with his own principles, which he is not, we should say that he looks anything but approvingly upon a new edition of "Rienzi." The work of the dark days at Riga: the production of a time when, as yet, the "better way" had not been revealed to him; when, as yet, "unconscious necessity" had not moved him one inch from the beaten track, "Rienzi" should be that which he would willingly forget. But the matured Wagner has himself given vitality to the creation of immaturity. "Rienzi" exists, not for its own sake so much as on account of what its author has become; deriving thence its special interest and its claim to the world's regard. Doubtless, therefore, many editions of the work will see the light as time goes on, but we are most concerned to ask why there has appeared an English one, containing an English version of the text, written by Mr. J. Pittman of the Royal Italian Opera. Is this one of the "shadows before" thrown by a coming event? In other words, is "Rienzi" to be produced at Covent Garden next season? We cannot, of course, answer positively, for the ways of operatic managers are mysterious; but there is reason to believe that the coming year will witness the bringing out of Wagner's early Opera on Mr. Gye's stage, with Madame Albani as Irene and Signor Gayarré as the Tribune. A la bonne heure. By all means let us have it. Wagner is one of the men whose every thought commands attention, and "Rienzi" will be hailed without a dissentient voice. Meanwhile it is satisfactory to find an edition of the work placed within easy reach of a public who, no doubt, desire to listen with as much connaissance de cause as possible.

All Wagner's Operas, whether early or late, have been so much discussed that we should find it hard to say anything new respecting the one before us. It may be as well, nevertheless, to remind the reader that "Rienzi" was composed in the master's youth, and at a time when his ardent nature was swayed by the influences of the Revolution of July and the Polish rebellion. In the story of the Roman Tribune, as told by Bulwer, Wagner found a theme harmonising with the predominant feeling of the hour, and not less according with the romantic and heroic part of his nature. And it is a grand theme, however or by whom regarded; one presenting irresistible attractions to a dramatist of Wagner's type and to a composer who, like him, strongly inclined towards broad, massive, and striking effects. How well the young musician, and still younger maker of libretti, handled his materials, a glance at the book suffices to prove. Take, for example, the scene of the oath, of the Tribune's excommunication, and of his uprising from despair with the cry "Rome is not dead yet," as his sister, who alone remains faithful, embraces him. Take, also, the grand setting forth of the catastrophe, and acknowledge the working of a master-hand. As for the music, we find it most truly described by one of the composer's warmest partisans—M. Schuré—in his "Le Drame Musical." "Rienzi," observes the Alsatian critic, "is the work of youth, unequal, but full of passion and power; the reforming ideas of the composer do not appear in it, and its arrangement observes all the rules of tradition. Choruses, marches, grand airs, trios, septett, ballet—nothing is wanting. The music, without betraying slavish imitation, has a strong Italian tinge; but the individuality of the master shines as much in the heroic grandeur of his broad melodies as in the warmth and richness of his instrumental colouring. In fine, 'Rienzi' is the production of an independent mind, without being that of an innovator. Although able to compare advantageously with contemporary works, it has not in it the distinctive Wagner, who at the time of writing looked at the musical drama through an opera-glass. The experience of life was soon, however, to put him in possession of his true nature, and reveal to him another world and another music." A German critic, à propos to the revival of "Rienzi" at Dresden, in 1858, spoke much in the same strain. He pointed to the undoubted fact that the Opera contains "empty phrases, bombastic pathos, and coarse effects," but added: "However far the composer is in 'Rienzi' from his deeper intellectual development and enlightened conception, his great talent for dramatico-musical description and stage-effect, and his bold and daring mastery of technical difficulties, are indisputably manifest." But the faults of "Rienzi" are not likely to stand in the way of popularity, provided the Opera be well mounted and vigorously played. That it would make an effect upon our English audiences is beyond question, and Mr. Gye may, by producing it, retrieve the disasters of "Paul et Virginie" and "L'Alma."

With reference to Mr. Pittman's English version of the text, we quite admit the difficulty of writing words to music and writing poetry at the same time. In point of fact a poet is not required so much as a man possessing a keen eye for the ridiculous, without which to guide him the adapter is almost sure to drift into nonsense. Mr. Pittman is a man of experience, but he cannot help being unconsciously funny. For instance, he makes Irene and Adriano sing, referring to Rienzi:—

> Inflamed by fond desire,
> His soul can find no rest;
> His mind doth heaven inspire,
> He hears the high behest.
> Yes, Freedom's sacred calling
> Revives his Roman breast.
> To him death's not appalling, &c.

Rienzi's "Roman breast" reviving at "freedom's sacred calling" is good, but this is better:—

> Arise! the voice of heaven now calls;
> Oh! Rome, awake from slumber deep;
> Behold, heaven's mercy on us falls,
> A hopeful light o'er thee doth creep.
> See now the bright resplending sun,
> The dazzling orb that shines o'er thee,
> Bring forth the day that has begun,
> Announce the dawn of liberty.

Again, Mr. Pittman sings:—

> We hail with joyful ditties
> Of peace the welcom'd reign;
> In all our towns and cities
> Restored is peace again.

And Orsini is made to say:—

> Colonna, see now, dare he us provoke?
> Shall we endure his taunts beside his joke?

In like manner Rienzi proclaims:—

> Yes, heaven in me by special grace
> The country's destiny did place,
> 'Tis heaven's high will that Rome be free,
> That all I-tal-i-ans hence be.

Clearly Mr. Pittman knows "H.M.S. Pinafore," and especially that part of it where they say of the hero:—

> He might have been a Rooshun,
> A Frenchman, or a Prooshun,
> Or, p'raps, I-tal-i-an.

But we will not be hard on the Covent Garden rhymester. His task was a hard one, and his little failures drop out of sight when we stand face to face with the music.

Zweite Symphonie (D dur) für grosses Orchester. Von Johannes Brahms, Op. 73. Partitur.
[Berlin: N. Simrock.]

When about two years since it was announced that Johannes Brahms, in many respects indisputably the greatest of living German composers, had, after essaying (with the exception of opera) nearly every other form of composition, at length completed a symphony, the greatest interest was naturally felt among musicians on the subject. The success of his first symphony (in C minor) both abroad and in this country will be fresh in the memory of our readers. Many of the most distinguished German musical critics have spoken of the work as "the greatest symphony since Beethoven;" and although one might perhaps be inclined to dispute the literal accuracy of the statement, and to point to Schumann's great symphonies in C and E flat in justification of a different opinion, there can be no doubt that Brahms's C minor symphony towers among contemporary works like Mont Blanc among the Alps. Within two years the composer has written a second symphony, the score of which is just published and now lies before us.

The first question that will naturally present itself is: How does the new work compare with its predecessor? Has Brahms followed up his first success by a second; or have we here a falling off? To this it may be answered at once: By no means. The second symphony is entirely different in style from the first, but of at least equal interest to the musician, while likely to be far more attractive to the general public. It may be said that the two works occupy toward one another a position somewhat analogous to that held by Beethoven's C minor and Pastoral symphonies. The general characteristics of Brahms's first symphony are grandeur, earnestness, and passionate expression; while the second is full of charm, and overflows with vivacity and animal spirits.

The first movement of the present work (Allegro non troppo, D major, $\frac{3}{4}$) opens with a fascinating theme for the horns, answered by the flutes, clarinets, and bassoons; to this succeeds a new melody given to the violins, treated with much ingenuity, and worked with fragments of the first theme, leading ultimately to the key of F sharp minor, in which the second subject is introduced on the violoncellos. This subject, which is perhaps even more attractive than the first, is developed at considerable length, and is followed by a new idea, of a strongly marked rhythmical character, which brings us ultimately to the close of the first part. The thematic developments and the counterpoint of the "free fantasia" are most masterly; but no mere description will convey any idea of them. On the return of the first subject the principal melody is embellished with new and graceful quaver passages for the strings, which give variety to the music without in any way impairing the unity of the whole. After the return of the second subject and its continuation, we reach the coda, which is both long and interesting. It begins with a horn solo, which would seem to have been suggested by that at the end of the "Kyrie" of Schubert's Mass in E flat. The movement ends pp with fragments of the opening theme.

The chief points which strike us in reading this movement are the wonderful profusion of its melodies and the luxuriant richness of its instrumentation. In both these respects it is far in advance of anything to be found in the composer's first symphony.

Of the second movement (Adagio non troppo, B major, C) it is needful to speak with a certain amount of reserve; because it is far less readily intelligible, and far more abstruse in style than the first allegro. Here we find, so to speak, Brahms at his meditations. The opening theme is charming, but as the music proceeds it becomes more and more obscure; the clear sunlight of the first movement no longer shines round us, we wander along in gloom, till just at the close the clouds lift a little, and we can see more clearly where we are. Such, at least, are the impressions produced by the mere reading of the music; we prefer to wait till we have heard it before we pronounce a final opinion upon it.

The third movement (Allegretto grazioso, quasi Andantino, G major, $\frac{3}{4}$,) is a charming Intermezzo, no less fresh and original than it is beautiful. The first theme, given to the wood wind with a pizzicato accompaniment for the violoncellos, is of the utmost simplicity; a novel and piquant effect being given by accenting the third crotchet of the bar instead of the first. The intermezzo, which is somewhat in the character of a slow minuet, has two episodes, taking the place of trios (Presto ma non assai), the first in $\frac{2}{4}$ and the second in $\frac{3}{8}$ time; the former is an ingenious variation of the principal theme. This movement is scored only for small orchestra (strings, wood, and three horns), but is no less remarkable than the first allegro for the beauty of its instrumentation.

The finale of the symphony (Allegro con spirito, D major $\frac{2}{2}$) is remarkable for its continuous vigour, and for its extremely joyous character. At the present day, when the general tendency seems to be in the direction of "storm and stress," and when so much music is written which appears like the expression of despair and universal blasphemy, it is quite refreshing to meet with a movement which is as gay and light-hearted as if it had been written by old Father Haydn. This finale is perhaps the least individual portion of the work; there is but little (unless it be the contrapuntal style of treatment) which declares the composer at once; we are at times reminded of Haydn, more often of Beethoven—in both cases, be it observed, without reminiscences: the second subject, with its simple diatonic character, might indeed have come from Beethoven's pen. But the melodic flow and the constant "go" of the music carry one along from the first bar to the last, and bring the symphony to a brilliant and most effective close.

Such are a few of the impressions produced by reading the score of this masterly and remarkable work. It has not as yet been given in this country, but it is announced for performance at the Crystal Palace on Saturday the 5th inst.; and next month we shall doubtless be in a position either to modify or confirm the opinions here expressed. Like most works of the modern school, it presents considerable difficulties to the executants; but with such a Conductor as Mr. Manns, and such an orchestra as that under his control, there can be no doubt that the new symphony will receive the fullest justice.

The Cathedral Psalter, containing the Psalms of David, together with the Canticles and Proper Psalms pointed for Chanting, and set to appropriate Chants.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

A new edition of this popular Psalter has recently appeared, with appropriate Chants to each Canticle and Psalm. The Editors state in their preface that the Chants have been arranged with the following main principles in view:—

"1. That single or double chants should be used according to the character and construction of each Psalm. See Psalms xv. (single); xxiv. (double).

"2. That the construction of each Psalm should as far as possible govern the antiphonal arrangement; e.g., if the parallel or antithesis occurs between the two halves of one verse, each half should be assigned to Cantoris and Decani respectively. See Psalms xv. xix. l. xc.

"3. That the variations of subject or sentiment in each Psalm should be marked by a change of chant. See Psalms xviii. lxxviii."

For the sake of choirs inexperienced in chanting the editors add: "Should there be any difficulty in following the antiphonal marks (Dec. and Can.) as they stand, they can be simplified under the direction of the choirmaster without injury to the general arrangement of the chants."

Without predicting that the foregoing principles will meet with unanimous approval, either in themselves or in their application, it is evident that great thought and skill have been bestowed upon the selection and arrangement of the chants. A definite purpose runs through the whole book, and even if it appears to any one to be capable of modification and improvement, it shows a distinct and important advance in the difficult and too-long neglected art of setting appropriate chants to the Psalter.

The chants are numerous, varied, and for the most part tuneful and vocal. Ancient and modern services have been freely, yet carefully, drawn from, and if here and there an old favourite is missed, the loss is amply made up by the introduction of new chants by the most skilful living composers. We cordially wish this new edition the same wide success which has fallen to the lot of its predecessors. It is unnecessary to add that in type and clearness of arrangement there is nothing to be desired. We could have wished, however, for an index of the chants.

Novello's Music Primers. Edited by Dr. Stainer.
No. 18, Tonic Sol-fa, by John Curwen.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Viewed in connection with the fact that Messrs. Novello and Co. are transferring so much of their Choral music into Tonic Sol-fa Notation, it is significant evidence of the steady progress Tonic Sol-faists are making that their method is considered of sufficient importance to call for the devotion of a whole Primer in the valuable series of educational works now being issued under Dr. Stainer's editorship. True, musicians are now far better disposed than they were to look benignantly on the efforts of Mr. Curwen and his friends; it is seen that, after all, Cæsar and Pompey are very much alike, that Sol-faists teach exactly the same facts and principles as themselves, and that indisputably good results are very frequently secured by the Tonic Sol-fa method. In the work before us, Mr. Curwen strenuously tries to show the needlessness of rivalry in the matter, and his clear and lucid explanations, should they meet the attention they deserve, will certainly interest musicians, and probably go far to remove any unreasoning prejudice against the Tonic Sol-fa propaganda. Some will be disappointed to find the so-called Primer too general in its explanations, and not at all suited for class-teaching; but others, who find life too short to master the interminable terminology of Tonic Sol-fa, will be grateful for its terseness and brevity. The book contains nine chapters, each dealing with some one point of importance generally in the briefest possible fashion. The foundation principle of the tonic notation is clearly shown in the first chapter, and the notation of tune is afterwards explained. In the third chapter the notation of time is dealt with, and the peculiar time-names adopted from the Galin-Paris-Chevé school are shown. The principle of dividing the page into equal sections, representing the pulses or beats of the music, has its undoubted advantages in enabling the singer quickly to realise the length and accent of notes, but occasionally a crowd of notes involves typographical inconvenience, and a consequent want of clearness, which even printers, under it may be presumed the strictest surveillance, have not yet been able to overcome. A little invention is really needed here. The time-names are an ingenious arrangement by which the easily appreciated accents of speech are made use of to enforce the broad and fine accents of bars and divided beats or pulses. The fourth chapter explains the method of showing change of key by what are called bridge-tones, by the aid of which the singer can perform any possible modulation. The next chapter deals with the method of arranging and teaching the facts to be taught. Here large use is made of the modulator, a diagram of a scale and its various relations. The chief feature of the method of finding sounds is the doctrine of "Mental Effect," which teaches that each sound of the key has its peculiar characteristic individuality, which is always to be recalled in association with its appropriate syllable. Sol-faists are said to be dependent upon their perception of this key-relationship, and not upon absolute pitch, nor upon the calculation of interval. Postponing some remarks on the sufficiency of this method in all possible cases, we pass on to the chapter on the minor mode. The minor key or mode is regarded purely as a mode of the scale of its relative major, and it is never permitted to be a key. We are not disposed to argue that, in a tonic notation at least, any other view of the matter is practicable, but it is impossible not to see that in some music the necessity for this view involves considerable difficulty. Thus, when in minor passages the sharp sixth and the seventh are used prominently, the infinitesimal hold the tonic of the relative major retains as compared with that of the tonic major leads to great confusion of "mental effect," and therefore is a source of bewilderment to a Tonic Sol-faist. Few, if any Sol-faists could sol-fa this passage, if regarded as a mode of key C, in which mode it might actually be—but regarded as a part of Key A—

it would be simplicity itself. We have acknowledged, and Mr. Curwen conclusively shows, that minor passages on a true Tonic Sol-fa method must of necessity be written as described. This being so, it becomes a question how the difficulty of singing such passages as the one quoted is to be overcome. Consulting the chapter on the "Mental Process of Singing," and comparing it with the earlier chapter on the "Method of Teaching," we find no indication of any other mental process than the recognition of key-relationship. We see no way out of the difficulty except by the supplementary study of interval, the perception of which is as necessary to the understanding of many musical facts as key-relationship; and it is certain the latter, in the Staff Notation at least, can only be determined by the former. Particularly is this study needed in singing from the Staff Notation, where often it is impossible for a singer to stay and determine key-relationship. He must possess the power of quickly conceiving any interval regardless for the moment of key or mode. We have been led to notice this point at some length, because we believe that if Tonic Sol-faists showed less reluctance to entertain the study of interval, especially in the adaptation of their method to the Staff Notation, their education would be more complete, and musicians of other schools would be better reconciled to their teaching when they perceive that what they know to be essential is also recognised by Sol-faists. The Primer concludes with a number of transposition exercises, which, patiently examined, will enable any ordinary musician quickly to understand the system. We can heartily recommend the work to the attention of all who would know something of a method which, whatever its merits, has undoubtedly come to be one of the great facts of the day.

Letters on Music to a Lady. By Louis Ehlert. Translated by Fanny Raymond Ritter. [William Reeves.]

In our recent review upon Herr Ehlert's series of Essays called "Aus der Tonwelt" we especially dwelt upon the individuality of his opinions, as distinguished from those put forward by the many so-called art-critics of the day, whose convictions appear to be, for mercantile purposes, toned down to the fashion of the hour. We know that it is the custom in this country to term the writings of so intellectual a thinker as the author of these letters "rhapsodical;" but a German artist feels too deeply, perhaps, for the more sober-minded English "lover of music," who has scarcely yet a full appreciation of the godlike mission of the art, and who may be tempted therefore to term everything "rhapsody" which emanates from a more enthusiastic devotee. "He who does not write upon his art with his whole heart," says Ehlert in the volume of letters now before us, "even though, like the fabulous bird, he tears his own breast to nourish his thoughts, would do better to plane an honest bench." Precisely so; but if the tone of thought is so low that those who should "plane an honest bench" manage to gain admission into the regions of art, the public, and not the artistic carpenters, should be blamed. We can imagine that many persons will disagree, or perhaps even feel offended, with the following remarks; but those who believe, as we do, that they sum up in few words what should be guiding principles of a true artist will thank us for extracting them: "Unless you understand the object of your own existence, you have no right to exist. Try, then, to be a little wheel, and then to render yourself indispensable to the great machine. Away with your visionary ramblings — to-day writing a bit of symphony; the modicum of a quartett to-morrow; in the meantime sinning against oratorio, opera, and song. The universe is too vast for your little pen. Or do you believe that you will become ennobled by frequenting the society of aristocrats? No: you will then feel more of a commoner than ever. True nobility will not despise you for belonging to the commonalty, unless you show that your condition is irksome to yourself. You may become a famous man, though you only write songs like Robert Franz, or pianoforte pieces like Chopin. But should an opera, overture, or symphony of yours be shipwrecked, none of us will believe you to be greater than those men are, because you have tried to do greater things than they did. Do you not know that the opposition of inclination to ability is a most ridiculous thing? Study as though you were determined to surpass the Ninth Symphony; and when you have mastered all knowledge, all technicality, do some small thing perfectly, as soon as you have found out that you can only do great things imperfectly." The chapters devoted to Beethoven sufficiently show that their author is not only well acquainted with his works, but has taken the true view of their signification. "To erect a mighty building without crevice or seam," he says, "apparently hewn from a single block of stone, and that out of a little cube like the ground-thought of the first subject of the C minor Symphony, is something to make us dwarfish workmen hang our heads;" yet he does not attempt to show us what Beethoven "meant" in this colossal composition, but is content, like a true artist, to receive it as the grandest specimen of abstract music ever bequeathed to the world. We may not always agree with Ehlert's opinions upon the merits of the composers he selects for criticism; and, as the translator of the letters truly says in her preface, many persons would rather reverse his decision upon the relative places to be assigned to Schumann and Franz as "Lied" writers, giving the palm of impassioned depth of imaginative feeling to the former, and of self-possessed thoughtful intelligence to the latter; but nobody can deny the beauty of the thoughts contained in the letters relating to these artists, or avoid being struck, even in this translation, with the felicity of the language in which these thoughts are conveyed. It must be remembered that these are "Letters to a Lady;" and although in the introductory one we are sufficiently informed that they are designed for a sympathetic reader, it must excite no surprise if the author occasionally places himself in the position of an instructor. Here, for example, is his description of a Fugue: "Architecture has been termed frozen music. Well, if you know what the pointed Gothic arch is, you know what a fugue is: for the pointed arch is a frozen fugue. In a contrapuntal work, fugues are like the final pointed completion of these arches in our Gothic cathedrals. Whenever a noble, a believing mood of mind strives upwards to the highest, wherever a last majestic result must be brought forward for universal recognition, the fugue becomes the most natural means of expression; for no art-form embraces such consciousness within itself; not one is so well capable of preaching the truth to be told in many tongues at once. For the peculiar characteristic of this form lies in the fact that several voices have united to say the same on different intervals. Commencing according to prescribed laws, gradually growing more and more free, on every side they fall into the conversation; ever we find the same purport, sometimes diminished, sometimes magnified, again inverted, until we are filled with admiration for such a many-voiced and many-sided treatment of one thing. The fugue naturally takes its place in great vocal and instrumental works, wherever a feeling of noble completion is to be expressed; but this tone of universality must arise as naturally out of the subject as does the capital complete the pillar." We linger over this book with a loving fondness which we scarcely hope to be shared by our readers, for fragments of pictures, however judiciously they may have been selected, can show nothing more than excellence of drawing and richness of colouring. Let us hope, then, that we have been successful in our endeavours to aid in the circulation of a work which should be in the hands of all art-lovers. We admit that in its pages will be found innumerable proofs of an exaggeration of style—as where the author excitedly says: "Give me a sleeping-draught, dearest lady, or bestow on me the concentrated shadow of a hundred thousand lindens, universal shade!"—and we also know full well that certain paragraphs will seriously ruffle the self-sufficiency of many aspiring artists—"As large blocks of marble are rare, we build castles with crumbs, and use counterpoint for patent mortar," for instance—but the first quotation must be forgiven for the poetry with which it is surrounded, and the second, unpalatable as it is, must be swallowed as a wholesome truth.

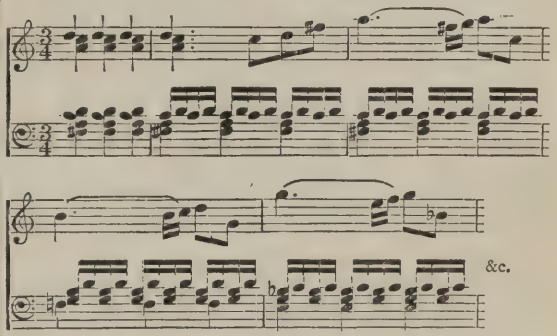
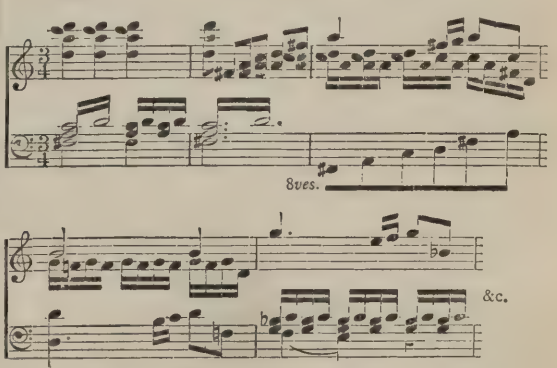
Beethoven's Mass, in C.
Haydn's Mass, in B flat (No. 1).

Edited, and the Pianoforte Accompaniment revised, by Berthold Tours. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Last month we directed the attention of our readers to a new issue of Mozart's Mass No. 12 and Haydn's No. 2, also edited and, as to the pianoforte accompaniment, revised by Mr. Tours. We pointed out then the great gain arising from a closer adherence to the orchestral score, showed that it was called for by the increased capacity of amateur accompanists, and expressed a hope that the editor would continue his labours in the same direction. Our duty now is to bring under notice the fact that what Mr. Tours did for the works just named he has done, with equal skill and success, for the beautiful first Mass of Beethoven and likewise the No. 1 of Haydn. We might write at inconvenient length regarding the improvements made, but an example or two, taken at random from amongst a crowd, will speak far more eloquently and with convincing power. Here is a passage of accompaniment taken from the "Credo" of Vincent Novello's edition:—



And here is the corresponding passage in the edition of Mr. Tours:—



We need hardly indicate in words the vast superiority of the second over the first, because it is obvious at a glance that, besides an increased breadth and brilliancy of effect, it reproduces a point of imitation which the other wholly overlooks.

Again, take this passage from the "Et in Spiritum Sanctum" of the old edition—and compare it with this from the new:—

These quotations answer our purpose better than would a score of columns in letter-press, and we are not called upon to add one word by way of showing how much nearer to the composer, whether he be Beethoven or Haydn, the new edition takes us.

Technical Guide to Touch, Fingering and Execution on the Pianoforte. By Lindsay Sloper. [Ashdown and Parry.]

We quite agree with the author of this work that a very decided line should be drawn between pianoforte "studies" and pianoforte "exercises," for it is only by a vigorous practice of mere finger-work that true mechanism can be obtained; and to hope to play any of the "studies" of the great masters, therefore, before the hand has been properly trained by "exercises" is manifestly absurd, for it is beginning at the wrong end. Mr. Sloper truly observes, "no one should attempt Moscheles' Chromatic Study (No. 3 of Book I.) who has not thoroughly mastered the simple Chromatic Scale, nor, to take an easier instance, hope, by practising Heller's First Study (Op. 46) to attain the evenness of touch and clearness of articulation which only a steadfast adherence to five-finger exercises can give." To those who believe in the truth of these remarks the book before us will prove of the utmost value. The author modestly says: "I shall be glad and flattered if it meets with the approbation of my professional brethren," and we can scarcely doubt that his hope will be realised; for although pianists do not always agree as to the method of fingering certain passages, the broad principles are sufficiently recognised, and it is good that pupils, in the absence of the master, should have so systematic a work to refer to. We are glad to find that Mr. Sloper recommends the practice of what may be termed the "harmonic" as well as the "melodic" minor scale. Both are undoubtedly correct; but commonplace "instruction books" have so long ignored the former that when a pupil meets with a descending minor scale with the minor sixth and major seventh he is apt to look upon it as an awkward and extremely ungainly passage.

The Psalmist. A Collection of Hymns, Tunes, Chants, and Anthems for congregational worship, and for domestic and family use. Edited by Ebenezer Prout, B.A.
[J. Haddon and Co.; Novello, Ewer and Co.]

This book is intended for the use of Nonconformists, and is an important publication. There are no less than 594 hymns and tunes; the whole of the Psalms and many other portions of Scripture are pointed, and appropriate chants appended; there are several settings of the Te Deum, Benedictus, Benedicite, and other hymns of the Church; and also Tallis's Preces and Responses, making altogether a most complete work for congregational use.

The book is a reconstruction of a previous, but very much smaller work, and Mr. Prout has, we understand, been obliged to retain a few of the original tunes which, doubtless, he would gladly have dispensed with. Notwithstanding these few blemishes, however, the book is a credit to the community for which it is intended, and we trust its sale will be equal to its deserts.

A Morning, Communion and Evening Service, in D. By J. V. Roberts, Mus. Doc., Oxon.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

This is a service of the Cathedral type, and belongs to the transitional style. It is certainly much in advance of our Church composers of the last generation, but not so florid as the music for a similar purpose by modern musicians. Dr. Roberts has not displayed much originality in this work, but he has succeeded in writing easy and effective music, which is no mean test of a musician's ability.

Anthems for use in Churches. Second edition enlarged. Edited by the Rev. Francis Bishop, M.A.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

This book contains the words of 150 of the most popular anthems of the present time, and its price brings it within the reach of any congregation. The want of a book of this kind has long been felt, but the difficulty of making a small yet really useful selection has no doubt deterred many from attempting the task. The editor has, however, shown great discernment in making his selection, and the result is a book which contains most of the anthems sung in ordinary parish churches.

Lændler. For the Pianoforte.
Bluette. For the Pianoforte.
Composed by Wilhelm Schulthes.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Herr Schulthes writes gracefully enough to make us wish that he had submitted for our consideration some work of more importance than the two now before us. We have no fault to find with them as refined musical sketches; but where there is so little individuality in a composition, it is difficult to say anything that has not been said thousands of times before. The theme of "Lændler" is melodious, but not strikingly original. The harmonies are appropriate, there is but little modulation, and the return to the subject is well managed. "Bluette" is decidedly the better work of the two. The modulation from G major, through G minor, to B flat, is fresh and effective, and the alteration of the theme on its repetition prevents a monotony which is too observable in the first piece. There is a pleasing coda, too, giving additional interest to a composition which can be conscientiously recommended to lovers of what is termed "drawing-room music."

The Coming Year. Song. Words by Dean Alford. Music by Gabriel Davis. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The composer of this song shows that she possesses much feeling for melody; but here and there we find a crudeness about the accompaniments which evidences the want of earnest study. The breaking of the rhythm, too, seems to injure the due expression of the words in many places, although there is an obvious desire to take off this effect by the introduction of new features in the pianoforte part. The truth is that it is very easy to write part of a song, but very difficult to write a whole one, the constructive power necessary for this latter task being much rarer than the majority of young artists believe. There are some pretty fragments however in "The Coming Year;" but the composer must not let her melody and bass rise in octaves from dominant to key-note, as we find she does between the first and second bars of the "Allegretto con moto."

FOREIGN NOTES.

The répertoire of the Paris Grand-Opéra has been a very limited one during the past month, consisting chiefly of alternate performances of "L'Africaine," "Le Prophète." "Faust," "Le Roi de Lahore," and "Hamlet." The début of Mdlle. Richard, as Fides in "Le Prophète," is said to have still further advanced the claims to public favour of the gifted young vocalist. The long-delayed first representation of M. Gounod's new Opera, "Polyeucte," was announced to take place on the 25th ult., pending certain questions of detail, to be arranged between the composer and the director of the Grand-Opéra, which may have still further delayed the actual performance. At the Opéra-Comique M. Lecocq's Operetta, "Le Petit Duc," has already reached its two hundred and fiftieth performance, the average daily receipts being 5,000 francs. Two new works of the prolific composer just mentioned, entitled respectively "Le Camargo" and "Le Grand Frédéric," are just now in course of preparation. The Bouffes-

Parisiens was reopened last month with a new Opera, called "Pont d'Avignon," by MM. A. Liorat and Charles Grisart, which achieved but a moderate success. The ceremony of the distribution of prizes to the successful exhibitors at the International Exposition is announced to take place, under the auspices of the President of the Republic, on the 21st inst., on which occasion musical performances on a large scale will also take place under the direction of M. Colonne.

The old question as to the true originator of an important invention (generally reserved to the historian) has already been raised with regard to the new "double keyboard pianoforte" of MM. Mangeot frères, now being exhibited at Paris, and of which mention has already been made in these columns. We gather from French journals that M. Joseph Wieniawski, the eminent pianist, lays claim to the invention, he having, it is alleged, first suggested the idea to MM. Mangeot frères, who have merely (!) carried out, perfected, and patented it. The question is being decided by the French tribunals; but the very fact that it should so soon have been raised, goes far to prove that the invention itself is one of really practical significance.

A troupe of mandoline players has recently arrived at Paris, whose concerts at the Trocadéro attract considerable interest.

The Villa Rossini at Passy, near Paris, which since the death of the composer's widow has become again the property of the town, is being offered just now for sale at the price of 385,000 francs.

Herr Wilhelmj, the eminent violinist, has started upon an artistic tour in the United States. A similar engagement has likewise been entered into by M. Franz Rummel, the well-known pianist.

A new music journal is about to be published at Rome under the same title as that of its contemporary of Milan, viz., Gazetta Musicale.

Owing to the energetic zeal of its managers, the Leipzig Stadt-Theater may now boast to have been the first among German operatic stages who have produced Herr Wagner's national music-drama "Der Ring des Nibelungen" in its entirety, though not in the complete succession of its parts, outside of Bayreuth. Whereas during last season "Rheingold" and "Walküre" were alternately performed at the stage referred to, "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung," the two concluding portions of the "Tetralogy," have been prepared for the present season; the performances commencing last month, when the demand for tickets was far in excess of the supply. At the theatres of Prague and Pesth, too, the poet-composer's "Walküre" is in active course of preparation, and will be produced during the coming winter. At Berlin "Tristan und Isolde" will be again included in the répertoire of the Royal Opera.

A very handsome statue in memory of Franz Schubert has recently been unveiled at Stuttgart. The ceremony, which was of an impressive character, included, besides the usual festive orations, the performance of a chorus from the composer's "Rosamunde," sung to words expressly written for the occasion. During the festive proceedings a telegram was read conveying the thanks of the two surviving brothers of the composer to the assembly.

The fiftieth anniversary of the foundation of the Hamburg Philharmonic Society was celebrated last month by a music festival extending over three days. Among the artists who participated in the respective performances are mentioned Mesdames Clara Schumann and Joachim, Herren Joachim, Henschel, Senfft, and others, who were supported by a select orchestra and a strong chorus of well-trained amateurs.

A series of standard performances of Mozart's Operas commenced on August 26 last at the Cassel Court-Theater with the master's "Idomeneo," inaugurated by an appropriate prologue. It will be remembered that it was the same institution which, during last season, distinguished itself by giving a most interesting and instructive series of historical performances of operatic works.

Herr Richard Pohl has, it is said, successfully carried out his idea of writing a new libretto, suitable for German audiences, to Glinka's "The Life for the Czar." That Opera, in its German garb, will shortly be brought out at Hanover under the direction of Hans von Bülow, who also contemplates producing, at no distant date, Berlioz's long-neglected Opera entitled "Benvenuto Cellini."

The "silent violin" is a newly invented instrument, the very name of which will possess a peculiar charm to the sensitive inhabitant of suburban streets, whose ears are being daily tortured by the frequently vain endeavours of a neighbouring amateur votary of the "queen of instruments" to keep his artistic aims in harmony with the vagaries of his fingers and bow. Hitherto the ardent student of the violin has, like the inveterate smoker, been a real source of distress to many of his fellow-creatures; they both monopolise the very air which is common to all. Hence the "silent violin" is a real boon alike to the performer and to the enforced listener. The new instrument, which is, of course, intended merely for purposes of practice, is the invention of Gebrüder Wolff, of Kreuznach. Unlike the so-called "dumb pianoforte" it is not absolutely silent, but its volume of tone is so considerably reduced that, although perfectly audible to the performer, it does not penetrate the four walls of his room. Our attention, we should add, has been drawn to this subject by a recent number of the Berlin Allgemeine Deutsche Musik-Zeitung.

We understand that Herr Albert Hahn, of Königsberg, editor of the music journal Die Tonkunst, is about to publish a pamphlet on the "chromatic keyboard pianoforte," as well as an edition of classical compositions printed in the notation adapted to the new system. The "chromatic" keyboard, it should be mentioned, differs from that of ordinary pianofortes inasmuch as in the former the black and the white keys alternate in unbroken succession. A society under the name of "Chroma" has been for some time in active operation in Germany with a view to propagate the new system. We shall most likely have occasion to revert to the subject more explicitly at some future time.

It is announced in German papers that Herr Julius Tausch, of Düsseldorff, has undertaken to conduct the Orchestral Concerts at Glasgow during the ensuing season.

Herr Ignaz Brüll, the composer of "The Golden Cross," is at present engaged upon a new operatic work entitled "Bianca," the libretto of which emanates from the pen of Herr Schirmer.

Maestro Filippo Marchetti, the composer of "Ruy Blas," has just completed a new Opera, "Don Giovanni d'Austria," which is to be brought out by the Apollo Theatre at Rome.

An Academy of Music is shortly to be inaugurated at Cincinnatti, under the auspices of some local capitalists, and of which Mr. Theodore Thomas is to be the director.

Madame Paolina Vaneri Filippi has accepted, it is stated, the vocal professorship at the Royal Conservatoire of Milan.

Rudolph Willmers, a pianist and composer of some note in Germany, died at Vienna on August 24, at the age of fifty-seven.

The last male descendant of the composer of "Iphigenia in Aulis," a retired captain of the German army, Ferdinand von Gluck, died recently at a small town in Bavaria.

On August 23 died at Skeda, Ostgotland, the well-known Swedish composer of merit, Adolf Frederik Lindblad, at the age of seventy-seven.

J. Janatka, famous in his day as a performer on the French horn, and teacher of that instrument at the Conservatoire of Prague, died recently in that city. He was a member of the orchestra which, under the direction of Beethoven, assisted at the first performance at Vienna of the Ninth Symphony.

We subjoin, as usual, the programmes of Concerts recently given at some of the leading institutions abroad:—

Paris.—Concert Officiel of Chamber Music (September 6): Stringed Quartett (Vaucorbeil); Sonata for pianoforte and violoncello (Saint-Saëns); Berceuse for violin and pianoforte (Reber); Quartett for pianoforte and strings (Lefèvre). First Russian Exhibition Concert (September 9): Overture, "Rousslan et Ludmila" (Glinka); Portions from "La Vie pour le Tsar" (Glinka); Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra (Tchaikowski); two danses from "Le Démon" (A. Rubinstein); Chorus from the Opera "La Roussalka" (Dargomijski); "La jota aragonesa," symphonic arrangement (Glinka). Concert Officiel (September 6): Symphony (E. Paladilhe); March from "Roi de Bohême" (L. de Rillé); Portions from Requiem (Lenepveu); First movement of a Symphony (Messager); Scena from "La Fiancée d'Abydos" (Barthe); Ode-symphonique, "Le Triomphe de la Paix" (Samuel David). Concert

Officiel of Chamber Music (September 13): Fragments of Quartett for pianoforte and strings (Pop. Mearini); Quartett, Op. 84 (Tingry); Andante for pianoforte and strings (Madame Héritte-Viardot); Andante and Finale of Quintett for wind instruments (Reicha). Last Concert Officiel of Chamber Music (September 20): Quintett, Op. 41, for pianoforte and strings (G. Pfeiffer); Andante from Seventh Concerto for violins (Baillot); Trio, Op. 1, for pianoforte and strings (C. Franck); Elégie for violin and pianoforte (Tissot); Quartett for pianoforte and strings (G. Sandré). Concert Officiel (September 26): Overture Triomphale (Deffés); Fragment from "Stabat Mater" for chorus, orchestra, and soli (Bourgault-Ducoudray); Overture to "Missolonghi" (Hérold); Fête musulmane, chorus and orchestra (Hignard); Fragment from Oratorio, "Daniel" (Delahaye); Overture to "Don Quichotte" (Boulanger).

Leipzig.—Conservatorium Concert (September 6): "Bilder aus Osten" for stringed instruments (Schumann); Variations for two pianofortes (Schumann); Concerto, D minor, for two violins (Bach); Sonata for two pianofortes (Hans Huber); Gavotte (Reinecke); March from "Carnaval" (Schumann).

Berlin.—First Bilse Concert (September 14): Second Symphony (Brahms); Symphonic Poem, "Francesca da Rimini" (Tchaikowski); Overture to a tragedy (Hartmann); Danse from "Dalila" (Saint-Saëns); Andante from a string Quartett (Haydn).

Kissingen.—Kurcapelle Concert (September 3): Overture "Zauberflöte" (Mozart); Tone-pictures from "Der Ring des Nibelungen" for violin and orchestra; Gipsy melodies for violin (Sarasate).

CORRESPONDENCE.

CONCERT-ROOMS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—The question raised by Mr. Statham in this month's Musical Times of how to build rooms having good acoustic properties is so important that it ought not to be allowed to drop without discussion, for though little appears to be known of the subject at present, laws must exist by the obeying of which a room good for sound is produced, and by the infringing of which a room is deprived of sound-carrying power. Mr. Statham is, I believe, like myself, an architect, and he is also evidently a keen and thoughtful musician, so that he is possessed of a double qualification for pursuing the investigation of this most important subject; and it is in the hope that he, and many others who have studied the subject, will join in trying to elucidate the laws which, as I said before, must exist, that I venture, though with great diffidence, to lay before you my view of the case. To begin, I must say that I am entirely at issue with Mr. Statham as to the analogy of the organ-pipe and the uselessness of rhythmical proportions in rooms. Firstly, except in length, the proportions of an organ-pipe have nothing to do with the fundamental note produced, for a 16-feet violon, of small scale, and a 16-feet open diapason, of large scale, produce the same fundamental note, and are only different in quality. Secondly, the fundamental note of even any ordinary-sized room —say 18 ft. × 15 ft. × 10 ft. 6 in.—is never heard, as the note according to the organ-pipe theory would be given by its length, and would be somewhere about AAA; but the note that is heard is, as I believe, a high harmonic of the fundamental note given by the length of the room, reinforced by sympathetic harmonics given by the other proportions of the room, if it be acoustically good. What I have so far said should be understood to apply only to the note of the room produced by mere noise, such as the dropping of a hammer or a smack on the wall. Now, as I at present believe, in a room that is acoustically good the harmonic predominating differs with the different notes sung or played, and is that nearest to the note produced that is common to all three dimensions of the room. If the near harmonics common to the two greater dimensions only are sympathetic, then the room is indifferent for sound; and if the harmonics of all three dimensions are unsympathetic one with the other, they contend with and destroy each other, and the consequence is that, instead of hearing a musical tone from voice or instrument, you only hear a bald note "as tasteless as pure water," its own proper harmonics being swallowed up almost immediately by the conflict of unsympathetic harmonics going on; the result feeling to the singer like a veil before his mouth, and to the violinist as if his strings were strung over a solid block of wood. The deduction I would draw is that the best proportions for concert-rooms, churches, or any other places required for music or speaking, are those which will give the greatest number of near harmonics common to all three dimensions, so that each note produced may select, as I believe it will, and be reinforced by its first harmonic that is common to the proportions of the room. I have noticed curious instances of this reinforcing power in certain rooms that have galleries, and I will instance one that I know well, as I have both sung and played in it frequently. On the orchestra, to the performers, everything sounds wooden and dead, the sound does not seem to be able to get away, and there feels to be a lack of tone in both voices and instruments; in the body of the hall and in the galleries the feeling of the audience is that of hearing with difficulty and almost painfully, and the fullest music sounds thin and lacking timbre; but under the galleries, and at the most distant points under them, the sounds that to the intervening occupants of the body of the hall had seemed so thin and dead come out with a full musical quality and with a power that is not felt near to the performers. Now it is quite certain that the initial sound does not increase in volume as it gets more distant from its point of production, but I think Professor Tyndal has shown (I am speaking from memory, as I have not his lectures by me) that sound may be spaced out, as it were, into alternating areas of sound and silence by conflict of sounds. Is it not probable then that in the case I am referring to the aisles formed by the galleries have their proportions in some harmonic relation to each other, whereas the whole of the rest of the room has no such relation, and is consequently an area of harmonic silence? I have already made this letter too long, or I should have something to say on echo and undue reverberation in rooms. I hope Mr. Statham will forgive me for having expressed an opinion so diametrically opposed to his own, for he is manifestly to me a much more learned musician than myself. I have only ventured into the arena of discussion with him in order that, whether he or I be on the right track, something may be done to solve a question the want of a solution of which has led to so many lamentable failures in the acoustic properties of buildings specially designed for hearing in.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

Chas. Noel Armfield.

9, Broomfield Terrace, Whitby,
Sept. 19, 1878.

[I am very glad that my remarks on concert-rooms should have called forth so interesting a letter as that of Mr. Armfield; but as I have had an opportunity of reading it before publication, perhaps I may be allowed space at the foot of it to point out that his first point of difference from me is entirely an imaginary one. If he will look at my article again, he will see that I said not one word about an analogy between an organ-pipe and a concert-room, nor did I even imagine such an analogy to exist. I referred to the fact that a concert-room which reinforces one particular note is very disagreeable, and I then remarked how strongly this was illustrated sometimes by an organ in which one special pipe set the whole room shaking: merely adducing this as a disagreeable effect which every one must have noticed.

The rest of Mr. Armfield's letter appears very practical and suggestive, and I should certainly keep it in mind in any future study of the subject, as at all events indicating some important points in regard to which observations should be made. I must confess, however, that at present I am sceptical as to the possibility of building rooms for music in accordance with any rigidly scientific theory with anything like a certainty of success; because, though proportions can be measured and arranged accurately, so many accidental influences which cannot be calculated come in to affect the result—even the varying numbers and position of the audience, or the position of the performers on a crowded orchestra, may have an important effect on the music. My impression is that more practical good is likely to be done by systematic observation of the effect of music in various rooms and under various circumstances (towards which Mr. Armfield gives one or two valuable facts) than by framing a mathematical theory by which the room ought to be right. I am the rather inclined to this view from having observed that some of the most unpractical schemes for concert-rooms have come from scientific acousticians who knew nothing of music nor of the conditions under which concerts must be carried on. Now, whatever may be the value of acoustic science in the matter, musical knowledge is absolutely necessary in order to form a judgment of the results, for without it how can the acoustic theorist know whether he is hearing what he ought to hear or not? An amusing instance of this occurred when the Albert Hall was opened, when a very eminent scientific man complimented the constructor of the hall on his entire success, and the constructor had the compliment recorded in the papers, although every musical man knew that the result was not satisfactory.—H. Heathcote Statham.]

WALTER SPINNEY'S "EXAMINATION CARDS."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—With reference to the review which appeared in your September issue of a set of "Examination Questions" printed on cards, I am authorised to state that the Academical Board of Trinity College, London, in no way lends its official sanction to the publication (as the words "submitted to" would seem to imply). The Board simply, as an act of courtesy, accepted the author's dedication. We are unwilling to think that the author had any intention of claiming the sanction of the College for his work, especially as, in accepting the dedication, the Board expressly stated that it would not be responsible for the contents of the work.

GLUCK'S "DE PROFUNDIS."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—Will you allow me to ask, through your columns, whether Gluck's "De Profundis," in D minor (Simrock, Bonn), has ever been published set to English words? It is, I believe, the only sacred vocal composition by that great composer; and I should be surprised to hear that it had never found its way into our cathedrals in the shape of an anthem.—I am, sir, yours obediently, H. A. Harding, Mus. B.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

 Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will greatly oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music pages are always stereotyped, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

Ashton-under-Lyne.—The annual dinner in connection with the Gentlemen's Glee Club was held at the Queen's Arms on Wednesday, the 18th ult., when the committee presented a bâton to Mr. Irvine Dearnaley, in recognition of his services as Conductor during a period of twelve years. The bâton is of ebony, very beautifully mounted with silver, upon a band of which is the following inscription: "Presented to Mr. Irvine Dearnaley by the committee of the Ashton-under-Lyne Gentlemen's Glee Club, September 18, 1878." Mr. S. H. Smith occupied the chair; and, during the evening, the choir gave a fine rendering of some old glees, and several songs were also well sung by Messrs. Edmondson, Ballam, and Bentley.

Birkenhead.—The fine church of St. Anne's, having been recently injured by fire, was reopened on the 29th of August by a grand Festival Service of a novel character, combining the best features of a choral service with the highest class of organ recital. The Rev. A. Knox, M.A., the incumbent, intoned the service, and the preacher was the Rev. Canon Robson. Dr. Spark, the organist of Leeds Town Hall, presided at the organ. The opening voluntary was Smart's Festival March in D, the responses were Tallis (unaccompanied), and the anthem (Deut. x. 12—17) Dr. Spark. The organ solos included one composed for the last Leeds Musical Festival by Dr. Spark, and the concluding voluntary was an extempore Introduction and Fugue (D minor), J. S. Bach. The vocal portions of the service were given by the ordinary choir, strengthened for the occasion. Dr. Spark's anthem was grandly given, the highest efforts of the choir being called forth. All the resources of the fine instrument were effectively exhibited by Dr. Spark, and the recital proved a source of enjoyment to an appreciative congregation. The "Giant" Fugue of Bach's, with an extempore Introduction, proved a fitting finale to a most successful service. The offertory was devoted to the Restoration Fund.

Birmingham.—A Concert, in aid of St. Barnabas' Schools, was given in the large room on Tuesday, the 3rd ult. The principal artist was Miss Jessie Percivall, R.A.M., who delighted the audience by her vocal and instrumental performances. She sang several popular songs, and played Weber's "Invitation" and Mayer's Concert-study, "La Fontaine," being encored or recalled after every effort. Mr. Walters sang "My Queen" (Blumenthal) and "I seek for thee in every flower" (Ganz); Mr. Lusted gave "The Warrior Bold" (S. Adams) and "The Woodman" (Stratton); and Mr. Randell sang "The Diver" (Loder) and "The Wolf" (Shield). Several lady amateurs also took part in the programme. The whole was under the direction of Mr. G. Holmes, and was altogether the most successful Concert ever given in the room.——The Concert season could scarcely have been more fittingly inaugurated than with the programme submitted on the 19th ult. by the Philharmonic Union. The principal vocalists were Miss Emma Beasley, Madame Poole, Mr. G. H. Welch, and Mr. J. H. Blower; assisted in the concerted pieces by Mrs. Bellamy, Miss Priddy, and Miss Bailey. Mr. Abbott was the solo violinist, and the chorus was supported by an effective if not large orchestra, the whole being, as usual, under the direction of Dr. Heap. The scheme was as under: Paradise and the Peri, Cantata, Op. 50 (R. Schumann); Violin Concerto, in G minor, Op. 26 (Max Bruch); Benedictus (C. S. Heap); sacred Song, "Nazareth" (Gounod); Paternoster (Meyerbeer); War March, Athalie (Mendelssohn). Schumann's Cantata (performed in Birmingham for the first time) was excellently rendered, and produced a marked effect with the audience. Miss Emma Beasley, as the Peri, sang with much brilliancy and dramatic force, Madame Poole gave the contralto music in good style, Mr. Welch, as the narrator, sang the recitatives with much intelligence, and Mr. J. H. Blower, who is a stranger to Birmingham, displayed a fine bass voice and good method. Mr. Abbott played Max Bruch's Concerto with artistic finish, and Mr. Blower was encored in Gounod's sacred song. One of the most interesting items in the programme was the setting of the Benedictus by Dr. Heap. Originally published with organ accompaniment only, it has now been scored for a full orchestra, and the treatment of the various instruments—the brass especially—shows a master hand. The work opens (in D major) with massive harmonies for full chorus: the verse "For He hath visited" is treated in fugato style; alternations of full harmonies and passages in imitation then follow, a phrase for the strings pianissimo introduces a more extended "lead" for the basses at the words, "That we being delivered," melodious, and with a subdued joyous character; this is taken up by the sopranos, and followed by a passage in unison pianissimo against an accompaniment of sustained chords, the words, "In holiness and righteousness all the days of our life," receiving appropriate treatment, and the first decided break occurs. Then comes a very well conducted modulation to the key of B major, introducing an air for soprano, "And Thou, child, shalt be called," accompanied by the strings and wood wind, with occasional soft touches by the brass. The middle part contains some bold and striking modulations, after which the first theme is resumed, and a brilliant climax ushers in the Gloria, the latter part of which is treated fugally, with great skill and command of counterpoint, the close being massive and dignified. The work was very well received, and warmly applauded. Meyerbeer's "Paternoster" was also highly successful. There was a large attendance, and Dr Heap received quite an ovation on taking his place at the conductor's desk.——A Choir Concert was given in St. Asaph's School Room on Monday the 23rd ult. when a miscellaneous programme was well gone through by the choir, assisted by Miss Richards, Miss Handley, Mr. Long, Mr. Lusted, and other friends. The part-singing reflected great credit upon the choirmaster, Mr. W. Stephens, who conducted.

Bury.—The Musical Society announces for the coming season Handel's Acis and Galatea, with a miscellaneous selection, about the end of the present month; the Messiah on Christmas Eve; and Haydn's Creation in March, 1879. The band and chorus will consist of about 150 performers, and many engagements are pending with solo vocalists.

Buxton.—The last of the Special Concerts given by Mr. Julian Adams for the present season took place in the new concert-hall at the Pavilion, on Thursday the 12th ult. The vocalists engaged were Miss José Sherrington, Signor Monari Rocca, and Signor Urio. The programme was well selected, and commenced by the orchestra playing the overture to Fidelio. The selections were received with marked favour, those especially attracting attention being Miss Sherrington's "Birdie," and the Aria, "Rendi 'l sereno al ciglio," by Signor Urio. Mr. A. B. Allan and Signor Romili accompanied.

Cheltenham.—The Prospectus for the Ninth Season of Mr. J. A Matthews's Choral Society announces that Professor Macfarren's Oratorio, St. John the Baptist, will be given at the first Concert, and that the Messiah and Elijah will be included in the works to be performed during the series.

Diss.—After a short choral service, an Organ Recital was given in Diss Church by Dr. Bridge (Westminster Abbey) and Mr. Hemstock (Organist, Diss) on Thursday, August 29. Mr. Hemstock's Voluntaries before and after the service were "Lento con espressione" (Holmes) and "Cujus animam" (Rossini). Dr. Bridge performed the overture, Semele (Handel), Andante (Mozart), March and Chorus, Ruins of Athens (Beethoven), Pastorale in D (Merkel), Sonata, No. 4, (Merkel), "Ave Maria," sixteenth century (arranged by Liszt), and March (Silas). Mr. Hemstock's selection consisted of the Concert-stück (Dr. Spark), Andante (Smart), Fugue (Hesse), Fantasia in G (Dr. Bunnett), Offertoire (Tours), and Chorus, "All His mercies" (Handel).

Filey.—On Thursday evening, the 29th of August, Signor Tesseman gave a Ballad Concert in the Spa Saloon before an appreciative audience. The vocalists were Mdlle. Mathilda Roby, R.A.M., Miss Grace Damian, Mr. Andrew McCall, and Signor Tesseman. Mr. Herbert Turner presided at the pianoforte.

Ilfracombe.—The balance-sheet of the Ilfracombe Choral Society, giving a statement of the accounts of the Association from its formation in October, 1874, shows how, by careful management, not only artistic but pecuniary success may be achieved by a small society in a small place. A guarantee fund has been established to meet the expenses of the Oratorios; and the subscription list (unlike that of most choral societies) represents the contributions of the members of the singing-class only. So excellent an institution merits the warmest support of all interested in the spread of good music.

Port Jervis, New York.—The Orange County Musical Association gave a highly successful performance of the Creation at the closing Concert for the season on August 15. The principal vocalists were Miss Ida W. Hubbell, Mr. George Simpson, and Mr. George E. Aiken, all of whom were thoroughly efficient. The work was well conducted by Professor Palmer, and Mr. George A. Andrus was an able accompanist at the pianoforte.

Rock Ferry.—The annual Harvest Thanksgiving Services were held at St. Peter's Church on Sunday the 22nd ult. The church was, as in former years, artistically decorated for the occasion by the members of the congregation. The Vicar (the Rev. Dr. Redhead) was the preacher. The services were full choral, and in the morning included the Benedicite (W. T. Best); Anthem, "Fear not, O land" (Goss); Nicene Creed (Best); and offertory sentences (G. H. Porter). In the evening the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were sung to Smart in G; the Anthem being, "Blessed be the name of the Lord" (H. Gadsby). Appropriate harvest hymns were also sung. Mr. Billinie Porter presided at the organ.

Ryde.—On Sunday the 15th ult. the organ at St. Mary's Roman Catholic Church was used at High Mass, after undergoing extensive alterations and additions; Mr. Tallen, the organist, very ably presiding. The whole of the repairs of the instrument have been most efficiently carried out by W. Beales, organ-builder, of Clapham, London.

Stafford.—Mdlle. Sedlatzek and Mr. Inglis Bervon (Organist of the Parish Church), assisted by several amateurs, gave a Concert in the Shire Hall on the 24th ult., in aid of St. Mary's Schools. The programme included extracts from the works of Donizetti, Hummel, Flotow, Balfe, Mozart, Handel, &c. Mdlle. Sedlatzek's singing was thoroughly appreciated, and Mr. Inglis Bervon received an unanimous encore for his artistic rendering of Mozart's "Non piu andrai." The large room was well filled with a fashionable audience.

Sunderland.—The prospectus of the Philharmonic Society announces for the coming season three Subscription Concerts, the first consisting of Macfarren's Cantata, the Lady of the Lake (with Madame Nouver, Madame Patey, Messrs. E. Lloyd, Maybrick, and Thornton Wood, as principal vocalists); the second of Niels Gade's Spring's Message, with a miscellaneous programme; and the third of Mendelssohn's Oratorio, Elijah. The orchestra will be under the leadership of Mr. Henry Nuttall, of Manchester.

Taunton.—Miss Amy Hare, bronze medalist at the Royal Academy of Music, gave a Concert at the London Hotel, on Thursday evening, the 5th ult., assisted by some of her fellow students at the Academy. Miss Julia de Nolte (solo violinist), silver medalist, Miss Clara Samuell, and Mr. Alfred J. Eyre. The great feature of the evening was of course the pianoforte playing of the bénéficiaire. In her opening solo—the first movement of Weber's A flat Sonata—she displayed much facility of execution, as well as an intelligent conception of the spirit of the composition. A couple of excerpts from the works of Schumann and a Tarantelle by Macfarren were her second contribution; and she concluded the programme with Raff's Valse Impromptu and a Study on the black keys by Chopin. A well-written song by Miss Hare was excellently sung by Miss Clara Samuell and encored, and the violin performance of Miss Julia de Nolte also received the warmest recognition. Mr. Alfred J. Eyre accompanied the songs, sang "The Yeoman's Wedding," and joined Miss Samuell in a Barcarole by Gounod. Miss Margaret Bucknall, of the Royal Academy, assisted as accompanist.

Erratum.—Mr. L. N. Parker's Lecture, noticed in our last number as given at Chard, was delivered at Sherborne.

Organ Appointments.—Mr. Alfred Redhead, to S. Augustine's, Kilburn.—Mr. H. Much White, to St. Paul's Church, North Bow.—Mr. Thomas Leaver, Organist and Choirmaster, to the Congregational Church, Besses, near Manchester.—Mr. A. Mollan, to St. Peter's, Regent Square, W.C.

Choir Appointments.—Mr. W. G. Hazelgrove (Bass) to Christ Church, Mayfair.—Mr. J. Parker Callcott (Bass) to St. Barnabas, Bell Street, Edgware Road, W.—Mr. Alfred Moore (Bass) to St. Alban's, Holborn.

Half-Yearly	1	5	0
Quarterly	0	15	0
Monthly	0	8	0
Weekly	0	3	0

Town Subscribers can be supplied with Two Guineas' worth of Music, which may be exchanged once a week.

Country Subscribers can be supplied with Four Guineas' worth of Music, which may be exchanged twice a month.

At the end of their Subscription, Annual Subscribers are entitled to select Music of the value of Half-a-Guinea, net (Half-price).

All Music named in the Library Catalogue is for sale, those scarce works excepted which cannot be replaced.

The Library is open from nine to six o'clock, Saturdays excepted, when it closes at two.

REGULATIONS.

1. That the Subscription be paid in advance.
2. That the Subscription shall be considered renewed, if the Music belonging to the Library be not returned at the expiration of the term.
3. That the Subscriber shall, if required, pay a deposit.
4. That the Subscriber defray all expenses of carriage, postage, &c., and prepay all returned parcels.
5. That the Subscriber be charged with every piece of Music that may be written on or in any other way damaged whilst in his or her possession.
6. That the Subscriber be provided with a Portfolio (which can be supplied, price 2/-), to prevent the Music being rolled during transmission.
7. That a Subscriber, wishing to retain any Music for purchase, return the wrapper of the piece required (every piece of Music in the Library being in a wrapper, and numbered according to the Library Catalogue).
8. That no Music be retained on Subscription longer than two months.
9. That the Subscriber, when exchanging Music, send a list containing the numbers, according to the Library Catalogue, of about twice as many works as the Subscription allows.
10. That in returning Music to the Library the Subscriber's name be inclosed in the parcel, otherwise Messrs. Novello, Ewer & Co. cannot undertake to be responsible for its receipt.

MUSICAL TERMS

EDITED BY

J. STAINER, M.A., Mus. Doc.,
Magd. Coll., Oxford,
AND
W. A. BARRETT, Mus. Bac.,
St. Mary Hall, Oxford.

The following Gentlemen have contributed to this Work :—

Bosanquet, R. H. M., Esq., M.A., Fellow of St. John's College, Oxford.
Bulley, J., Esq., M.A., Magdalen College, Oxford.
Champneys, F., Esq., B.M., M.A., M.R.C.S., of St. Bartholomew's Hospital, late Radcliffe Travelling Fellow of the University of Oxford.
Chappell, W., Esq., F.S.A.
Donkin, A. E., Esq., M.A., F.R.A.S., Fellow of Exeter College, Oxford.
Ellis, A. J., Esq., B.A., F.R.S., F.S.A., F.C.P.S., F.C.P., Trinity College, Cambridge.
Gadsby, Henry, Esq.
Helmore, Rev. T., M.A.
Hullah, John, Esq.
McNaught, W. G., Esq.
Monk, W. H., Esq.

"Among articles which, though not absolutely indispensable in a Musical Dictionary, are well worth reading as treated in the Dictionary edited by Dr. Stainer and Mr. Barrett, may be mentioned 'applause' and 'dedication.' Indeed, apart from its high value as a work of reference, the Dictionary is interesting throughout."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"The 'Dictionary of Musical Terms,' by Dr. Stainer and Mr. Barrett, comes to supply the deficiency just at the time when people are waking up to the advantages of accuracy in all sorts of arts, and it is most welcome. Its title gives a very humble idea of its importance, suggesting rather dry definitions or technical explanations than what it really contains. The definitions and explanations are all there, and their multitude is truly astonishing, even the most out-of-the-way words receiving consideration; but besides this there is a great quantity of valuable essays, not only by the editors, but also by men well known to the public for successful labours in the field of music and acoustics, such as Mr. Hullah and Mr. Ellis, the translator of Helmholtz, and Mr. William Chappell and Mr. Helmore."—The Academy.

"A 'Dictionary of Musical Terms,' by Dr. Stainer and Mr. Barrett (Novello, Ewer and Co.), deserves especial mention, as the first attempt to supply the English reader with something that is not a limited glossary of technical words, but an encyclopædic book of reference on matters musical, such as German and Italian students have for some time been fortunate enough to possess."—The Graphic.

"In addition to this, the editors have derived information from many other equally good sources, so that the work is as trustworthy as it is complete, and professional and amateur musicians will alike owe a debt of gratitude to Dr. Stainer and Mr. Barrett for one of the most useful musical works ever produced."—Standard.

"It is the general character and tone of the volume that concerns general amateurs, who, at a little cost of time, can obtain from this volume information on theoretical and scientific subjects, without having to wade through complex works. The Dictionary displays careful research generally, and it is also imbued with an impartial spirit, which goes far to beget confidence in the writers. The book is illustrated with diagrams of instrumental workmanship, and is printed in very large and clear type."—The Athenæum.

THE LEEDS TUNE-BOOK

A MANUAL OF 274 HYMN-TUNES OF ALL METRES FOR ALL DENOMINATIONS,

COMPILED AND ARRANGED IN SHORT SCORE FOR VOICES OR ORGAN, BY

JOSEPH LANCASTER,

ORGANIST, MILL HILL CHAPEL, LEEDS.

Quarto. Large type. Price 4s. 6d. Congregations and Choirs supplied at Reduced Rates.

"The harmonies evince an amount of technical knowledge and careful arrangement which is creditable in the highest degree to the compiler."—Musical Times.

"This collection contains 274 tunes, selected with taste and judgment, including not only the principal ancient and modern tunes in general use, but a number of new and original tunes, some of which are of great merit."—Illustrated London News.

"It is an admirable collection of very choice tunes for congregational worship, and we most heartily commend it for use in the church and in the home, believing it will be found very widely acceptable. The book is clearly printed, and can be had to order of any book or musicseller."—Kent Herald.

"Mr. Lancaster has reproduced many of the standard tunes, both ancient and modern; and he has mingled with them many original compositions. The work, which is not at all sectarian or denominational in character, is thoroughly legitimate in its purpose, and in many respects highly creditable in its execution."—Globe.

"'The Leeds Tune-Book' is a handsomely printed quarto volume, with the tunes in short score, and contains the usual amount of ancient and modern favourites, with about ninety tunes composed expressly for the collection, and printed for the first time. Many of the original tunes are remarkably good. We may particularly instance those by Dr. Naylor, Mr. Hird, and a many of the Editor's contributions."—Choir and Musical Record.

"It is charmingly printed in duodecimo; a handy book, and a good collection. We heartily recommend it."—Yorkshire Post.

"An excellent tune-book, and will be found a most useful supplement to the tune-books already in use."—Leeds Mercury.

"This collection consists of 274 tunes of all metres, all bearing the true stamp of the effective music so generally heard in places of worship in Yorkshire. It is printed in beautifully clear type, is well bound, is moderate in price, and in every respect a very acceptable addition to the present list of such publications."—Yorkshire Orchestra.

"We welcome the appearance of this new tune-book, as a valuable compendium, either for a complete collection or as a supplement to any other tune-book."—Scarborough Gazette.

THE MANCHESTER GENTLEMEN'S GLEE CLUB'S PRIZE GLEES, 1878.

HUSHED IN DEATH.

A SERIOUS GLEE FOR S.A.T.B.

Composed by Dr. H. HILES. Price Sixpence.

"We have great pleasure in noticing the excellent manner in which Dr. Hiles's admirable work was given. The Glee fulfils all the requirements of a work of the kind, and if the judges who awarded the first prize to it were present they could not but be gratified to hear their verdict confirmed by the emphatic approval of the audience. Scholarly writing one always expects from Dr. Hiles, whose experience as a choirmaster has also given him peculiar advantages as a writer of vocal harmony, and his Prize Glee could only have been written by an accomplished musician. The melody of the first part of the Glee is flowing and graceful, and the fugue at the end is exceedingly effective. It cannot but be gratifying to Manchester that a local composer should have been successful in a competition in which he had to contend against not a few distinguished composers."—Manchester Examiner and Times, May 9, 1878.

HENCE, LOATHED MELANCHOLY!

A CHEERFUL GLEE FOR FIVE VOICES.

Composed by HENRY LAHEE. Price Sixpence.

"Mr. Lahee's setting of the opening lines of Milton's 'L'Allegro' obtained the Manchester prize for a 'cheerful' composition of its class. It begins with a movement in C minor, directed to be sung 'heavily and in firm time,' massive as to character, and decidedly effective. Let us add that the music is none the worse for suggesting Handel, while it is not unworthy, by reason of the correct and easy flow of the parts, to be in the manner of the great old master. The invocation to Euphrosyne has, of course, a very different character. Here all is lightness and grace (the key changing to C major), and we consider that Mr. Lahee has been particularly happy in his setting of the passage 'Jest and youthful jollity,' &c., a simple phrase, airily treated in imitation, producing the best effect. At 'These delights if thou canst give,' another change takes place. The music becomes more sedate, and a tuneful, plainly harmonised movement ends the work. We should add that the composer has been careful not to exact too much from his executants. The glee is an easy one, and as pleasing as easy."—Musical Times, June, 1878.

New Song,

THE FERRY MAIDEN.

THE WORDS BY

F. E. WEATHERLY.

THE MUSIC BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

Sir Roland to the river came,
Full blithely there he cried,
"O row me o'er the tide, lassie,
O row me o'er the tide!
A piece of red, red gold, lassie,
I'll gladly give to thee,
For yonder tow'r 's my lady's bow'r,
And there she waits for me!"

She rowed him o'er the water wide,
She saw him leap to land;
He left a piece of red, red gold
Within her lily hand.
And many a time she ferried him
Across the water wide,
And ev'ry time she dropt the gold
Adown into the tide.

"O row us o'er the tide, lassie,
O row us o'er the tide;
I'll fill thy lap with red, red gold,
For I have won my bride!"
The water laps among the reeds,
No maiden makes reply;
There, in the river, by her boat,
They see the maiden lie.

MUSIC PRIMERS

EDITED BY

DR. STAINER.

In issuing this series of Music Primers the Editor sees with pleasure the realisation of a desire he has long felt, to place in the hands of teachers and students of music a set of educational works of a high standard at a price so low as to render them attainable by all.

The growing interest in music generally, and rapid spread of its study, so very evident in this country, render it of the utmost importance that the student's first steps in every branch should be directed with skill and based on sound principles. The Editor has kept this object steadily in view, and he believes that each one of these Primers will prove to be as carefully constructed in detail as it is comprehensive in design.

Such a result would have been impossible but for the hearty support and sympathy of those authors, men of known ability in their special branches of art, who have embodied the results of their long and valuable experience in their respective contributions.

While gratefully acknowledging the kindness of these gentlemen, the Editor cannot but express a hope that the Primers may prove as useful to the public, and as beneficial to art, as both authors and publishers have endeavoured to make them.

ON THE THREE YEARS' SYSTEM, AT ALL THE PRINCIPAL MUSIC WAREHOUSES.

JOHN BRINSMEAD AND SONS'

GOLD MEDAL PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

Sir Julius Benedict. { "This most ingenious and valuable invention cannot fail to meet with success."

Sydney Smith. { "The touch is absolute perfection."

Brinley Richards. { "A very clever and useful invention, and likely to be extensively adopted."

JOHN BRINSMEAD AND SONS'

SHORT IRON GRAND PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

"The improvements made in English pianos have caused this trade rapidly to increase, until one pianoforte manufactory after another has been built to supply the growing demand. One of the largest of these, lately erected by Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons, of Wigmore Street, covers nearly an acre of ground in the Grafton Road, Kentish Town, and is intended to accommodate 300 workmen. These works alone can supply 3,000 pianos annually, and there are at least three manufactories in London capable of making an equal number."—Illustrated London News.

JOHN BRINSMEAD AND SONS'

GOLD MEDAL PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

"The softest touch is sufficient to secure a reply, the touch and facility of repetition are really perfect."—Belgravia.

"The touch is very sure, light, and elastic."—Musical Times.

"This invention is simplicity itself."—The Queen.

JOHN BRINSMEAD AND SONS'

GOLD MEDAL PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

On the Three Years' System.

"Receive the greatest approbation everywhere of musicians and manufacturers."—Standard.

JOHN BRINSMEAD AND SONS'

JOHN BRINSMEAD AND SONS'

SHORT IRON GRAND PIANOS. Six feet six inches in length, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action. Price 105 to 115 Guineas.

"The tone of the Grand now referred to possessed all the qualities that a good piano ought to have, and in touch and action was perfect. The sweet and silvery quality of the upper octaves was worthy of special admiration."—The Era.

"Sir Julius Benedict played his well-known composition, 'Where the Bee sucks,' on one of Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons' Grand Pianos, with the recently patented improvements, which enabled him to produce the sustained tones with great variety of effect in the light and shade of tones, especially so when extreme delicacy of touch is required."—Court Journal.

JOHN BRINSMEAD AND SONS'

GOLD MEDAL PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

"A metal bridge of a peculiar form is used to produce the treble, and a much finer tone is produced than if a wooden bridge were used."—Morning Post.

"Beautiful, light, and elastic touch, and an instant repetition."—Globe.

JOHN BRINSMEAD AND SONS'

SHORT IRON GRAND PIANOS. Six feet six inches in length, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action. Price 105 to 115 Guineas.

"An immense improvement in arpeggios. The rapid passages in the upper register, the beautiful flute-like tone, and quick and perfect repetition, were very effective."—Figaro.

JOHN BRINSMEAD AND SONS'

CONCERT IRON GRAND PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

"Sir Julius Benedict, now seldom heard as a soloist, delighted the public once more by his arrangement of 'Where the Bee sucks.' He played upon a new Patent Grand by Brinsmead, possessing a remarkably loud and clear tone."—Echo.

"The upright Iron Grand Piano, with sostenente sounding-board, the mechanism produces the obvious result of a fuller and richer tone."—Morning Advertiser.

"Every means are adopted to insure the production of perfect instruments."—The Orchestra.

SONGS FOR SAILORS

WRITTEN BY

W. C. BENNETT

SET TO MUSIC BY

J. L. HATTON.

ONE VOLUME, OCTAVO, CONTAINING FORTY SONGS:

Trafalgar.
Would you be a sailor's wife?
A fisher-wife's song.
Nay, never cry, lass.
A kiss to take to sea.
Homeward bound.
The Nile.
The apparition.
The Dutchman's broom.
Take me, lass, for life.
The fine old English admiral.
Ring, happy bells.
The forsaken.
The sailor's dream.
To sea.
Rooke in the Bay of La Hogue.
A thousand leagues away.
Strike, and strike hard.
Were I that gull.
Hawke in Quiberon Bay.
Saturday night at sea.
Duncan at Camperdown.
Rum.
Rodney and De Grasse.
From sea.
A wife's song.
The winds, inconstant ever.
Old Benbow.
There's nothing like a smoke.
The seaboy's dream.
A song of the sea.
The wife for a British sailor.
We roam and rule the sea.
The homeward watch.
Off to sea.
A mother's song.
Here we sit by our Christmas fire.
A Christmas song.
Outward bound.
Herrings are in the bay.

ESTABLISHED 1804.

PRIZE MEDAL, PARIS, 1878,
FOR GOOD AND CHEAP PIANOS.

PRIZE MEDAL, LONDON, 1862.

GOLD MEDAL, SOUTH AFRICA, 1877.

The only Firm who obtained the International Exhibition Medal for the special distinction of "excellence of touch and tone."

CHALLEN & SON'S GOLD MEDAL PIANETTE,
WITH CHECK ACTION, IN ELEGANT WALNUT OR ROSEWOOD CASE.

FROM 25 GUINEAS.

"The Pianettes manufactured by CHALLEN & SON are most satisfactory instruments."—Anton Rubinstein.

"I can testify in the strongest manner to the qualities of the Pianette as manufactured by CHALLEN & SON. In every point, as to tone and touch, they are excellent; and I can also certify from experience as to their durability under hard wear."—William Henry Monk, Professor of Music in King's College, London.

CHALLEN & SON'S GOLD MEDAL SEMI-COTTAGE,
WITH CHECK REPEATER ACTION.

FROM 32 GUINEAS.

"The Pianos I have selected from Messrs. CHALLEN & SON have invariably given complete satisfaction, some of them having had to bear the severe test of an Indian climate."—William H. Cummings.

"As a customer of some years' standing, I speak with confidence of the quality of the instruments supplied by Messrs. CHALLEN & SON. The two I have for my own use have had a great deal of wear, and in this respect have entirely satisfied me as to their durability; and the tone and touch of all those selected by me for myself or pupils have been much commended."—Alfred Gilbert, R.A.M.

CHALLEN & SON'S GOLD MEDAL COTTAGE;
TRICHORD THROUGHOUT; BRASS BRIDGE; CHECK REPEATER ACTION.

FROM 60 GUINEAS.

"I hold a very high opinion of Messrs. CHALLEN & SON'S Pianos. Their qualities of tone and touch can be at once estimated; but I can furthermore bear testimony to their great durability."—Lindsay Sloper.

"CHALLEN & SON is a name synonymous with wonderful durability, great beauty of tone, and moderation in price. We know of not one single maker whose Pianos excel theirs in the qualities most desirable in a good and lasting Piano."—Cape Argus, May 7.

EXCELLENCE IS GUARANTEED, AND EVERY INSTRUMENT WARRANTED TO BE OF THE HIGHEST CLASS WORKMANSHIP AND MATERIALS.

NOVEMBER 1, 1878.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER ON MUSICAL EDUCATION.

WHEN a man sits down to write a letter to the Times he is not expected to compose an essay fortified at all points against attack. It is, perhaps, enough if his statements are sufficiently correct to warrant his writing at all. In this country more than in any other there are gentlemen of leisure who spend a great portion of their lives in angling for grievances. They are not always very sportsmanlike; they will occasionally bag a specimen a trifle "spent," a little "coppery," and out of season, and not of much weight. But it proves there is something to be had, and is often of value in attracting attention to a particular spot. We are not at all inclined to underrate the importance of the letters Sir George Bowyer has recently addressed to the Times on the subject of musical education. A great deal of what he avows or suggests is perfectly correct. We have the authority of the Government Inspector himself for the fact that, whether the £100,000 a year expended on teaching the children in elementary schools to sing is too much or too little, it is all but wasted under the existing system of instruction. We quite understand that the point with Sir George Bowyer is not whether the system be good or bad, but whether the "indiscriminate teaching" of singing is not only a waste of money but a positive injury to the general musical taste of the country. It is fair to Sir George Bowyer to transfer a part of the question to our individual experiences in our own families. There are a great many to whom very similar views must have been suggested when signing a cheque for twelve months' musical instruction to a large family of girls, amongst whom there may be only one who is ever likely to play a tune on the piano with tolerable accuracy. If Paterfamilias is unwise enough to think aloud, his objections are generally overturned by an equally influential member of the small community in this way: "I don't care whether they have any talent or no, they shall learn. It looks so stupid for girls not to know something of music." We doubt very much if Sir George Bowyer, with all his masculine common sense, legal training, and knowledge of the geographical distribution of musical talent, is prepared with an answer to the ordinary version we have given of a woman's instinctive reasoning on the subject. If we ourselves were ever disposed with the majority of Englishmen to disparage the "indiscriminate teaching" of music, we confess we have lately been induced to alter our opinion. The recent revival of the education mania, particularly as regards music, dates from the terror—not to mince matters—which was inspired by the rapid invasion and conquest of France by the Germans. Previously to that epoch the Times itself was accustomed to sneer at the Germans as a race of dreamers, musicians, metaphysicians, and makers of lucifer matches. The idea of singing oneself into combat was looked upon by Englishmen as unmanly. Gradually the truth began to dawn upon us that people could sing and make good music, or bad metaphysics and worse matches, and fight too; and not only with mere animal courage, but under a discipline and military organisation we had complacently imagined would have been more possible with ourselves as a practical, business-like, unæsthetical nation. Contemporaneously with our Chinaman-like imitation of the German military system, lately capped by the "helmet," came our present edition of the Prussian scheme of education, which included the elements of music. Dr. Hullah, who is deputed by our Government to report on the systems of musical education adopted on the Continent, will by-and-by tell us if the Prussians understood the "elements of music" to mean the method he so justly condemns in this country of teaching children to sing by rote or by ear. Perhaps Mr. Barnby, the Professor of Music at Eton, who has succeeded in persuading the authorities at that College to make the learning of music compulsory in all, irrespective of talent or inclination, will tell us the result of his experiences, and how far, in his judgment, the method he has employed, and which we know to have already gained a marvellous success, could be applied to the very different materials in respect both to teachers and pupils we have to provide for in the National Schools, and out of the wretched grant of public money Sir George Bowyer thinks so startling in amount. It would be, and is, an abominable amount to expend in teaching children to sing by ear, which to the musician means simply not teaching music at all. The moment we teach a child to sing by note he commences to learn the "elements of music," and we have conformed with all that is expected of us in what is called "elementary instruction;" that is getting a boy through the drudgery of the letters of the alphabet, the notes of music, or of pothooks and hangers, he finds so difficult to attack when he grows older, even if he have the opportunity or desire of acquiring knowledge. As to Sir George Bowyer's statement that only 2 per cent. of our male population are capable of being made to sing, his data must evidently have got "mixed." Another correspondent of the Times has suggested what Sir George Bowyer probably meant himself, that only two per cent. cannot be made to sing. If from the context of his letters we are to understand that only two per cent. can be made to sing well, he might then have said two per mil or two per milliard; but that is not the question. The £100,000 are not given to promote the training of great singers any more than of great composers. To our conception of the case the grant is like any other for elementary educational purposes. Putting aside the enjoyment derived from music, and its supposed moral benefits, music is a branch of knowledge, which in its most elementary form may become an incentive in the poorest and most illiterate to extend his acquirements. The elements of reading, writing, and arithmetic do nothing more; and are in themselves almost as useless, except as a means or an incentive. Amongst a higher class it may be nothing to know music, but it often amounts to a great deal not to know something about it. "It makes a man look like a fool" not to know the right end from the wrong, except by the picture of that elegant song the title of which we have quoted. Besides, men of the highest cultivation, particularly English men of science who happen to have been born some years ago, deplore bitterly the fact that they were not taught the mere elements of music. Continental writers on all subjects, the most abstruse, are now in the habit of drawing largely their illustrations from that microcosm we call music; and with many of our own literary men there must be pages and pages which are to them caviare.

The letters addressed to the Times by Sir George Bowyer really cover the whole ground of musical training in this country. It would be easy to take exception to some of his statements and to question his logic, but we prefer to receive what he tells us as it is meant. There is no doubt about it that, whatever may be the cause, we are too fond in this country of "noise" and "monstrous choruses." It is equally true that to a certain extent in musical training we are "fighting against nature." There is one point, however, as to which it is perhaps worth while to differ distinctly with Sir George Bowyer. He seems to think that the English climate not only affects the voice and general constitution, but the ear. From our own experience, whatever may be their musical defects in other ways, there is no people who sing better in tune than the English. Even if the English were more deficient than they are in goodness of ear, it would be no reason for giving up as hopeless the task of teaching them music. As a rule, girls have a much better and quicker ear than boys; but the boys make the best musicians, and can be taught harmony with much less trouble. What is vulgarly called an ear for music is perhaps a much more complicated business than the present state of the science bearing on such questions will enable us to decide with any certainty. At all events it is not wholly a question of east winds, as Sir George Bowyer appears to imagine. We quite believe him to be a musical connoisseur, and to know more or less what he is writing about; and at first sight one might appreciate the common sense of his suggestion, that it is wiser to spend £10,000 in assisting really gifted musical pupils than to waste £100,000 on a rabble who can never be made to learn. But, as happens with many people of good common sense, his suggestions, though right enough in themselves, are irrelevant in their relation to a whole subject. We cannot muddle up the question of elementary education with Royal Academies, Conservatoriums, and Grands Prix de Rome. Indeed, we should have been better pleased had he left the school-children with their £100,000 to yell in peace, until Dr. Hullah has time to attend to them, and assisted some of us in the much more difficult question how "at a comparatively little cost" to raise, as Sir George Bowyer said, "the musical science and taste of this country." He cannot suppose that the training of two or three dozen gifted singers or players will accomplish all that, more particularly if, by withdrawing the grant for elementary education, we limit the number of people who will care to hear them. It is not our business to know or to inquire whether Sir George Bowyer objects to the interference of the State in education of any kind, or to any system of national schools. What we are obliged to know and to deal with is the fact that day by day the continental system of centralisation is more and more recognised in this country; and as regards music, it is becoming a very interesting question where and in what way the first efforts of an imperial policy in that direction will strike. We beg to say we have no old-fashioned prejudices in favour of the laissez-nous faire. We admit that the marvellous inventions of science are so altering even our daily habits of life that our former notions, however sacred and respectable, must accommodate themselves to the new conditions. But it is in periods of transition, when neither we nor our legislators are quite certain what we are about, that the most fatal mistakes are made; and naturally, under these circumstances, our mistakes assume the shape of tentative measures, commonly called "half-measures" or "shams." If Sir George Bowyer means to say that our present system of elementary musical education is in that category, he only confirms what all sensible people have acknowledged. If he would look further he might tell us that, incomplete as the national system of education may be, the "voluntary system" in music, as exemplified in ladies' boarding-schools and private tuition generally amongst the middle classes, is a thousand times worse. He might certainly point out, greatly to their own credit, the useful work which has been accomplished by an intermediate class of musical institutions that neither trust to State aid nor to haphazard individual efforts, but to the power of association, in promoting their own systems of notation or whatever they may be, and at the same time, with due deference to Sir George Bowyer, "raising the musical taste and science of this country;" although they may occasionally rejoice in "monstrous choruses" not equal, we willingly concede, or anything like equal, in effect to the "forty picked voices of the papal choir." That choir, Sir George Bowyer knows better than we do, is the representative of art traditions no other country can compete with, and also of State and municipal schools for music which are amongst the oldest and most celebrated in Europe. We would gladly take the Pope's choir as an exemplar; but what we want to know is how to employ the same system of State aid in musical education without needlessly interfering with independent associations or with institutions like the Royal Academy, already partially endowed and doing its work well as a little republic of musical professors. We are not at all disposed to look at the Royal Academy as the sum of perfection, nor should we altogether build our hopes on the first and successful appearance in public, a week or two ago, of the pupils of the "National Training School for Music." Both institutions may possibly be able to go their own way, and with equal advantage to the public. But there is apparently a notion abroad that something of grander dimensions than either, which could be accomplished by rolling both into one, would be more suited to modern views of a high-art institution. We all of us remember Grétry's estimate of the carpentering of the arithmetical musicians, who "spoiled two good scales to make a bad one;" and in the case under consideration we have to avoid a similar piece of jobbery. If the proposed "Royal College of Music" is to be another "Royal Açademy" or another "National Training School" on a larger scale, we think it will be a failure. Comparing State institutions with private institutions generally, each of the two existing schools we have named can only be classified as neither one thing nor the other; and as such, they may both of them work better on a comparatively smaller scale under the immediate supervision of their respective principals. If the promoters of the "Royal College of Music" contemplate any improvement on the Paris Conservatoire, then Sir George Bowyer and his friends who are "startled" at having to pay for the purposes of musical education the fifth part of the price of an ironclad, or probably the tenth part of the price of a steelclad of the future, will have yet another grievance of more weight than the one they have pounced upon. Separating the interests of Art from the question of the private feelings of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and dismissing from our minds all ultra-magnificent views, there is not one of us who would not second in every possible way the project of a "Royal College of Music," if the thing is to be truly a State institution well endowed, and not a sham; and something that peradventure might eventuate in our being able to give a concert, in this country teeming with wealth and possessing half a dozen cities each more populous than most continental capitals, without having to scour the land for a stray tenor, a disengaged fiddler, or for a man who does not play the pianoforte and can take the drums.

THE LITERATURE OF NATIONAL MUSIC.

By Carl Engel.

This may be the place to notice a very interesting work entitled "Germaniens Völkerstimmen; Sammlung der deutschen Mundarten in Dichtungen, Sagen, Mährchen, Volksliedern, &c.," edited by J. M. Firmenich (Berlin, 1843-66; three vols. royal 8vo; with an Appendix, Berlin, 1867). This important work, compiled under the auspices of the King of Prussia, contains popular songs in various dialects of the German language, but without the airs. Many contributions of popular poetry were sent to the editor, in answer to his appeal in public papers, from different districts of Germany, and even from German colonists in foreign countries, who, living together in villages as they did in their fatherland, have retained their mother-tongue. In the year 1851, Napoleon, then President of the French Republic, resolved to have a similar work for France entitled "Recueil Général des Poésies Populaires de la France." A decree referring to it, which appeared in the Moniteur of September 16, 1852, has, among other introductory remarks by H. Fortoul, the Minister of Public Instruction, the following: "Les chants populaires ont été, depuis le commencement du siècle, l'objet des recherches de l'érudition. Notre pays possède, plus qu'aucun autre, de précieux restes de ces poésies, aussi bien dans la langue nationale que dans les idiomes provinciaux qu'elle a remplacés. Malheureusement ces richesses, que le temps emporte chaque jour, disparaîtront bientôt, si l'on ne s'empresse de recueiller tant de témoignages touchants de la gloire et des malheurs de notre patrie."

These projects are also important to musicians, although they interest to a higher degree philologists and ethnologists. It would be an advantage to art as well as to science if the English Government would follow in this respect the example of the Germans and the French. Considering the great number of different races included in the British empire the result might be highly instructive. The Russian Government has perhaps done most to encourage such investigations; and as there are many different races subject to Russia in Europe and Asia, a rich harvest has been obtained. England has hitherto done the least in this field of inquiry as regards science and still less as regards art.

Perhaps not many English musicians will care for the foreign publications of national poetry; however, books of this kind published in English may prove more interesting or, at any rate, more intelligible. The following are only a few out of a considerable number:—

Alexander Prior: "Ancient Danish Ballads translated from the Originals" (London, 1860; 8vo, two vols.). The translations have been made from Svend Grundtvig's "Danmarks Gamle Folkeviser," and from "Udvalgte Danske Viser fra Middelalderen," edited by Abrahamson, Nyerup, and Rahbek. The latter work has already been mentioned in the present essay. S. Grundtvig's edition of the Danish popular songs, published under commission of the Danish government, gives, besides many hitherto unknown ballads, more correct readings of the old ones already known, and contains much research and valuable information respecting Scandinavian national poetry in general.

Grenville Murray: "Doine; or the National Songs and Legends of Roumania" (London, 1854; sm. 8vo).

Owen Meredith: "Serbski Pesme; or National Songs of Servia" (London, 1861; sm. 8vo).

W. R. S. Ralston: "The Songs of the Russian People, as illustrative of Slavonic Mythology and Russian Social Life" (London, 1872; 8vo).

Sir John Bowring: "Servian Popular Poetry" (London, 1827; 8vo); "Specimens of the Polish Poets" (London, 1827; 8vo); "Specimens of the Russian Poets" (London, 1821; 8vo, two vols.); "Poetry of the Magyars" (London, 1830; 8vo); "Cheskian Anthology, History of the Poetry of Bohemia" (London, 1832; 8vo); "Ancient Poetry and Romances of Spain" (London, 1824; 8vo).

Thomas Rodd: "Ancient Spanish Ballads" (London, 1812; 8vo, two vols.).

J. G. Lockhart: "Ancient Spanish Ballads, Historical and Romantic" (London, 1823; sm. 4to: illustrated edition, London, 1841; 4to).

C. B. Sheridan: "Songs of the Greeks, from the Romaic Text, edited by C. Fauriel, with additions, translated into English verse" (London, 1825; 8vo). The title of Fauriel's work is "Chants populaires de la Grèce moderne" (Paris, 1824; 8vo, two vols.). There is also a German translation of Fauriel's work, by Wilhelm Müller, entitled "Neugriechische Volkslieder, übersetzt und mit des französischen Herausgebers eigenen Erläuterungen versehen" (Leipzig, 1825; 8vo, two vols.).

Leo M. Alishan: "Armenian Popular Songs translated into English" (Venice, St. Lazarus, 1852; 8vo).

Ebenezer Pocock: "Flowers of the East; with an Introductory Sketch of Oriental Poetry and Music" (London, 1833; sm. 8vo). Contains Persian poems translated into English.

F. V. Dickens: "Hyak Nin Ts'shiu, or Stanzas by a Century of Poets; being Japanese Lyrical Songs, translated into English, with explanatory notes" (London: Smith, Elder and Co., 1866; 8vo).

However faithfully the translation of a poem conceived in a foreign language may have been rendered, it is of course impossible to reproduce unimpaired all the characteristics of the original. A lover of music who has no opportunity of becoming acquainted with a symphony by Beethoven as it was originally composed for the orchestra, will be glad to have recourse to a pianoforte arrangement, imperfectly though it reveals the conceptions of the composer. A translation of a foreign poem might perhaps not improperly be likened to an arrangement of a musical composition. The following works contain poetry in its original language:—

Robert Jamieson: "Popular Ballads and Songs" (Edinburgh, 1806; 8vo, two vols.).

William Motherwell: "Minstrelsy Ancient and Modern, with an Historical Introduction and Notes" (Glasgow, 1826; 4to). The work contains also some Scotch tunes.

W. E. Aytoun: "Ballads of Scotland" (Edinburgh, 1858; 12mo, two vols.).

P. Buchan: "Ancient Ballads and Songs of the North of Scotland" (Edinburgh, 1828; 8vo, two vols.).

J. Pinkerton: "Select Scottish Ballads" (London, 1783; sm. 8vo, two vols.).

J. Gilchrist: "A Collection of Ancient and Modern Scottish Ballads, Tales, and Songs" (Edinburgh, 1815; 12mo, two vols.).

Sir Walter Scott: "Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border" (Edinburgh, 1810; 8vo, three vols.; fourth edition).

James Hardiman: "Irish Minstrelsy, or Bardic Remains of Ireland" (London, 1831; 8vo, two vols.).

T. Crofton Croker: "The Popular Songs of Ireland" (London, 1839; 8vo).

Charlotte Brooke: "Reliques of Irish Poetry, translated into English Verse, with Notes and the Originals in the Irish character" (Dublin, 1789; 4to).

Duncathail: "Street Ballads, Popular Poetry, and Household Songs of Ireland" (Dublin, 1865; 12mo; second edition).

Thomas Evans: "Old Ballads, Historical and Narrative" (London, 1777; 8vo, four vols.); a new edition by R. H. Evans (London, 1810; 8vo, four vols.).

Robert Bell: "Early Ballads" (London, 1856; 12mo).

John Bell: "Rhymes of Northern Bards; being a Collection of Old and New Songs and Poems peculiar to the Counties of Newcastle-upon Tyne, Northumberland, and Durham" (Newcastle-upon-Tyne, 1812). Similar publications by G. Henderson and J. Harland, have been already mentioned in this essay.

J. H. Dixon: "Ancient Poems, Ballads, and Songs of the Peasantry of England" (London, 1846; 8vo).

J. Payne Collier: "Book of Roxburghe Ballads" (London, 1847; sm. 4to).

The collections of ancient popular poetry by Thomas Percy, Joseph Ritson, &c.

J. O. Halliwell: "The Nursery Rhymes of England" (London, 1853; 8vo; sixth edition). Nursery rhymes, with the tunes to which they are still sung in the nurseries of England, have been published by E. F. Rimbault and others.

G. P. Morris: "American Melodies; containing a Single Selection from the Productions of Two Hundred Writers" (Philadelphia, 1840; 12mo). The title of this book is rather misleading: the musical inquirer must not expect to find any tunes in notation; the book contains only the poetry of the most popular songs in the United States at the beginning of the present century.

Frank Moore: "Rebel Rhymes and Rhapsodies, collected and edited" (New York, 1864; 12mo).

A remark of a foreigner touching upon the vagueness with which English musicians use certain terms relating to their art ought perhaps not to be offered without an apology, since a foreigner is not likely to understand the English language so well as an English musician. But a modest suggestion may perhaps be pardonable. Howbeit, it seems strange that English musicians do not make a distinction between the designation of song and ballad, but use the terms indiscriminately. At all events, many so-called ballads in English music-books are not ballads artistically speaking, but are lyric songs of the kind which the Germans call Lied. A ballad is an epic poem with or without music; and thus is the term used by Jamieson, Ritson, and other scientific men, in their publications of popular poetry in the English language. It is not so unimportant as it may appear at a first glance that musicians also should clearly discern between the terms which they employ in their art.

Dance-Tunes.

The instrumental tunes of national dances are frequently derived from the airs of songs. In fact, among uncivilised nations the music to which dances are performed consists very often of songs, the rhythmical effect of which is enhanced by the loud steps of the dancers, by clapping of hands, or by the employment of some instrument of percussion, as castanets, drums, &c. The tunes of national dances which have been published in European countries are mostly arranged for the pianoforte. However, as many of the collections of national songs before mentioned contain also dance-tunes, it is hardly necessary here to give a long list of the separate collections which have appeared in print. Most of them have been compiled with too little regard to the preservation of the original characteristics of the music to be of essential use for study.

Some insight into the variety of national dances may be obtained by an examination of a publication entitled "Volkstänze aller Nationen der Erde," edited by Louis Köhler (Brunswick: Meyer and Litolff; folio), which contains 120 dance-tunes arranged for the pianoforte. The publication has rather an assumptious title, professing to comprise popular dance-tunes of all nations. This is not the place to enumerate all the dances in the world known to be in popular use; most readers, did they see a list of the names of the dances, would probably be surprised at the great number of them, each designating a particular dance having its own music. Alfred Waldau, in his little book entitled "Böhmische Nationaltänze; Culturstudie" (Prague: H. Dominikus, 1859; 12mo) describes about fifty different dances of the villagers in Bohemia. It would appear that the Bohemians are extraordinarily fond of dancing; at any rate, an equal number of dances has hitherto not been collected in France, Spain, Mexico, or in some other countries where the people are notoriously much addicted to dancing. No doubt several of the specimens enumerated by A. Waldau among the popular ones of Bohemia were imported into that country, and therefore cannot be strictly regarded as national dances of the Bohemians. Indeed, it is often more difficult to trace the original home of a dance-tune than of the air of a national song; the former, being instrumental and unfettered by words, is more easily transferred from one country to another and more readily adopted by different nations.

In England, about three centuries ago, we find several dances in popular use which were derived from the Continent. It hardly admits of a doubt that their continental tunes were imported with them; though afterwards other tunes more or less similar to the original ones were substituted by English musicians. The old collection of dance-tunes, the first edition of which was published in London about the middle of the seventeenth century, under the title of "The English Dancing Master," contains specimens of such dances of foreign origin. The work, having gone through many editions with enlargements, comprised, about the year 1720, three volumes oblong 8vo, and its title was altered into "The Compleat Country Dancing Master." Several other curious collections appeared in London during the eighteenth century; of these, by way of example, may be noticed:—

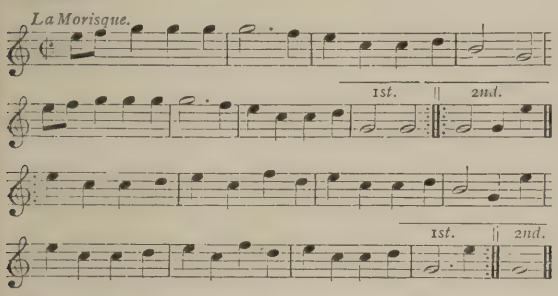
"The Newest Minuets, Rigadoons, and French Dances for the year 1721, perform'd at Court and Publick Entertainmts; composed by Mr. Murphy. To which is added the Ball Dances perform'd at Schools; the tunes proper for the Violin, Hoboy, or Flute" (London; oblong 8vo). The work contains, besides tunes of Murphy's composition, several popular ones,

"Minuets with the Basses for His Majesty's Birth Day, as they were perform'd at the Ball at Court; the tunes proper for the Violin, German Flute, or Harpsichord" (London: T. Walsh, 1738; oblong 8vo).

"Twenty-four Country-Dances for the year 1787; with proper tunes and directions to each dance, as they are performed at Court, Bath, and all Public Amusements" (London: J. Preston; oblong 8vo).

"A Collection of New Minuets for the year 1788; perform'd at Court, Bath, and all Publick Assemblys; set for the Harpsichord, Violin, German Flute or Hautboy. London: printed for Samuel, Ann, and Peter Thompson, No. 75, St. Paul's Church Yard; where may be had: Thompson's Compleat Collection of 800 favourite Country Dances, in 4 vols.; Thompson's Compleat Collection of 400 favourite Minuets for the Harpsichord, in 4 vols.; Thompson's Dances and Cotillons for the Harpsichord; Sandro's Cotillons dedicated to the Prince Royal; De Latre's Cotillons."

Suggestive examples of an early importation of foreign dances into Holland are to be found in a publication of Dutch dance-tunes, entitled: "Het derde musyck boexken begrepen ghetal van onser neder duytscher spraken, daer inne begrepen syn alder hande danserye, te vuetens Basse-dansen, Ronden, Allemaingien, Pauanen, end meer andere, mits oeck vyfthien nieuvue gaillarden, zeer lustich ende bequaem om spelen op alle musicale Instrumēte," by Tielman Susato (Antwerp, 1551; sm. 4to). As this publication is a hundred years older than the "English Dancing Master," it would even for this reason deserve particular attention, were it not on account of some curiosities which it contains. One of the tunes, headed La Morisque, is probably the oldest tune of the famous Morris-dance still extant. As it is interesting from having been printed in the year 1550, when most likely it was already an old tune, it shall be inserted here—not in its old notation of square-shaped notes with the C clef on the second line, and without any division of bars, but in our present usual notation, which is at a glance intelligible to modern musicians:—



Surely this tune does not appear very much as if it were above three hundred years old. If a pianoforte accompaniment were made to it in the Thalbergian manner, it might pass for a modern drawing-room piece; and the same remark applies to several others of the tunes in this old Dutch book. La Morisque, to judge from its name, was probably introduced into the Netherlands from France. It is a well-known fact that the Morris-dance, supposed to have been originally derived from the Moors in Spain, became during the later period of the Middle Ages diffused through many European countries. It is still occasionally performed in England; likewise in Alsace, where it is called Morisken; and especially in the island of Corsica, where it is called Moresca, and is danced by men in armour who represent a conflict between the Moors and the Christians. As regards the Basse-danssen, of which there are several tunes in the old Dutch book in question, it may suffice to know that this is the kind of dance in which the performers moved slowly about, scarcely raising their feet from the ground. It was rather an aristocratic dance, being especially in favour with the higher classes of society.

In Germany also there are some published collections of popular dance-tunes which date as far back as the sixteenth century. The circumstance of such tunes being printed in some of the instruction-books for playing the organ has given rise in modern time to the supposition that dance-tunes were played in the church. This appears, however, to be an erroneous notion, which may be dispelled by an examination of the old books. It was not unusual for gentlemen of some means to have a little organ in their house for playing secular music as well as for accompanying devotional songs. In the beginning of the sixteenth century the organ-builder Georg Voll, in Nürnberg, constructed small organs for domestic use and portable organs of the kind which were called Regals. He even made them in a case having the shape of a book: such a little instrument, in outward appearance not unlike a large German bible, was called Bibelregal. If the reader visited the Exhibition of Ancient Musical Instruments which was held in the South Kensington Museum in the year 1872, he will perhaps remember the Bibelregal, about three hundred years old, which was lent to the Exhibition by an English gentleman, in whose possession it is. A German book on organ-playing, entitled "Orgel oder Instrument Tabulatur," by E. N. Ammerbach (Leipzig, 1571; sm. 4to), contains, besides sacred pieces, a number of popular dance-tunes. This work I have not seen; but C. F. Becker, in his "Hausmusik in Deutschland" ("Music in the House in Germany," Leipzig, 1840; 4to), describes it circumstantially, and notices especially a fine wood-engraving, facing the title-page, which represents the master of the house and his wife with their guests seated at a long table at the far end of the room; servants, headed by a major-domo, are bringing in wine and various dishes; to the left in the foreground is the orchestra, consisting of players on flutes, cornets, and trombones, who are accompanying a chorus of singers; and to the right is an organ, played by a gentleman who carries a long sword at his side, and whose head is ornamented with a handsome baret. The organ has three registers: and a boy standing behind the table is engaged in blowing the little bellows.

Another German book of that period containing dance-tunes is by Bernhard Schmid, an organist of Strassburg, and bears the title "Zwey Bücher einer Neuen Kunstlichen Tabulatur auff Orgel vnd Instrument," &c (Strassburg, 1577; folio). The dances of which the tunes are given in this publication are most of them German, and others are of foreign origin. Like those given by Ammerbach, the German dances are in $\frac{4}{4}$ time, each of them having appended to it a so-called Proportio, which is in $\frac{3}{4}$ time. In Bernhard Schmid's book the designation Proportio is corrupted into Proportz, and is also called Hopeldantz, Hupfauff, &c.—names which indicate that it was performed with a hopping step; and it appears probable that the present German dance called Hopser derived its name from the same circumstance. Moreover Bernhard Schmid calls the Proportio also Saltarello and Nachdantz; the former name is Italian, and the latter, which is German, signifies an appended dance.

THE GREAT COMPOSERS, SKETCHED BY THEMSELVES.

By Joseph Bennett.

No. IV.—BEETHOVEN (continued from page 538).

Having investigated, by the light of his letters, the most important of Beethoven's family relationships, I now ask my readers to look, with the same help, into the master's home and see what went on there. No mere feeling of curiosity prompts this course, because it is in the privacy of a great man that we find the best indications of his real character, and, mayhap, some of the most powerful of the influences that dictate his public action. Happily for my purpose Beethoven was never in the habit of concealing his domestic circumstances from friends, nor even of reserving them for confidential chat. His impetuous nature set discretion at nought, and could not brook delay; so, when any matter troubled him at home, the composer rushed to his desk and informed some one or other of all the circumstances in due course of post. A certain Herr Zmeskall was Beethoven's special confidant. Zmeskall appears to have acted the part of jackal to the great musical lion with pleasure to himself and satisfaction to Beethoven, who was given to joke with him in a manner half contemptuous, half affectionate. He mended the master's pens, addressed his letters, assisted to procure servants, and made himself generally useful, while, in return, Beethoven styled his friend "Confounded little quondam musical Count," "Most high-born of men," "Most worthy Counsellor, owner of mines and lord of fastnesses in Burgundy and Buda," and so on as fancy suggested. It was to this gentleman that the first letter making any reference of interest to Beethoven's domestic circumstances was written. From it we gather that the composer, then living in the house of the Countess Erdödy, had dismissed his servant, and that the man complained of bad treatment, not, there is reason to believe, without good cause. Hearing of the circumstance, Beethoven wrote, "It is just what I expected. As to the blows, that is rather far-fetched. The story is at least three months old, and very different from what he now makes it out to be. The whole stupid affair was caused by a female huckster and a couple of low fellows. I lose very little. He, no doubt, was corrupted in the very house where I am now living!" A clue to the application of the last sentence appears in a subsequent note, from which we gather that the Countess had been paying the man extra to put up with his master's vagaries. Beethoven was hurt on finding this out, and wrote to Zmeskall: "I leave it entirely to you to do the best you can about my servant, only henceforth Countess Erdödy must not attempt to exercise the smallest influence over him. She says she made him a present of twenty-five florins, and gave him five florins a month solely to induce him to stay with me. I cannot refuse to believe this act of generosity, but I do not choose that it should be repeated." Anything more suggestive as regards Beethoven's temper and bearing at home than the Countess's share in this little episode cannot be imagined. Whether the servant was re-engaged or not the letters fail to show, but four years later we find the master and his friend again in correspondence on the same theme. Addressing Zmeskall as "gobbling Count! dinner Count! supper Count!" &c., Beethoven said, "Herzog is to see you to-day. He intends to take the post of my man-servant. You may agree to give him thirty florins, with his wife obbligata. Firing, light, and morning livery found. I must have some one who knows how to cook, for if my food continues as bad as it now is I shall always suffer." The situation being open, a man formerly in Zmeskall's employ applied for it, whereupon Beethoven wrote to his late master: "I do not recollect him, but he told me he had been with you, and that you had nothing to say against him, except that he did not dress your hair as you wished. I gave him earnest-money, although only a florin. Supposing you have no other fault to find with the man (and if so, I beg you will candidly mention it), I intend to engage him, for you know that it is no object with me to have my hair dressed: it would be more to the purpose if my finances could be dressed, or re-dressed." Several letters followed in connection with this servant business, but the full contents are not published; and we can only assume, Beethoven having given his old domestic a fortnight's notice, that the negociations with the new one were brought to a successful issue.

Two years later we find Beethoven again in trouble with his man. Something like a scrimmage had taken place between them, and the composer came out of it with his face scratched. Whereupon he wrote to Zmeskall: "I must repeat my request about another servant, as the conduct of my present one is such that I cannot possibly keep him. He was engaged on April 25, so on September 25 he will have been five months with me, and he received fifty florins on account. The money for his boots will be reckoned from the third month (in my service), and from that time at the rate of forty florins per annum; his livery also from the third month. From the very first I resolved not to keep him, but delayed discharging him, as I wished to get back the value of my florins. In the meantime, if I can procure another, I will let this one leave my service on the 15th of the month, and also give him twenty florins for boot-money, and five florins a month for livery (both reckoned from the third month), making altogether thirty-five florins. I ought therefore still to receive fifteen florins, but these I am willing to give up; in this way I shall at all events receive some equivalent for my fifty florins. If you can find a suitable person I will give him two florins a day while I am in Baden, and if he knows how to cook he can use my firewood in the kitchen (I have a kitchen, though I do not cook in it); if not, I will add a few kreutzers to his wages. As soon as I am settled in Vienna he shall have forty florins a month and board and livery as usual, reckoned from the third month in my service, like other servants. It would be a good thing if he understood a little tailoring. So now you have my proposals; and I beg for an answer by the 10th at the latest, that I might discharge my present servant on the 2nd with the usual fortnight's warning, otherwise I shall be obliged to keep him for another month, and every moment I wish to get rid of him. As for the new one you know pretty well what I want—good steady conduct, a good character, and not to be of a bloodthirsty nature, that I may feel my life to be safe, as, for the sake of various scamps in this world, I should like to live a little longer." Zmeskall seems to have achieved the task assigned him, and supplied Beethoven with a man and wife; but hardly had three months elapsed before the master again wrote to his friend: "When you have a moment's leisure let me know the probable cost of a livery, without linen, but including hat and boots. Strange changes have come to pass in my house; the man is off to the devil, I am sorry to say, whereas his wife seems the more resolved to take root here." The upshot of this new revolution was that Beethoven tried to get on with two female servants, Baberl and Nany, one of whom may possibly have been the wife aforesaid. But the expedient answered for only a few days without fresh upsettings; and a general state of turmoil and discomfort set in, the nature of which can be gathered from a letter addressed to Frau von Streicher: "Your dear, kind daughter was with me yesterday, but I scarcely ever remember being so ill. My precious servants were occupied from seven o'clock till ten at night in trying to heat the stove. The bitter cold, particularly in my room, caused me a chill, and the whole of yesterday I could scarcely move a limb. . . . You are aware that, on the same day, I discharged Baberl. I cannot endure either of these vile creatures. I wonder if Nany will behave rather better from the departure of her colleague. I doubt it; but in that case I shall send her packing without ceremony. She is too uneducated for a housekeeper, indeed quite a beast; but the other, in spite of her pretty face, is even lower than the beasts. As the new year draws near, I think five florins will be enough for Nany. I have not paid her the charge for making her spencer, on account of her bad behaviour to you.

The other certainly deserves no new-year's gift, &c." Beethoven clung to the idea of sending Nany after Baberl, but meanwhile tried what a little assault and battery would do. Writing again to Frau von Streicher, he said: "I am rather better though to-day. I have been obliged to endure a great deal from Nany; but I shied half a dozen books at her head, by way of a new-year's gift. We have stripped off the leaves (by sending away Baberl) and lopped off the branches; but we must extirpate the roots, till nothing is left but the actual soil." It is satisfactory to know that Nany was open to the argument of the flying volumes, and, repenting of her misdeeds, clung to her place. But Beethoven reviled her as much as ever. She cooked his accounts, it seems, and actually ate white bread for breakfast. On these points the master is very precise to his fair friend: "Nany is not strictly honest, and an odiously stupid animal into the bargain. Such people must be managed not by love but by fear. I now see this clearly; her account-book alone cannot show you everything; you must often drop in unexpectedly at dinner-time, like an avenging angel, to see with your own eyes what we actually have. I never dine at home now, except when I have some friend as my guest, for I have no wish to pay as much for one person as would serve for four. . . . In addition to twelve kreutzers for bread, Nany has a roll of white bread every morning. Is this usual? And it is the same with the cook. A daily roll for breakfast comes to eighteen florins a year. . . . Mdlle. Nany is wonderfully changed for the better since I sent the half-dozen books at her head. Probably they chanced to come into collision with her dull brain, or her bad heart; at all events, she now plays the part of a penitent swindler!"

But Nany soon broke out again. Probably Frau von Streicher had a word with her anent the delinquencies set forth in Beethoven's letter. Be this as it may, the once "penitent swindler" proceeded to have more than a word with her master, and all was at sixes and sevens within this turbulent dwelling. "Nany yesterday," wrote the composer, "took me to task in the vulgar manner usual with people of her low class about my complaining to you, so she evidently knew that I had written to you on the subject. All the devilry began again yesterday morning, but I made short work of it by throwing the heavy armchair beside my bed at N.'s head, which procured me peace for the rest of the day. They always take their revenge on me when I write to you, or when they discover any communication between us." The writer then branches off to speak about Carl, but presently returns to his original theme: "As for the servants, there is only one voice about their immorality, to which all the other annoyances here may be ascribed." At length Beethoven could stand it no longer, and Nany went her way. Whereupon Beethoven wrote: "Judgment was executed to-day on the notorious criminal. She bore it nearly in the same spirit as Cæsar did the dagger of Brutus, except that in his case truth formed the basis, while in hers only wicked malice. The kitchenmaid seems more handy than the former ill-conducted beauty (Baberl), who no longer shows herself—a sign that she does not expect a good character from me, though I really had some thoughts of giving her one. The kitchenmaid at first made rather a wry face about carrying wood."

A little later and it would appear that Beethoven had no servants at all. At any rate we gather from the purport of a letter to Frau von Streicher that she had found the composer's house locked up. "You see what servants are!" exclaims Beethoven. "Such is housekeeping. So long as I am ill I would fain be on a different footing with those around me, for dearly as I usually love solitude, it is painful to me now, finding it scarcely possible, while taking baths and medicine, to employ myself as usual, to which is added the grievous prospect that I may perhaps never get better. . . . I will consider about engaging a housekeeper. If I could only have the faintest hope in this corrupt Austrian State of finding an honest person, the arrangement would be easily made; but—but!!!" Some weeks later (the year is 1817) we find Beethoven trying another manservant, with no better success; and he writes to *Z*meskall: "I am really in despair at being condemned by my defective hearing to pass the greater part of my life with this most odious class of people, and to be in some degree dependent on them." A month passes and the master makes the usual discovery that his man robs him. Then he loses all patience, and, under the influence of sickness and vexation, cries out in the spirit, if not in the language, of another illustrious character, "O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death!" Writing again to *Z*meskall he says: "As for myself I am often in despair, and almost tempted to put an end to my life, for all these remedies seem to have no end. May God have compassion on me, for I look on myself to be as good as lost. I have a great deal to say to you. That this servant is a thief I cannot doubt—he must be sent away; my health requires living at home and greater comfort. . . . I thank God that the thread of my life will soon be spun out." Nevertheless he asks in a postscript to have a quarter of a yard of green wax cloth sent him, complaining that he cannot get it from the green people of Nussdorf, where he is spending an autumn holiday. More trouble followed, and Beethoven poured it all into the sympathetic ear of Frau von Streicher. Only a part of a long letter on the servant question, written at this time, has been published, and in that we find the subjoined emphatic passage: "Now Heaven be praised! I have contrived to collect all these particulars for you with no little toil and trouble; and God grant that I may never, never more be obliged to speak, or write, or think again on such a subject, for mud and mire are not more pernicious to cultivated soil than such devilry to any man." This fervent prayer was not answered—in other words, Beethoven's suspicious and irritable nature was not changed. Frau von Streicher appears to have counselled him not to listen to the gossip talebearers, and the master replied: "It is now very evident that if you do not kindly superintend things for me, I, with my infirmities, must meet with the same fate as usual at the hands of these people. Their ingratitude towards you is what chiefly degrades both of them in my eyes. But I don't understand your allusion about gossip. On one occasion alone can I remember having forgotten myself for a moment, but with very different people. This is all I can say on the subject. For my part I neither encourage nor listen to the gossip of the lower orders. I have often given you hints on the subject without telling you a word of what I had heard. Away! away! away! with such things."

Save for an occasional reference to lodgings, which Beethoven changed as often as he did his servants, the letters are silent about domestic worries till 1823, when they break out once more on the old theme. In a note to Schindler we read: "Pray . . . inquire this afternoon, if possible, about the housekeeper in the Glockengasse. . . . She is a widow, understands cookery, and is willing to serve merely for board and lodging, to which, of course, I cannot consent, or only under certain conditions. My present one is too shameful." But at this time Beethoven had a double affair on his hands.

He had quarrelled with his landlord—by no means an infrequent occurrence—and the man wanted to get rid of him; if not by hook, then by crook—anyhow, in point of fact. The master, in turn, retaliated by abusing the house and calling for the police. A pretty state of things is revealed by the subjoined letter to Schindler: "The incessant insolence of my landlord from the hour I entered his door up to the present moment compels me to apply for aid to the police; so I beg you will do so for me at once. As to the double winter-windows, the housekeeper was desired to see about them, and especially to state if they were not necessary after such a violent storm, in case of the rain having penetrated into the room; but her report was that the rain had not come in, and, moreover, that it could not possibly do so. In accordance with her statement I locked the door to prevent this rude man entering my room during my absence (which he had threatened). Say also what his conduct to you was (Schindler lodged in the same house), and that he put up a placard of the lodgings being to let without giving me notice, which, besides, he has no right to do till St. James's Day. . . . I am charged, too, for lighting, of which I know nothing. This detestable lodging, without any open stove, and the principal flue truly abominable, has cost me (for extra outlay, exclusive of the rent) 259 florins, in order merely to keep me alive while I was there during the winter. It was a deliberate fraud, as I was never allowed to see the rooms on the first floor but only those on the second, that I might not become aware of their many drawbacks. I cannot understand how a flue so destructive to health can be tolerated by the Government. . . . My chief anxiety at present is that he may be ordered to take down his placard and to give me a receipt for the house-rent I have paid; but nothing will induce me to pay for the abominable lighting, without which it cost me enough actually to preserve my life in such a lodging. My eyes do not yet suffer me to encounter the town atmosphere, or I would myself apply to the police." Schindler, acting for the master, appears to have effected a compromise with the landlord, and was reprimanded by Beethoven for his pains, while directed to look out for another place. "How could you possibly accept such a proposal," exclaimed the irate composer, "from our churlish landlord, when accompanied by a threat? Where was your good sense? Where it always is."

In the summer of this year (1823), the year in which Beethoven began seriously to work at the Ninth Symphony, he occupied apartments placed at his disposal by Baron Pronay, in one of that gentleman's country seats. But they did not suit the impossible master; so, on the ground that the Baron offended him by bowing profoundly every time they met, he got away to his old quarters at Baden. Even there he was wretched, and, as usual, made a scapegoat of his domestics. "The miserable state of my digestive organs," he wrote to Carl, "can only be cured by medicines and diet, and for this I have to thank my faithful servants." One of these unfortunates was an old woman named Schnaps, who first appears in the letters as "My fast-sailing frigate, the worthy and well-born Frau Schnaps," but later on, as we shall see, acquired various designations somewhat less complimentary. Frau Schnaps accompanied Beethoven to Baden in the autumn of 1824, and was in the habit of going into Vienna as her master's business required. On one occasion she did not return at the time appointed, whereupon Beethoven flew in a passion and abused her to Carl: "I merely wish to let you know that the old woman is not yet returned, why, I cannot tell. . . . It is really so distressing to me to depend on such people, that if life did not possess higher charms it would be utterly insupportable in my eyes. . . . Two days ago the old woman told me that she wished to end her days in an almshouse. Perhaps she will not return to me; so be it, in God's name! She will always be a wicked old woman." Frau Schnaps however reappeared the next day, bringing an old bell-pull from the master's former lodgings, which he suspected her of having an interest in keeping out of his possession. Carl was duly apprised of her advent, but Beethoven had not the grace to express any regret for his unjust suspicions of the old lady's honesty in this particular matter. Soon after the "fast-sailing frigate" drove before the wind a second time, and Beethoven wrote again to his nephew: "The creature went off yesterday and has not returned; we shall see how this turns out. The old beast was determined to be off, being like a restless wild animal devoid of purpose or reason. May heaven have pity on me! The new cooking began yesterday!" But the new cook was not long to stay, and the frigate returned to her old anchorage: "The maid came indeed," writes Beethoven, "but is not to remain; in the meantime I have spoken pretty plainly to the old woman, so far as it is possible to speak to such people. But let us say no more of all this bedevilment." Soon after he urges Carl: "Do all you possibly can to rid me of that old demon," and ends the letter by apparently enumerating the personages forming his ménage: "The old witch, and Satan, and I." Presently came a change for the better in Frau Schnaps: "Now as to my domestic rabble," writes the master, "yesterday the kitchenmaid was off again and got a fresh place; the cause is difficult to discover from my old witch, who is now once more all smiles, and no longer persists in declaring she has incurred loss from the weekly bills. What do you think of that?" But fair weather did not last long, and the master had to say, "Here comes Satanas. To-day her raging fury and madness have somewhat subsided, but if she applies to you refer her to me the day after to-morrow. During the whole week I was forced to submit and to suffer like a saint. Avaunt! such dregs of the people! What a reproach to our civilisation to stand in need of a class like this, and to have those whom we despise, so constantly near us." Again, still addressing Carl, he says: "The old goose is the bearer of this. . . . She is going to-day to Katel, so she will have very little time for her stupid blundering. May the Lord one day deliver me from her, Libera me, Domine, de illis, &c." Soon after there are signs of approaching deliverance by the master's own act: "It is impossible to permit this any longer; no soup to-day, no beef, no eggs, and at last broiled meat from the inn. When Holz was with me lately there was really almost nothing to eat at supper; and such is the woman's bold and insolent behaviour, that I have told her to-day I will not suffer her to remain beyond the end of the month. . . . Little as I require what nourishes the body, as you know, still the present state of things is really too bad, besides being every moment in danger of being poisoned." The end hastened on: "We must have done with this evil old creature. I have scarcely enough to eat, and am forced also to endure the sauciness and insolence of this most malicious old witch, and with such wages too! I think I must ask my pseudo-brother to come, and would be glad to engage again the woman from Winter's in the Kothgasse, who at least knew how to cook." At last the end came, and the final glimpse the letters afford us reveals the extraordinary spectacle of a domestic interregnum with a mechanic as makeshift. Writing from Baden in October, 1825 (seventeen months before his death), Beethoven said: "I mean to come in to-morrow with the joiner and to send off these old hags; they are too bad for anything.

Until the other housekeeper arrives I can make use of the joiner."

Were it not my plan to let these letters speak for themselves, what a homily might now be written upon the foregoing! But there is no need. My reader has said to himself already, "And this poor creature—this restless, moody, suspicious man—this thrower of books and chairs at women's heads—this fluent professor of Billingsgate was the mighty Beethoven, the great poet, the gifted immortal whose thoughts were too deep for words!" My reader has not less certainly laid to heart the lesson :—

How poor, how rich, how abject, how august,
How complicate, how wonderful, is man!
How passing wonder He who made him such!
Who centred in our make such strange extremes!
From different natures marvellously mixed,
Connection exquisite of distant worlds!
Distinguished link in being's endless chain!
Midway from nothing to the Deity!
A beam ethereal, sullied and absorpt!
Though sullied and dishonour'd, still divine!
Dim miniature of greatness absolute!
An heir of glory! a frail child of dust!
Helpless immortal! insect infinite!
A worm! a God!

PRODUCTION OF GOUNOD'S "POLYEUCTE."

After so many postponements that the Parisians became weary of waiting, M. Gounod's "Polyeucte" was produced at the Nouvelle-Opéra, on Monday, the 7th ult. The splendour of its representation more than atoned for delay. M. Halanzier knew perfectly well what he was about, and would not be turned aside by any measure of remonstrance or ridicule. He had to make the presentation of the first new work at the Grand-Opéra a magnificent success, and so long as the preparations were not complete—in fact, while anything whatever remained to be done—the public and the press were allowed to clamour unheeded at the gates. At last everything was ready, as Marshal Lebœuf said of the unhappy French army in 1870, "down to the smallest strap and buckle;" and only then, when the closing days of the Exposition had arrived and the season had well nigh flitted away, was "Polyeucte" brought forth. Let us, before noticing the performance, look at the manner in which the Opera itself was got ready, and draw, as we inevitably must, an unpleasant, though perhaps wholesome, contrast with what takes place in the same way nearer home.

As far back as 1869 the libretto of "Polyeucte" was finished by MM. Barbier and Carré, the subject being taken, as everybody knows, from Corneille's tragedy. In 1870 or 1871 M. Gounod came to England, and the composition of the music occupied much of his time during a prolonged residence amongst us. How, when completed, the MS. score was detained here and did not accompany its distinguished author back to France; how, despairing of again possessing it, M. Gounod set bravely to work and rewrote the whole from memory, and how the original MS. at length was restored to him—all these incidents are familiar and need not be recounted in detail. Nor need we dwell upon such a matter of recent history as the difficulty which arose between M. Halanzier and the publishers of the Opera, nor upon the little dispute which, later still, sprang up between the same eminent impresario and M. Gounod himself. Enough that in October, 1877, the score of "Polyeucte" was handed over to M. Halanzier, and the work of preparation began which ended exactly a year after. First of all it was necessary to determine the principal artists, both of "creation" and partage. This task, in virtue of right and custom, fell to M. Gounod, who easily obtained Mdlle. Krauss and M. Salomon for the leading characters. In other cases difficulties arose. Thus, M. Lassalle could not, at first, be reconciled to the part of Sévère. The Roman general is deeply in love, and his feelings overcome his manliness. So M. Lassalle, a big person, went to M. Gounod, saying, "Master, I cannot weep. Look at me; is it possible for a fellow of my size to cry decently on the stage?" But his objections were not proof against the argument of an additional romance: in course of time all other susceptibilities were allayed, and the cast definitely made. Then came the copying of the parts, which alone cost between 6,000 and 7,000 francs; and next the important matter of the scenic arrangements. The Opera is in five acts, whereof each was given into separate hands—M. Daran (Act 1), M. Cheret (Act 2), MM. Rubé and Chapron (Act 3), MM. Carpegas and Lavastre, sen. (Act 4), M. Lavastre, jun. (Act 5). These gentlemen made a sketch for each of the tableaux intrusted to them, and submitted it to the authorities of the house—subsequently, on its being accepted, building up the "set" in miniature, for examination by the machinist, who had to determine its practicability for working. The miniature, or maquette, having passed, the artist set to work upon the scene itself—no small labour in the case of such elaborate and gigantic pictures as the exigences of the stage and the Opera required. While M. Daran and his colleagues were thus busy, the designer of the costumes, M. Lacoste, had an equally important and responsible task on hand. Given carte blanche by his director, this gentleman spared neither trouble nor expense; and his expenditure of both may be imagined when it is stated that no fewer than 123 different costumes, all as correct as research could make them, were provided. Some of these were, of course, multiplied; and altogether over 1,000 complete dresses entered the wardrobe of the theatre for use in "Polyeucte" alone. The pains taken with the costumes were immense. M. Lacoste made a water-colour drawing of each, showing every shade of colour and every detail of ornamentation; while great care was used to adapt the dress to the figure, &c., of the wearer, and to secure harmony of tone among those which would necessarily be placed in juxtaposition during the performance.

Scenery and dresses having been provided, the mise-en-scène in all its multifarious parts demanded attention. Nearly 8,000 francs were spent in "properties" alone, and 270 figurants, male and female, were for months drilled in the groupings and action which had been determined on. Not human beings only were thus trained. The four white horses selected to draw the triumphal car of Sévère had equally to study their parts, having first been sent up to the level of the stage by means of a lift. The special rehearsals in each department were most elaborate and painstaking. Those of the principal artists, under M. Salomon, were extremely numerous, every point being made familiar before the general rehearsals began; so with the hundred chorus-singers, who were first exercised in reading their music, the time adopted being as slow again as that indicated by the composer. Then the serious studies commenced, taking place twice a week, in the chorus-room at the outset, finally on the stage, in order to learn the action, entries, exits, and so on. Even more care was bestowed upon the orchestra. Beginning by simply reading their music without attention to anything but the mere notes, the instrumentalists passed to a methodical study of each number. This done, a grand rehearsal was given in presence of all the artists and chorus, followed by another in which the solos and concerted pieces were sung with the band. Then, every person being perfect in his or her work, came the répétitions générales, with scenery, dresses, &c. Of these there were eight, the last taking place on October 3, when the arduous labours of a year ended, and "Polyeucte" was pronounced ready for the public. Surely such careful preparations deserved to be crowned with success. This is the true artistic spirit, and supplies us with one reason why Opera belongs to France, and remains only in furnished lodgings—shabbily furnished at the best—among ourselves.

The première of M. Gounod's Opera was one of the greatest events of a Parisian summer fertile in such things. For months it had been anticipated with eagerness, and as reports spread about concerning the grandeur of the music and the magnificence of the mise-en-scène, a desire to be present became the rage. Weeks before the doors were opened not a place was available for love or money, and when the curtain rose such an audience filled the house as only Paris can bring together on special occasions. Foreigners who had travelled hundreds of miles for the express purpose attended in large numbers; the rest was the élite of all that goes to make up French social, literary, and artistic eminence. M. Gounod might well have been proud of the compliment paid to his genius—one he scarcely anticipated seven years ago, when the theatre was an army hospital, Paris a ruin, and the composer an exile. The Opera was cast as follows: Pauline, Mdlle. Krauss; Polyeucte, M. Salomon; Sévère, M. Lassalle; Siméon, M. Bataille; Félix, M. Beradi; Le Grand-Prêtre, M. Menu; Sextus, M. Bosquin; Néarque, M. Auguez; Stratonice, Madame Calderon. It may be as well to add that the chief parts were under-studied—Pauline by Mdlle. de Reszke, Polyeucte by M. Sellier, and Siméon by M. Boudouresque. For some time after the performance began the audience remained apparently unmoved. The severe dignity of the music was perhaps a surprise to most, not of the most welcome character. But as the Opera developed itself an entire change took place. The strength of the story, the exalted nature of its treatment by M. Gounod, and the magnificence of the stage-pictures revealed to all present that they were assisting at the début of a great work, intended to fill a place in French Opera analogous to that of Corneille's tragedy among its kind, conceived in the same lofty spirit, and wrought out with the same uncompromising fidelity to artistic principles. Thenceforward the success of the representation was assured. The audience set no bounds to their applause. They were delighted with the scenic effects, as well they might; charmed with the Pagan ballet, satisfied with the artists, and—though the drama and its musical illustration may have been hardly to the taste of lovers of lighter fare—content to accept both as splendid additions to French art. All concerned in the representation worked with a will, and too much praise cannot be given to the ease and smoothness with which the complicated theatrical machine was made to work. Mdlle. Krauss distinguished herself highly. She is a thorough artist, and rose to the height of the great occasion as only a thorough artist can, singing and acting with unsparing devotion to her task. M. Salomon equally well justified M. Gounod's choice, nor were the other performers less deserving in their several degrees. The whole representation, indeed, was a triumph in keeping with the grand traditions of the establishment, and a fitting crown to M. Halanzier's unsparing labours. "Polyeucte" has since been given thrice a week to crowded houses, and a long time must elapse ere even curiosity about it can be completely satisfied.

A visitor to Llandaff Cathedral at the present time would, if he attended public worship, hear a regular Cathedral service properly and decently performed by a competent choir and an accomplished organist, and would probably come away from the sacred fane imagining that he had been listening to something which was but the continuance in regular succession of the tradition and practice of centuries. Such a supposition would however be fallacious, for the musical services in Llandaff Cathedral date back but a very few years. The present Bishop of the diocese, Dr. Ollivant, was installed in Llandaff Cathedral in March, 1850, at which time the services were conducted in a very unpretentious and discreditable manner. A special correspondent of the Bristol Times, having paid a visit to the cathedral on a Sunday in December, 1849, thus recorded his experiences:—

> The service was held in the Lady Chapel, at the eastern end of the cathedral. A small chantry at the south side is used as a vestry-room, and here, behind a screen, the minister was robing himself, while the verger, sub-sacristan, mace-bearer, and clerk, all concentrated in a single functionary, was slowly pacing up and down waiting the canonical wardrobe being completed. Half-a-dozen persons were in their seats, independent of a crowd of little girls belonging to the parochial schools, who nestled round the altar-rails, and about an equal number of boys at the opposite side, who clung to a man, who, in turn clung to a violoncello. Of a choral service I cannot find even a record, and the verger told me, after prayers, that there were some old people in the "city" who recollected having seen a few broken pipes of an organ that once existed, and which was lost in the days when the well-known Richard Walton held the see. The service at the ancient minster at Llandaff was primitive indeed for a parish-church. One by one the congregation dropped in, until there were about thirty adults present. When the clergyman had finished his toilette, the clerk, sub-sacristan, verger, mace-bearer took up his mace, and, although he and the clergyman had been previously laughing and talking, put on a solemn face, and the old grey-headed clerk walked solemnly before a still more grey-headed clergyman up the aisle, and then grounding his silver wand he sank the sub-sacristan, verger, and mace-bearer into the reading desk, assuming the character of the parish-clerk.

The truthfulness of the foregoing account has been vouched for by a recent writer, who says:—

> I can bear testimony to the accuracy of the description. The violoncello was then screwed up and a little boy usually carried pieces of paper from the clergyman to the violoncellist with the number of the hymn and the tune to be played, the melody of which was ground out of the violoncello with all the dignity that an aged man, with somewhat trembling fingers and an unhappy tendency to let the bow slip up and down the strings, could impart. It seems now almost impossible to realise what must have been the effect upon those present, when the only instrument to give expression to the choral portions of the church service—now rendered in harmony at our village churches with precision and effect—was a violoncello.

It is pleasant to note the vast change and improvement which has come over the Llandaff Cathedral services since 1849; and we cannot but think that great progress has taken place in the musical services of our churches throughout the length and breadth of the land, but that there are still some dark spots, which mar the cheerful prospect, is undeniable, as the following extract from the Building News of the 23rd of August last will show:—

> By a drive the excursionists hastily reached the small and not very interesting church of All Saints, Burstwick, where the vicar had kindly arranged a little sort of reception, as the ready sexton performed a selection on the barrel-organ while the visitors walked up the nave.

The italics are ours, and we can only regret that the programme of the selected pieces was not given in full by the correspondent of the Building News who thus gravely records, without any expression of astonishment, the musical manner of receiving a distinguished and learned Archæological Society in one of our English parish-churches in this year of grace. O tempora! O mores!

We much regret that we cannot transfer to our pages a verbatim report of the excellent speech delivered by Professor Macfarren, Principal of the Royal Academy of Music, to the students of the Institution on their reassembling after the summer vacation. Such sound advice from one whose life has so perfectly illustrated the maxims he enforces is extremely valuable, not only because it eloquently sets forth the absolute necessity of hard and earnest work, but because it tends to show the young pupil that he is not a real artist who strives after anything short of a solid and enduring fame. "The smallest of the provinces of music," said the Professor, "was to amuse. When they looked into musical history, see what men had been and what they had done, and think of themselves as being the representatives, the medium through which the productions of the great masters were to permeate to the world, they must think that it was a very solemn responsibility they assumed; that they bore in their talent, and in the application of it, the reputation of Handel, of Beethoven, of Mozart." In dwelling upon the importance of literary study, he said, "He was happy to believe that the time was no more when persons of their calling were little regarded for their social qualities, and when their art itself was despised by persons in the wealthier classes of society." When the Sterndale Bennett Scholarship was initiated in the Academy it was made compulsory that candidates should pass a preliminary literary examination; and although perhaps there is always a danger that some few gifted young musicians may be prevented from competing by the necessity of submitting themselves to such an ordeal, we cannot but believe that the law thus stringently enforced must eventually be productive of more good than harm to the art.

The announcement that the sum collected in aid of the Charity at the recent Worcester Musical Festival amounts to £1,504 12s. 4d. will be hailed as a gratifying proof that the restoration of these meetings in a city where opposition to their continuance at one time appeared almost too formidable to be combated has caused a widely spread feeling of satisfaction. But financial success is not all that we require; and in the interest of music we cannot take leave of the subject without expressing an earnest hope that in 1881 the Dean and Chapter may see the absolute necessity not only of raising the orchestra so that the executants may be heard to the greatest advantage, but of placing it in its former position against the west window. As we have already said in these columns, we sufficiently respect the feelings of the custodians of the Cathedral to admit that a more purely religious tone is given to the Festival by having on the opening morning and the closing evening a free Choral Service; but if Oratorios are to be performed at all, they should be performed in the best possible manner; and we are convinced that, even from a clerical point of view, it is a mistake to suppose that by beginning and ending such performances with prayer they can be invested with the character of services. The expressions of discontent from all the artists at the new arrangement of the orchestra may not have reached the ears of the Dean and Chapter, but the defect in the transmission of sound from the choral and instrumental body can scarcely have escaped their attention; and as so much has been willingly conceded to the clerical authorities in the cause of religion, let us trust that on a future occasion a few important reforms may be yielded to the musical authorities in the cause of art.

With every desire to do full justice to the ingenuity of Mr. J. Dyson, the inventor of "The Chromatic Music Stave, or Key-board System of Notation," an explanation of which has been recently forwarded to us, we cannot conscientiously say that we see sufficient advantage in it to counterbalance the necessity of reprinting all the existing music. Of course we are aware that the same objection would apply to any new notation; but if we are to have a reform, let us not patch up our defective system, but, taking Nature to guide us, adopt a method by which music shall be written as we hear it. Mr. Dyson's proposed plan is that of arranging lines in groups of two and three alternately, the lines representing the chromatic notes of the scale of C natural and the spaces the diatonic notes. A dash slanting up to the head of a note shows that is sharpened, and slanting down to the head, that it is flattened, two dashes indicating a double sharp or flat note, and a horizontal dash a naturalised note. This is, of course, perpetuating the feeling of the scale of C being natural, and all others departures from it; an idea utterly at variance with truth, and one which, were it not for our present notation and the key-boards of our pianofortes, organs, and harmoniums, would never enter the mind of a musician. The fact of our notation being recognised throughout the civilised world is the strongest argument in its favour; and although, seeing the innumerable plans daily put forward to replace it, we are not prepared to guarantee it a long life, we hope that should it ever be supplanted, it will be by a system built up logically from a study of modern facts rather than of ancient fancies.

An article in the Builder of the 5th ult., headed "The Pianoforte artistically considered," draws attention to a subject of much interest not only to pianoforte manufacturers, but to the general public. The author truly says: "It is surprising that in regard to one article of furniture which is usually the most prominent and largest in a modern drawing-room, and is certainly the most distinctly artistic and the least utilitarian in its associations, there should still be not an effort made systematically to provide it with an outer shell such as a man or woman of refined taste can at least find suitable and unobjectionable." Why this is, seems on the whole very ably accounted for in the paper referred to. The "regulation type" being once established, it was deemed quite sufficient to say in the price-list that the case was rosewood, mahogany, or walnutwood, without bestowing a thought upon that beauty of design so necessary to fit it for its legitimate place in an elegantly furnished room. We have not space to enumerate the many suggestions set forth for improvements both in the form and ornamental designs of pianoforte cases; but we quite agree with our author that many valuable hints may be obtained from the old spinets and harpsichords in the South Kensington Museum. There can be no possible reason why a pianoforte should be the ugliest piece of furniture in the room; and we are by no means inclined to accept the apology for its appearance once made in our hearing, that it is no doubt a hideous thing to look at, but then "everybody knows what it is."

The critic of the Worcester Herald, to whose notice of the original performance of "Elijah" we drew attention in our last number, has ventured upon an "explanation." It appears that when he wrote that Mr. Weiss was the "first interpreter" of the music of the Prophet he did not at all mean literally the "first interpreter," who was, as we said, Herr Staudigl. Curiously enough, too, although he gave a list of those who sang the part of Elijah (in which by the way Herr Staudigl's name was altogether omitted) he incidentally, it seems, mentioned also the tenor; for he tells us that, instead of Mr. Weiss being "succeeded" by Mr. Lockey, it should have been that he was "supported" by him; and all this, it appears, we might have known had we not been so "obtuse." It is very possible that when in this explanatory paragraph he speaks of "the late Mr. Lockey," the readers of the Worcester Herald, more accustomed than ourselves to the writer's style, may know perfectly well that he does not mean what he says; but we are "obtuse" enough to accept the conventional interpretation of his words, and have much pleasure therefore in telling him that the artist alluded to is not only living, but, when we heard from him a day or two since, in the enjoyment of excellent health.

NORFOLK AND NORWICH MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(By our Special Correspondent.)

Contrary to what was at one time almost general expectation, there has been another, and nineteenth, holding of the Norfolk and Norwich Musical Festival. Years have passed since the tide turned against this institution, and it ceased to make way. But men cannot be expected, especially in a matter not concerning their own personal interests, to go on for ever labouring under the "cold shade" of non-success. It is not in human nature so to do, and the wonder is, looking at the meagre results achieved time after time, that the managers did not long ago throw up their hands and have done with the whole business. This was very nearly the case after the Festival of 1875. The special effort then made to break the spell of failure came to naught, a miserable £150 remaining as the reward of so much labour and risk. The managers seriously asked one another at that time, "What is the good of continuing?" and none could give an answer. But some did not lose hope. Fresh blood was infused into the directing body and another trial determined on, which, I am sorry to say, has ended much like the rest, and left the future of the triennial gathering as dark as before. What is the cause of this discouraging state of things? For myself, I believe it to arise out of a complication of circumstances. In the first place, the Norfolk public do not appear to have much musical taste or culture, and most assuredly they possess no musical curiosity. Programmes made to please them must contain either that which is well known amongst good things, or plenty of that which is trivial. Under these circumstances they may be attracted, but under no other. As a natural result, the Festivals possess little interest for musical strangers, who stay away and leave them to be supported by the locality. This, in turn, makes the institution poor; the best talent cannot be engaged—I do not mean that of soloists alone—and so the whole thing revolves in a vicious circle. And the worst of it is that nobody knows exactly what to do by way of improvement. The local public cannot become enthusiastic musicians all at once, and without very much larger and assured resources the managers dare not try to give the Festival a national importance. Matters are at a dead lock, therefore, and the chances, if they incline either way, favour putting an end to embarrassment by discontinuing the celebration. This, however, would be a thousand pities. We have not so many Festivals in England that we can afford to lose one; and the particular one in question has a history so distinguished, that its extinction would be like destroying a monument of past glory. Besides, even if the Festival does no more than pay its expenses, leaving nothing for the charities, it is surely worth keeping up on its own account. Music, though it may fittingly be made a means to an end, is an end in itself. Let the managers bethink themselves of this fact ere they resolve to throw away one good because they cannot, through its agency, grasp another.

The arrangements for the Festival, which began on the 15th and ended on the 18th ult., were conceived and carried out with strict regard to the circumstances dwelt upon above. Save for two compositions by Sir Julius Benedict—an overture and part of a concerto—and one or two small pieces by local composers, there was absolutely nothing new in the programme. Nor did the scheme comprise more than a single unfamiliar work of any pretensions, and that—Macfarren's "Joseph"—justified fears which the Committee disregarded, by drawing the poorest audience of the week. In genuine interest, therefore, the Festival was to real amateurs painfully deficient. Nor were its executive pretensions all that they might have been under more flourishing circumstances. The solo vocalists, it is true, included some first-class names, readily to be distinguished among the following group: Mesdames Albani, Catherine Penna, Anna Williams, Antoinette Sterling, and Trebelli; Messrs. E. Lloyd, H. J. Minns, W. Shakespeare, R. Hilton, and Santley. The orchestra, on the other hand, was too largely leavened by local talent; and the chorus, though deserving of much praise, as almost entirely representative of Norfolk and Norwich, could not compare with those which elsewhere are made up of selected voices from various parts of England. Sir Julius Benedict, as usual for many years past, acted as Conductor, and looking at all the circumstances attendant, it is not too much to say that the veteran musician did wonders in that capacity. His devotion to the work and his endurance of its fatigues were alike astonishing.

After Monday and the shining hours of Tuesday had been devoted to rehearsal the public work of the Festival began on Tuesday evening with a performance of "Acis and Galatea" and the "Spring" part of Haydn's "Seasons," of course in St. Andrew's Hall, the noble place of assembly which centuries ago the Black Friars built as a church. The interior of this edifice had been admirably arranged for the purpose, with side-galleries in the aisles coming forward to the pillars, another very large gallery under the west window, and a new and handsome orchestra filling what was once the chancel and stretching out into the nave. When fully occupied by a well-dressed audience and brilliantly lighted, the hall, thus fitted out, presented a most satisfactory appearance, though it must be confessed that, so strong is the force of association, even custom cannot rid the mind of a sense of incongruity between the old Gothic church and the doings within it. Giving the first concert on Tuesday evening was, I should state, a departure from the usual plan, which included a performance at cheap prices on Monday. The Committee felt it advisable to shorten the proceedings somewhat and secure more time for rehearsal. Hence the change. But it must not be supposed that the poorer amateurs of Norwich were deprived of their sole opportunity to share in Festival doings. Tuesday's concert was really one at half-price, and the attendance showed how widely the boon was appreciated. Hardly could a better selection of music have been made for such an audience. "Acis and Galatea" has not lost one jot of its popularity through lapse of time, while the charmingly fresh and melodious "Spring" of Haydn captivates the popular ear as much as ever. The Festival therefore began well. The music was at once excellent of its kind, and intelligible to its hearers, while the performance, taken for all in all, offered no ground on which to base serious complaints. Thus early, however, the usual chapter of Festival accidents began to unfold itself. Mr. Lloyd, who had been announced to take the part of Acis, could not appear in consequence of illness, and his place had to be filled by Mr. Shakespeare, Mr. Minns, of the Cathedral choir, coming forward as Damon, in lieu of the young Royal Academy tenor. It was creditable to both gentlemen that they were ready to meet the emergency; and, even if there had been much to find fault with in their singing, criticism would have forborne to say a word. The other artists were Miss Catherine Penna, who sang, "Hush, ye pretty warbling choir;" Miss Anna Williams, to whom fell the other soprano airs (the part of Galatea should not be divided thus); and Mr. Santley, the Polyphemus par excellence of our time. Mr. Santley drew down tremendous applause by his "O ruddier than the cherry," nor could his colleagues complain that their efforts failed to meet with sympathetic appreciation. The solos in "Spring" were taken by Miss Williams, who thus early made her mark, Mr. Shakespeare, and Mr. R. Hilton, a very useful bass. As regards the band and chorus, "it goes without saying" that, engaged upon music at once familiar and loved, they did well enough to satisfy reasonable expectations. The number present at this concert was 1,223 as against 1,258 at the cheap performance in 1875.

Great pains had been taken to secure a good audience for Professor Macfarren's "Joseph" on Wednesday morning. The Committee found that they had made a financial mistake in announcing it, and were naturally anxious to fill the hall, while the really musical among the friends of the Festival were quite as desirous that the reputation of Norwich should not suffer by showing indifference to an artistic work. Hence letters appeared in the local papers urging the public to attend, and it was rumoured that tickets were at the last given away in order that the hall might have a respectable appearance. But the Norwich people, though not insensible, perhaps, to the charms of free tickets (if such there were), would not be moved by eloquent printed appeals, and I am sorry to say that only 647 persons attended—the smallest audience of the week. A more discouraging circumstance could not, under actual conditions, have happened. It took all the heart out of the Committee, for it amounted to a solemn popular protest against doing anything likely to give the Festival more than local importance. With regard to Professor Macfarren's Oratorio I have nothing now to say. It has been sufficiently debated since its production at Leeds in 1877, and musicians everywhere have appraised merits which, if not entirely free from association with defects, are beyond question calculated to enhance the fame of the composer and establish his position as one of the leading masters of the age. "Joseph," I hardly need observe, is not an easy work. It exacts much from everybody engaged, and the greater credit is due, therefore, to Sir Julius Benedict's forces for the capital style in which they assailed and conquered its difficulties. The impersonal soprano and contralto parts were sustained by Madame Albani, Madame Antoinette Sterling, and Madame Trebelli; Miss Anna Williams taking that of Benjamin in the second section of the work. Mr. R. Hilton was Jacob; Mr. Lloyd Reuben and Pharaoh; and Mr. Santley, as a matter of course, assumed the character of Joseph, originally intended for him. With these arrangements none could fail to be satisfied, and the result met every expectation. An apology had been tendered for Madame Albani on the ground of hoarseness, and not, it was clear, without reason; but she exerted herself unsparingly, and made a great effect with the two songs in the second part, "Hath not God made foolish?" and "I will open my mouth in a parable." Mr. Lloyd, though obviously unwell, showed equal devotion to his task, and carried off equal honours; the two contralto ladies proved thoroughly successful in their share of the work; Mr. Hilton was an efficient Jacob, and Mr. Santley sang the music of Joseph as finely as ever, giving to it all needful dramatic significance. The nine brethren will, there is reason to fear, be always a stumbling block in the way of the Oratorio. They have a good deal of trying music to sing, and capable executants are not easily found, as was demonstrated on this occasion. The Norwich nine were, no doubt, picked men, but they left somewhat to desire; and, as this must almost inevitably be the case whenever the Oratorio is performed, it is worth Professor Macfarren's while to consider whether a semi-chorus, say of half the male voices, should not be employed. Numbers would give the confidence and strength which are now wanting. The execution of the choruses generally called for a good deal of praise. "Honour thy father and thy mother," with its elaborate fugue, was especially well done, and the same might be said of the Famine chorus and that in which Joseph is acclaimed by the Egyptians. On the other hand, the chorus of Ishmaelites fell flat, making but little of the expected effect. Sir Julius Benedict conducted with admirable devotion to the work of his brother-artist, and largely helped to a success which was ratified when the Mayor of Norwich led Professor Macfarren to the front of the orchestra, amid the plaudits of the assembly. That the amateurs present enjoyed "Joseph" none could deny. The pity was there were not more of them.

"Joseph" is a long Oratorio, but the Committee felt that, at the risk of surfeiting their patrons, some better known work should be associated with it, and choice fell upon Mozart's "First Mass." Here, beyond question, they offered music as familiar as anything in the repertory of compositions for the Church, and as worthy as any of an attentive and sympathetic hearing. Such a hearing, however, was too much to expect. The audience were tired out, the performers were exhausted, and all that could be done amounted to no more than running through the Mass in a perfunctory way, with eyes intently fixed, so to speak, upon the last page. This remark, however, does not apply to the soloists, Miss Williams, Mr. W. Shakespeare, Madame Trebelli, and Mr. Hilton, who came comparatively fresh, and did what they had to do well. But everybody was glad when the long sitting ended.

Wednesday evening was devoted to a "Grand Ballad Concert"—so called apparently on the lucus a non lucendo principle, ballads having very little indeed to do with it. By the choice of the term we are driven to conclude that ballad concerts are as attractive to the mass of the public at Norwich as they are elsewhere; but the Committee were careful, while making use of this influence, to provide something better, and the upshot was that 1,073 persons attended—nearly as many as heard "Elijah" on the following morning, and 450 more than were present at the corresponding concert three years ago. Some excellent music figured in the programme, beginning with Mozart's Symphony in E flat. Works of this kind are, strictly speaking, never out of place, because to carry on the propaganda of high art one must be "instant in season and out of season." No doubt some portion of the Norwich audience benefited by hearing Mozart; nevertheless the aspect of the majority during the performance of the Symphony was far from encouraging. The people stared at late arrivals, of whom there were plenty, talked to each other, and appeared to treat the work much as though its demands upon them were no more exacting than those of a church "voluntary." Under these circumstances it was not to be wondered at that the band played rather carelessly, and seemed as glad as the people in front of them when the last chord arrived. Ernst's Fantasia on the March in "Otello," brilliantly executed by Mr. Carrodus, was much more a popular success, and the performer had to reappear amid great applause. Gounod's burlesque Funeral March (encored) equally delighted the public, while that the always attractive overture to "Semiramide" and the Coronation March from "Le Prophète" obtained a favourable reception need not be insisted on. The doings of the solo vocalists call for no details. Madame Albani, Miss Williams, Madame Sterling, Madame Trebelli, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley each received one or more "ovations" in connection with songs "familiar in their mouths as household words;" and recalls and encores were the order of the evening. More real interest attached, however, to the performance of a Part-song on the subject of autumn, the work of Dr. Bunnett. As a smoothly written and graceful example of its kind, this "Autumn Song" met with a favourable reception, as well from the stranger amateurs present as from those in whose midst the composer lives.

Thursday morning brought with it "Elijah," and 1,169 persons were attracted to St. Andrew's Hall by that popular work. The character of its performance can be imagined, every bar of the music being now so familiar that only the grossest carelessness could lead to serious mishap. There was no carelessness of any kind at Norwich, and the Oratorio went smoothly from beginning to end, the choralists especially obtaining golden opinions for the manner in which they discharged their task. Mr. Santley was once more an Elijah sans reproche, singing with all his old power of voice and fervency of style; the other soloists being Miss Williams, Miss Penna, Madame Trebelli, Mr. Shakespeare, and Mr. Lloyd, to whom were added, in the second part, Madame Albani and Madame Sterling. As the audience refrained from applause there were of course no encores, and no means of judging the effects produced in any particular case. But that the general result was entire satisfaction needed no evidence in order to be accepted as truth. In point of fact, this performance was the special executive feature of the week. It reflected honour upon all concerned, and gave the Festival a distinction worthy of its traditions. The evening entertainment was styled a "Grand Operatic Concert," but out of eighteen pieces in the programme ten had nothing whatever to do with the lyric stage. Really the Norwich Committee have a pleasant style of doing things, and are wags in their way; but the joke of giving concerts a wrong name is harmless, and if a score or two of people were led to purchase tickets by the term "operatic" the end justified the means. The programme was really the most interesting of the week, on account of two novelties from the pen of the indefatigable Conductor, Sir Julius Benedict; and not for this reason alone, inasmuch as it comprised Beethoven's Second Symphony, the "Loreley" finale, and the Fire Music from Wagner's "Nibelungen." Beethoven's work met with a better hearing than that of Mozart on the previous evening, although it came first and suffered from the extraordinary people who attract notice to their insignificant selves by arriving late. The fragment of Mendelssohn's contemplated opera was also a success. Its solo found an admirable exponent in Miss Anna Williams, who is rapidly taking a high place among concert sopranos, and both band and chorus were up to the mark. The result was a large measure of satisfaction to connoisseurs. Yet another "hit" must be credited to a slow movement for four violoncelli, the work of the late M. Paque, an artist long associated with Norwich Festivals. The movement is unpretending, but charming withal, and, well played by Messrs. Pettit, Chipp, Guest, and Reed, elicited a unanimous encore. By this award the audience really did themselves honour, for M. Paque's music owes none of its power to ad captandum means. The "Feuerzauber" from "Die Walküre" was presumably played according to Herr Wagner's concert-room version, but, as the audience were not informed as to its dramatic significance, it was heard with more wonder than admiration. I must again contend that selections from music-dramas like those of Wagner, even when allowed by the composer, are a great mistake as well as a great injustice. They misrepresent the legitimate effect, and they as much fail to please as to instruct. Coming now to Sir Julius Benedict's works, I have first to speak of two movements from a small Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, written about six years ago, but from some cause or other never performed. They are both charming, and made every connoisseur who heard them regret that the entire work was not given. The Adagio is short, but the Rondo is fully developed, and may claim to rank among the most brilliant and pleasing examples of its class. Sir Julius must have written it in a happy mood. The music runs along so spontaneously, and the treatment of the themes appears so unforced, that mind as well as ear is captivated. Only one opinion pervaded the Norwich audience with regard to it, and that was wholly favourable. Sir Julius intrusted the solo instrument to a local pianist, Mr. H. Kingston Rudd, who, some may remember, played with much success at the Festival in 1875. Mr. Rudd acquitted himself equally well on this occasion. He has very considerable power of execution, a crisp, firm touch, a style free from exaggeration, and obviously a large fund of artistic sympathy. Hence a success which should encourage him to appear on a larger stage than that supplied by a provincial town. Sir Julius Benedict's second contribution to the programme was an Overture specially composed for the Festival, and intended as a prelude to Kleist's drama, "Das Kätchen von Heilbron." The unfortunate German poet seems to exercise the minds of musicians a good deal. Sir Julius had previously written an overture to his "Prince of Homburg;" and it will be remembered that an overture to his memory by Herr Joachim was played at Cambridge when the Hungarian violinist received his doctor's degree. The present work is intended, no doubt, to suggest certain incidents in the drama after which it is named, but the composer has not revealed what they are, and we must regard it as a piece of abstract music. Even so looked at, it is masterly and interesting beyond common; full of power of thought, and fertility of technical resource. Every page reveals a well-accustomed hand, and shows that the veteran author's fancy is as lively as ever. The leading themes of the overture are especially well chosen; and the second deserves a place amongst the most impassioned in the whole range of classical music. Nothing could have been more frank than the success of the work, which was unanimously redemanded, and played a second time with enhanced effect. The vocal pieces of this concert need not detain us. They were of the usual character and met with the usual applause. No more than 886 persons were present.

With Friday morning came the "Messiah" and 1,545 lovers of the sacred Oratorio to hear it. St. Andrew's Hall was crammed in every part, the demand for tickets compelling the Committee to ask the representatives of the press—whose presence was hardly called for—to give up their seats. All the solo vocalists engaged, save Miss Penna and Mr. Lloyd, whom illness kept away, took part in the performance, about which not a word need be said. In the evening a cheap ballad concert, without orchestra, was extemporised, and gave much satisfaction to a crowded house, besides increasing somewhat the very scanty profits of the Festival proper. The total attendance at the six concerts was 6,543. In 1875 seven concerts yielded 6,632, and in 1872, 7,715. The result, therefore, is an improvement upon 1875, and a return to the state of things three years previously. Whether the Committee will be encouraged by this to hold another Festival in 1881, time, which reveals all things, will duly tell.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

THE autumn season of Opera at this establishment was inaugurated on Saturday the 19th ult. with every prospect of success, the house being crowded to the ceiling. M. Candidus, who made his first appearance as Florestan, created a thoroughly legitimate effect, his great song in the dungeon, especially, being given with true dramatic feeling, and his style of vocalism proving that he had been carefully trained in a good school. Madame Pappenheim was the Leonora, Mdlle. Bauermeister Marcellina, Signor Rota Pizarro, Herr Behrens Rocco, and Signor Rinaldini Jacquino. The great attraction of the season will doubtless be "Carmen," which was produced on the 23rd ult., with Madame Trebelli in the part of the gipsy. To those who are not familiar with Minnie Hauck's impersonation of the character both the acting and singing of Madame Trebelli will be highly satisfactory, a fact fully proved by the warm applause with which she was greeted throughout her performance. "Faust," with Madame Hélène Crosmond as Margherita; "Rigoletto," Mdlle. Alwina Valleria in the part of Gilda; and other favourite Operas have already been given, showing a laudable desire on the part of the management to offer as much variety as possible in a short space of time.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

THE twenty-third series of the Saturday Concerts at the Crystal Palace commenced on the 5th ult., the first programme being, if possible, even fuller of interest than is generally the case at these excellent performances. The most important event of the afternoon was the first production in this country of Brahms's new Symphony in D major. The work was reviewed in such detail last month in these columns that it is needless to add much to what was then said. The hearing of the work confirmed in almost every respect the opinions expressed after reading the score. It should however, in justice to the composer, be stated that the slow movement produced in performance a greater effect than we were prepared to anticipate; the form appeared clearer on further acquaintance, while the beauty of the orchestral colouring was at times very remarkable. The rendering of the exceptionally difficult music was one of those, we might almost say, miracles of perfection which, in this country at least, are to be heard only at the Crystal Palace; while the warmth of its reception was justified no less by the beauty of the music than by the excellence of the performance. Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," with Wagner's close, was given for the first time at these concerts. Many of our readers will be aware that in the opera the overture leads at once into the first recitative. It has been generally the custom to perform the piece in the concert-room with a Coda written by Mozart. The one which Wagner has furnished, while less brilliant, is certainly far more appropriate to the general character of the overture, and it will in all probability be hereafter generally, if not exclusively, employed. A special feature of the concert was the first appearance in England of the great Belgian pianist, M. Brassin, who was heard in Beethoven's Concerto in E flat, and Liszt's Fantasia on Hungarian airs. While possessed of very remarkable execution, M. Brassin's chief claim to recognition springs from the eminently artistic character of his performance, which was distinguished by a high degree of musical feeling. M. Brassin will be welcomed as a valuable accession to the ranks of our first-class pianists. The vocalist at this concert was Miss Emma Thursby.

Field's Concerto in A flat was the special novelty, or quasi-novelty, at the Concert on the 12th. John Field, the most distinguished of Clementi's pupils, is now chiefly known by his Nocturnes, many of which are of exquisite beauty. His larger compositions have mostly been consigned to oblivion. The Concerto in A flat, however, though in no sense a great work, is well worthy of occasional revival. In its melodic style it recalls to some extent the music of Haydn and Mozart, while the passage-writing reminds one more of Hummel. The treatment of the orchestra is effective, though not remarkable either for richness or variety. The solo part was played to perfection by Madame Arabella Goddard, who has rarely, if ever, been heard to better advantage than in this work. A magnificent performance of Schumann's great Symphony in C, Op. 61, was given by Mr. Manns's band. The work itself is now, thanks chiefly to the Crystal Palace Concerts, too well known to need criticism. The Overtures were Weber's to "Euryanthe" and Ambroise Thomas's to "Le Roman d'Elvire;" the latter, which was given for the first time at these concerts, being a favourable specimen of the modern French school. The vocal music was of excellent quality. Mdlle. Sartorius, a young lady with a beautiful voice and very finished style, sang Weber's "Glöcklein im Thale" and two songs by Gordigiani and Schumann admirably, while Herr Henschel gave great effect to Lysiart's great scena from "Euryanthe" and to songs by Beethoven and Schumann.

The third Concert (on the 19th) opened with Mr. Walter Macfarren's pleasing and well-written Festival Overture, in A, composed for Mr. Kuhe's last Brighton Festival. The work, conducted by the composer, met with a deservedly favourable reception. The Symphony of the afternoon was Beethoven's charming No. 2, in D. Miss Agnes Zimmermann gave an excellent performance of Schumann's Concertstück, Op. 92, for piano and orchestra, and subsequently played with even greater effect a Prelude and Fugue by Bach, and Bennett's Rondo Piacevole. The singers on this occasion were Mrs. Davison—a lady with a pleasing and well-trained voice, who gave the "Selva opaca" from "Guillaume Tell" and a song by Grieg—and Madame Patey, who sang Handel's beautiful song "Ombra mai fu," from "Serse," and a ballad totally unworthy of a place in a Crystal Palace programme. The concert concluded with two pieces by Wagner, the Funeral March from the "Götterdämmerung," and the "Ritt der Walküren" from "Die Walküre," both of which, though very efficient as concert-pieces, suffer much by their separation from the stage.

On the 26th the afternoon was devoted to a performance of Verdi's "Requiem." This most interesting and beautiful work has been so often heard in London, first under the direction of the composer, and since then under Mr. Joseph Barnby, that a few lines of criticism of the rendering are all that will be needful now. The solos were excellently given by Mdlle. Sartorius, Miss Anna Williams, Mr. Barton McGuckin, and Herr Henschel; while the Crystal Palace Choir, which appeared on this afternoon for the first time during the present season, showed in their singing a marked improvement on some of their performances last winter. It is hardly needful to add that the exquisite orchestral accompaniments were played to perfection by Mr. Manns's band. The Requiem was preceded by Gounod's "Marche Religieuse" (known in England as "Marche Solennelle"), an effective composition admirably scored for the orchestra.

M. RIVIERE'S PROMENADE CONCERTS.

Had it not been for the introduction of the Piano à double claviers renversés" on the 21st ult. this series of so-called "Promenade Concerts" need scarcely receive notice in a journal devoted to the furtherance of musical art. It is true that the "Classical Nights" tend to keep alive the fact that music has been written worthy of the talents of so fine a body of performers as M. Rivière has gathered together; but—next to the refreshments—the real attraction relied upon appeals not to any criticism beyond that somewhat too audibly given by the "promenaders," who, as a rule, encore everything—good, bad, and indifferent—which is not too long to be repeated. The instrument mentioned above (manufactured and patented by MM. Mangeot Frères, of Paris) is, however, a musical curiosity, which, played upon by so expert a manipulator as M. Zarobski, is at least entitled to respectful attention. It is, in fact, two pianofortes in one, the scale of the lower keyboard being like our ordinary instruments, and that of the upper one running the contrary way; the highest notes of the one therefore being over the lowest notes of the other. It may be imagined that extraordinary combinations can be thus readily grasped by either hand; and certainly M. Zarobski (who is a pupil of Liszt) fully displays the qualifications of this invention; but we cannot say that the effect is to us very pleasing, and we doubt whether, when the novelty of the exhibition has worn off, there will be much demand for so unwieldy a pianoforte, especially amongst those who can estimate the legitimate resources of an instrument for which our greatest masters have written.

THE CHOIR BENEVOLENT FUND.

The Choir Benevolent Fund has added another to its long list of successful Festivals in that held at Croydon on Wednesday and Thursday, the 23rd and 24th ult. The idea of trying a Festival in a non-cathedral town was a happy one, and a better place than Croydon could scarcely have been selected, the parish-church being admirably adapted for a choral service. The application for the use of the church was readily granted by the vicar, the Rev. Canon Hodgson; and many of the influential parishioners and local clergy gave their warm support to the scheme. The service on Wednesday evening was rendered by a choir of about seventy voices, comprising members of the Chapels Royal, St. Paul's, Westminster, Canterbury, Eton, and Windsor choirs. The opening anthem was Goss's "O Saviour of the world," and the service was Gibbons in F, sung without accompaniment. The anthem after the third Collect was Mendelssohn's "Hear my prayer," the solo being sung by Master Russell, of the Westminster Abbey Choir. Dr. Wesley's "Wilderness" preceded the sermon, and the verses were sung by the treble already named, Mr. Frost (St. Paul's), Mr. Mellor (Eton), and Mr. Higgins (Canterbury); the last-named gentleman singing the important bass solo with much effect. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Canon Duckworth, who chose for his text 2 Thessalonians, i. 3; and at its conclusion, the offertory having been collected, a new anthem, "I will lay me down in peace," which had been composed expressly for and presented to the Society by Mr. Henry Gadsby, was sung. The anthem is short and full, and, admirably sung by the choir, was exceedingly effective: it will doubtless prove very popular with parish choirs, for whose capabilities it is well adapted. The service concluded with Beethoven's "Hallelujah." The fine organ, by Hill, is of recent date (the former one having been destroyed with the church in the fire some years since), and was ably played by Mr. W. S. Hoyte, Mr. F. Cambridge, and Dr. Bridge, the last of whom conducted the service and some of the anthems from the chancel. The Rev. J. Troutbeck intoned the prayers, and the lessons were read by the Vicar. Upwards of twenty-five of the local clergy were present, robed; and the church was filled to overflowing. During the afternoon of the 23rd, and following day, Organ Recitals were given by Mr. W. S. Hoyte (organist of All Saints', Margaret Street) and Mr. Jekyll (organist of the Chapels Royal). Both Recitals were attended by between six and seven hundred persons.

On the evening of the 24th, a Concert of Glees, Madrigals, &c., was given in the large hall of the Literary Institution. Pearsall's "Who shall win my lady fair," Wilbye's "Flora gave me," and Morley's "Now is the month of maying," were effectively sung by the full choir, numbering about forty-five voices; and the glees sung respectively by members of the St. Paul's, Canterbury, Eton, and Windsor choirs met with warmly expressed approval from the numerous audience. Miss Jessie Jones contributed Mrs. Marshall's charming song, "I arise from dreams of thee" and "Robin Adair," the latter being loudly encored; and Miss Amy Gill delighted her hearers alike by the pleasing quality of her voice and her artistic rendering of "Dermot Astore," encored, and Gaul's "Ferry-Maiden." Mr. Higgins again displayed an agreeable and well-trained voice in the "Song of the Pirate;" and Mr. Abercrombie, in Tours's popular song, "The angel at the window," and

Mr. Winn, in "Simon Bray" (his own composition), were both compelled to satisfy the demands of the audience by singing a second time. A novel and especially interesting feature in the programme was the performance of Reinecke's Cantata for treble voices, entitled "Little Snowdrop," by the choir-boys of Westminster Abbey. The young vocalists, under the direction of their able teacher, Dr. Bridge, who presided at the piano, sang the solos and concerted music with admirable taste and expression, reflecting much credit on their training; the song of the dwarf Tom, "Now all the tasty soup is made," given with point and humour by Master N. Bowes, being enthusiastically redemanded. The accompanying verses to the Cantata were recited by Mr. Charles Fry. The part-songs were conducted by Mr. Winn and Mr. G. C. Martin, sub-organist of St. Paul's, and Mr. F. Cambridge accompanied the songs. We understand from the Secretary that much of the success of the undertaking is due to the exertions of Frederick West, Esq., an influential resident and an enthusiastic musical amateur, who, aided by the Rev. W. Wilkes, superintended the admirable carrying out of the local arrangements. It is gratifying to learn that the total receipts of the service, recitals, and concert will probably exceed £200.

LONDON CHURCH CHOIR ASSOCIATION.

The Sixth Annual Festival of the London Church Choir Association took place at St. Paul's Cathedral on Thursday evening, the 24th ult. The immense congregation was perhaps larger than usual, and we think that the few who were fortunate enough to get a seat in one of the galleries above the ground-floor will not easily forget the magnificent appearance of the Cathedral on this occasion. The choir, under the direction of Mr. J. R. Murray, numbered about 1,200, and, considering its great size, sang with much steadiness. As usual, the whole of the music was composed specially for the occasion; and we always look forward with pleasure to this festival partly on that account. Mr. Hoyte (who presided at the organ with excellent taste and judgment) contributed the chants for the psalms, and Messrs. Archer, Martin, and Stephens provided the hymn-tunes. Next to the most important musical feature of the service was Mr. Gadsby's setting of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis. This composition is in the key of G, and in Mr. Gadsby's well-known excellent style, original, striking, and vigorous. We scarcely know why one part should be singled out from the rest; but perhaps the most effective movement for both organ and voices is to the words, "He hath scattered the proud," and the following verse. No doubt we shall have another opportunity of speaking of this work.

We now come to Mr. Smart's Anthem, "Lord, Thou hast been our refuge." Mr. Smart can always produce excellent music, eminently suitable for these occasions, and the present Anthem is a proof of that fact, if such is necessary. The opening chorus is based upon broad, dignified themes, with an accompaniment of an antique overture-like style. Mr. Kenningham, whose fine voice is so familiar to those who attend the services at St. Paul's, then sang the following tenor solo in a manner which must have very much gratified even the composer. We have not time to speak of the other two movements of this Anthem, but the whole work is full of fine musical thought and feeling. Whatever may be said against the architecture of St. Paul's, this certainly must be granted in its favour, that no other church in the country could accommodate so large a choir and congregation, and therefore it satisfactorily fulfils the requirements of its central position.

CONCERT AT THE MANSION HOUSE.

Under the patronage of the Corporation of the City of London the National Training School for Music gave a Concert at the Mansion House on the afternoon of Wednesday the 16th ult. The Principal of the school, Mr. Arthur Sullivan, conducted. The accompanists were Messrs. Henry Balfour, Cliffe William Hodge, and Marshall. The tickets of admission were distributed amongst the friends of the Members of the Common Council. About nine or ten hundred persons were present. The Egyptian Hall at the Mansion House proved well adapted for music, and the performance gave great pleasure, and was in every sense of the word successful. The concert is of course out of the pale of ordinary criticism. It was part of a great national experiment. It took place in pursuance of a recommendation embodied in a report made to the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons of the City of London by a deputation appointed by the Corporation, and who assisted at the establishment of the National Training School on June 3, 1875. To second the object of Mr. C. J. Freake's munificence in presenting to the nation the building occupied by the Training School, the Court of Common Council subscribed for ten scholarships of forty pounds a year each for five years, reserving the privilege of nominating a certain number of candidates from whom ten are selected by the musical examiners. The deputation has also endeavoured to establish a school for music in the city; and to that end it made overtures to the Gresham College, which were not successful. Meantime the Corporation of the City of London do not relax their laudable efforts towards the extension of general musical education. To organise the concert we are speaking of was a happy idea; and the result must be as grateful to the City authorities as it is flattering to the pupils and teachers in the National Training School. We understand that there was once some intention of holding the concert at the West-End. That indeed would have been an unfortunate error; lowering the event far beneath the level of interest it assumed under the ægis of the municipal authorities. It is doubtful whether any public notice of the particular merits or demerits of pupils is advisable. They are placed before an audience as specimens, and are in themselves nothing apart from the institution they represent. To some of the pupils, particularly Miss Riley, violinist, Mr. Eugene D'Albert and Mr. Herbert Sharpe, pianists, full justice has been done by our daily contemporaries. We do not think it worth while so long after the event to enter into details, which would only more or less be a repetition of what has already been expressed, in regard either to the merits of some of the young vocalists or to the obvious shortcomings of others. It is sufficient to fairly acknowledge that even where there has been an evident desire to find fault, the final judgment has been favourable, and therefore all the more complimentary to an institution which has scarcely been three years in existence. There was however one feature in the performance which appears to have attracted attention, and has been variously estimated. With one or two of the pianists, especially Mr. D'Albert, there seemed to be an attempt to make the design of the composer not only clear but impressive; whilst three or four of the singers on their part aimed more at dramatic expression, and even exaggerated pathos and declamation, than we are accustomed to in this country. It would be very undesirable to foster an affected style foreign to the native temperament; but, on the other hand, music with us has been looked upon perhaps too much in the light of a purely domestic institution. House-music has its incomparable charms, besides its moral and educational advantages; nevertheless, as a question of art, its too exclusive pursuit induces that homeliness of manner our enemies with perfect propriety call "provincialism."

The prospectus of the Borough of Hackney Choral Association for the ensuing season announces four Concerts, the programmes of which are of such high artistic interest as to offer a powerful attraction not only to local residents but to all real music-lovers. Schumann's "Faust" music, Handel's Chandos Anthem, "O praise the Lord with one consent," Mendelssohn's 114th Psalm, for an eight-part chorus, and Brahms's "Song of Destiny" are amongst the promised works; and all who know the excessive difficulty of preparing compositions of such magnitude for public performance must feel assured that, even under the watchful guidance of so experienced and zealous a Conductor as Mr. Ebenezer Prout, success could scarcely be assured without the hearty co-operation of the choir. English music will be represented by the late Sir Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen," Dr. Bridge's Oratorio, "Mount Moriah," Mr. Eaton Faning's Chorus, "The Song of the Vikings," and an orchestral Minuet and Trio by the Conductor. The programmes will also include Mendelssohn's

"First Walpurgis Night," and a selection from the same composer's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music. Mozart's Jupiter Symphony and Schubert's unfinished Symphony in B minor likewise appear in the list, in consequence of the success which attended the performance of an entire Symphony last season. Mr. Ebenezer Prout, through whose unwearied exertions the Association has been brought to its present state of efficiency, retains his post of Conductor; and we are glad to find that the plan adopted of closing the doors during the performance of each piece will be continued. The first Concert will take place on the 18th inst., when Schumann's music to "Faust" will be performed.

The Harvest Festival of St. Mark's, Battersea Rise, which was combined with the fourth anniversary of the dedication of the church, was held on Saturday the 28th September. At the Choral Evensong, service commenced with the processional hymn "Come, ye thankful people, come" (Elvey). The special Psalms were ciii. (H. Lawes, in C), cxliv. (Dr. W. Boyce, in F), and cl. (grand chant). The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, Service in B♭, composed for the occasion by the organist, Mr. George Ryle, was very efficiently rendered, as was also the anthem, "Fear not, O land, be glad and rejoice" (Goss). The sermon was preached by the Rev. Canon Erskine Clarke, vicar of Battersea. On Sunday the 29th Dr. Dykes's Morning and Communion Service in F was sung, the special Psalms being lxv. (Dr. T. S. Dupuis, in E♭), lxxxi. (Dr. T. S. Dupuis, in B♭), and the anthem, "I will magnify Thee" (Goss). The preacher was the Bishop of Delaware, U.S. At Evensong the service was the same as on Saturday, the preacher being the Rev. H. B. Verdon, and at the conclusion of the service the "Hallelujah Chorus" was excellently rendered by the choir. The able manner in which the musical portion of the service was performed showed that much pains had been taken in training the choir, reflecting great credit on the choirmaster and organist. The church was beautifully decorated with corn, fruit, and flowers.

The Concerts of the Edinburgh Choral Union for the session 1878-79, three of which will be choral and six orchestral, are announced to commence on the 13th inst. Herr Julius Tausch, of Düsseldorf (who is also engaged at the Glasgow Choral Union) has been appointed Conductor of the orchestral concerts. At the choral concerts (which will be under the conductorship of Mr. Adam Hamilton) Mendelssohn's "Elijah," and Handel's "Israel in Egypt" and "Messiah," will be given; and the selection of instrumental works includes not only many of the long-established favourites, but several compositions by the modern writers, an Overture by Herr Tausch, composed for this occasion, and Brahms's new Symphony being amongst the number. Much interest is felt in the engagement of Herr Julius Tausch, who holds a high reputation in Germany, having been a pupil of Mendelssohn at Leipzig, Schumann's deputy and successor at Düsseldorf since 1853, and Conductor of the Lower Rhine Festivals from 1860, in conjunction with Rietz, Goldschmidt, Rubinstein, and Joachim. In every respect the band engaged by the Edinburgh Choral Union is thoroughly efficient, and the list of vocalists whose services are already secured include the Misses Robertson, Madame Nouver, Mrs. Davison, Messrs. Barton M'Guckin, Guy, and Wadmore, and Herr Conrad Behrens. Herr Tausch and Mrs. Beesley will be the solo pianists, and Mr. Henry Hartley organist and accompanist.

In Mr. Hullah's "Report on the Examinations in Music of the Students of Training Colleges in Great Britian" for the year 1877, he still deplores the fact of the students of male and female colleges not, as a rule, meeting for the combined practice of such music as neither can perform separately. Some few, he says, have adopted this system with very beneficial results; but most of the colleges "still carry on their monophonous practice independently, and of necessity imperfectly." Instrumental music, he appears to think, has advanced satisfactorily; a band of stringed instruments at the practising school at Cheltenham, for example, having made sufficient progress to accompany some of the simpler choruses in Handel's Oratorios very creditably. We quite agree with Mr. Hullah that the custom still prevalent, of singing "by rote instead of note" is perfectly worthless as a help to real musical training, and even that it increases the difficulty of afterwards learning to read music. Much good has of course been done since this subject has been taken up in earnest by the Government; but very much more remains to be done. Mr. Hullah has performed his task honourably and effectually; but, as he truly says, instruction and practice can never be perfected until elementary schools are "systematically inspected in music by competent persons."

The prospectus of the Glasgow Choral Union Concerts announces four Choral and six Orchestral performances during the season 1878-79; Herr Julius Tausch, from Düsseldorf, being engaged as Conductor and solo pianist. The programmes of the choral concerts include Randegger's Cantata, "Fridolin," Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer," Beethoven's Oratorio, "Engedi," and "Choral Fantasia," H. A. Lambeth's Psalm, "By the waters of Babylon," and Handel's Oratorios, "Messiah" and "Judas Maccabæus;" and amongst a number of highly interesting orchestral works will be given Brahms's new Symphony in D, and an Overture composed expressly for these concerts by Herr Tausch. Madame Norman-Neruda is engaged as solo violinist, and Dr. A. L. Peace presides at the organ. The vocalists are Mrs. Osgood, Mrs. Davison, Miss Robertson, Miss Fanny Robertson, Miss Mary Davies, Madame Patey, Miss E. De Fonblanque, Miss Helen D'Alton, Messrs. E. Lloyd, Guy, Shakespeare, Barton M'Guckin, J. L. Wadmore, John Bridson, R. Hilton, Thurley Beale, and Signor Giorgio Valcheri. The first Concert is announced for the 19th inst.

The prospectus of the Grosvenor Choral Society announces that the following works will be included in those to be performed during the winter season, viz., Handel's "Acis and Galatea," Rossini's "Stabat Mater," Sullivan's "On Shore and Sea," Romberg's "Lay of the Bell," Mendelssohn's Ninety-fifth Psalm, "O come let us worship," "Hear my prayer," and Forty-third Psalm, "Judge me, O God," a selection of Christmas Carols, and Callcott's Cantata, "The Golden Harvest." The last of these was very successfully given at the eightieth monthly Concert on Friday the 18th ult., with full band and chorus. Miss Agnes Ross, Miss Kate Reed, Mr. A. Lawrence Fryer, and Mr. Henry Baker, were the soloists. The miscellaneous portion of the programme included Eaton Faning's "Song of the Vikings" (encored), overtures by the band, and Chopin's Polonaise for piano and cello, well played by Miss Josephine Lawrence and Mr. Daniel Finzi. Mr. J. H. Maunder officiated as accompanist, and Mr. S. Dean Grimson led the band. The choral singing reflected great credit on the conductor, Mr. J. G. Callcott.

Spohr's Sacred Cantata, "God, Thou art great," was sung at St. Stephen's, South Kensington, at the Harvest Festival, on the 18th and 20th ult. The handsome church was crowded on both occasions, and on the last date hundreds were unable to gain admission. A full orchestra, in addition to the organ, accompanied the choir in the Cantata, Tours's Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in F, the processional and recessional hymns, and Lowe's Harvest Carol, "Holy is the seed-time." The offertory anthem was "In splendour bright," and "The heavens are telling." Mendelssohn's March in "Athalie" was played as a voluntary after the service by both orchestra and organ. Great effect was produced by the brass instruments heading the procession, and leading the vast congregation in the melody; in fact, the service was unique from beginning to end, and reflected great credit on the musical director, Mr. Albert Lowe. Mr. W. F. Bradshaw presided at the organ.

The prospectus of the forty-seventh season of the Sacred Harmonic Society, although promising no actual novelties, contains the following works which have not been heard for some time: Handel's "Samson," Mozart's "Requiem" and "Twelfth Mass," Beethoven's "Mount of Olives," Spohr's "Last Judgment," and Costa's "Eli." It is also announced that Rossini's Oratorio, "Moses in Egypt," will be given on Friday the 13th of December. Amongst the artists already engaged are Mesdames Sherrington, Edith Wynne, Anna Williams, Osgood, Blanche Cole, Patey, and Julia Elton; Messrs. Edward Lloyd, Vernon Rigby, Cummings, Bernard Lane, Shakespeare, Santley, Lewis

Thomas, and Herr Henschel. We are glad to find that Sir Michael Costa retains his post as Conductor. The season will commence on the 22nd inst. with a performance of Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang" and Rossini's "Stabat Mater."

After undergoing extensive alterations and improvements, the church of St. Augustine and St. Faith, Old Change, City, was reopened on Thursday afternoon, the 10th ult., when a special Choral Service was held, at which some of the St. Paul's Cathedral Choir assisted. The Service was that by Smart in B flat; and the anthem, "O come, let us worship" (Mendelssohn), the tenor solo of which was expressively rendered by Mr. A. B. Newth, one of the church choir. After an eloquent sermon by the Rev. Canon Barry, D.D., the cathedral boys sang "Hear us, gracious Lord" (Mendelssohn). The singing of the choir was exceptionally fine, and special praise is due to the organist, Mr. Charles F. South, both for his admirable playing and for his commendable efforts in attaining the present efficiency in the musical portions of the ordinary services at this church.

The Harvest Festival at St. Peter's Church, Eltham Road, was held on Friday morning, the 11th, and also on Sunday the 13th ult. The choir was augmented for the occasion and the church beautifully decorated. The evening service used was James Shaw in C, originally composed for the festival of the London Church Choirs, at St. Paul's Cathedral; the anthem was "I will magnify Thee, O God, my King," by the same composer; preceded by a tenor solo, "The eyes of all wait upon Thee, O Lord," composed expressly for this Festival. The Te Deum at the morning service was by Alfred Shaw, organist of the church. The service throughout was full choral; the double chants for the special psalms were Turle in F, and A. Shaw in D; Tallis's responses were used. The vicar, the Rev. Arthur F. Forde, was assisted by several of the neighbouring clergy, and the whole festival was a great success.

An Amateur Concert was given at the Godolphin School, Hammersmith, on the 9th ult., in aid of the fund for the sufferers by the Abercarne Colliery Explosion. Miss Mansell, in Pinsuti's "I love my love," Mr. Theodore Barth, in Sullivan's "Lost chord," and Mr. R. D. Cubitt, in Benedict's "Rage, thou angry storm," were much applauded, as were Miss Alice Bernard and Mrs. W. Tucker in their pianoforte solos. Miss Marie Cope and Mr. Tyndal Roach also contributed songs, and Mr. Sweeting joined Mrs. W. Tucker in two pianoforte duets, and several popular part-songs and choruses were sung. A prominent feature in the programme was the performance of two selections by the Criterion Bell-Ringers. The execution of the various items in the programme was much appreciated by a large audience.

The prospectus of the Monday Evening and Saturday Morning Popular Concerts promises an exceptionally attractive season, the Director being evidently resolved to profit by the few words of kindly advice called forth by the somewhat languid management of the series of performances during the last year. The pianists engaged are Madame Schumann, Mdlle. Marie Krebs, Mdlle. Janotha, Dr. Von Bülow, M. Louis Brassin, and Mr. Charles Hallé; Herr Joachim, Herr Straus, and Madame Norman-Neruda being the solo violinists. Signor Piatti will hold the post of first violoncello, Herr L. Ries that of second violin, and Herr L. Straus or Mr. Zerbini will play viola throughout the season; Sir Julius Benedict and Mr. Zerbini officiating as accompanists, as usual. The first Concert is appointed to take place on Monday evening the 4th inst.

The Royal Albert Hall Choral Society announces ten Oratorio Concerts during the season, when the following works will be performed: Mendelssohn's "Elijah," "Hymn of Praise," and "St. Paul;" Handel's "Messiah," "Israel in Egypt," and "Judas Maccabæus;" Haydn's "Creation," and Rossini's "Stabat Mater." The vocalists engaged are Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Mrs. Osgood, Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, Miss de Fonblanque, Miss Dones, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Messrs. Sims Reeves, Vernon Rigby, Cummings, E. Lloyd, Thurley Beale, Wadmore, Hilton, Signor Brocolini, Herr Henschel, &c. Mr. Barnby retains his post as Conductor, and Dr. Stainer will preside at the organ. The first Concert will take place on the 7th inst.

The interesting musical services at St. Andrew's, Tavistock Place, are to be continued during November and December. At the evening service on the 3rd inst. Spohr's "Last Judgment," on the 30th inst. (St. Andrew's Day), Purcell's Te Deum in D, and on Christmas Eve the "Messiah" will be performed. On each occasion a full orchestra will be employed and the choir will be augmented to 100 voices. The selection of music for the remaining Sundays is of the most varied kind, and comprises services and anthems by the best known church composers, including Communion Services by Gounod, Schubert, Mozart, &c., and on Sunday evening, the 17th inst., selections from Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" will be given in place of the anthem.

The Harvest Festival was held at the Church of St. Edmund the King and Martyr, Lombard Street, on Thursday, September 26, when the Church was most tastefully decorated and crowded to excess. The Service commenced with the processional hymn, "Forward be our watchword," to a new tune by Mr. Yorke-Smith. The evening service was Ebdon in C, and the anthem, "Praise the Lord" (Dr. Hayes). After the sermon, which was preached by the Rev. R. B. Hill, B.A., the hymn, "The sower went forth sowing," was sung, followed by the "Hallelujah" Chorus. Miss K. Westrop ably presided at the organ, and the choir, under the direction of Mr. C. E. Tutill, was very efficient.

The Plymouth Vocal Association, under the able conductorship of Mr. Löhr, announces that during the present season Handel's "Messiah" and "Israel in Egypt," Mendelssohn's "Elijah," and Professor Macfarren's Oratorio, "Joseph," will be performed. The most eminent vocalists are engaged, and in every respect it is evident that the high reputation of this Society will be fully sustained. When it is considered that over forty Oratorio Concerts have already been given, and that the services of all connected with the Society are entirely honorary, it is needless to advance additional claim upon the continued, and even increased, support of the music-loving residents of Plymouth and its neighbourhood.

The prospectus of the Wolverhampton Festival Choral Society for the session 1878-79 announces an English ballad concert; Haydn's "Creation" (terminating with the second part) and Beethoven's Mass in C at the second concert; and a classical, instrumental, and ballad concert for the concluding performance. The vocalists engaged include Madame Nouver, Miss Anna Williams, Miss Mary Davies; Messrs. E. Lloyd, Thurley Beale, and Maybrick; and the solo instrumentalists, Madame Norman-Neruda (violin), Herr Franz Neruda (violoncello), and Mr. Charles Hallé (pianoforte); chorus-master, Mr. W. C. Stockley. The first Concert takes place on the 15th inst.

On the 15th ult. a Special Service and Organ Recital were held at St. Mary's Church, Haggerstone, when Prout's Magnificat in F, Tours's anthem, "God hath appointed a day," Mendelssohn's "How lovely are the messengers," and Frost's "God is the Lord" were sung by the choir. The Organ Recital included C. E. Stephens's Fantasia on Choral St. James, Guilmant's Marche Nuptiale, Longhurst's Andante Pastorale, Frost's Andantino in F, Bunnett's Allegretto in A, Merkel's Pastorale in G, Mendelssohn's Andante in B minor, and Bach's Fugue in D major, all of which were well rendered by Mr. C. J. Frost, the organist.

The St. George's Glee Union gave its 117th consecutive Monthly Concert at the Pimlico Rooms on Friday the 4th ult. Handel's "Acis and Galatea" was performed with Miss Kate Hardy, Mr. Faulkner Leigh, Mr. Arthur Thomas, and Mr. E. J. Bell as soloists. The choir was especially good in the choruses, "Wretched lovers" and "Galatea, dry thy tears." The soloists were well chosen, Miss Hardy winning great applause for her artistic rendering of "Hush, ye pretty warbling choir." Miss Julia Augarde, at the pianoforte, and Mr. F. R. Kinkee, at the harmonium, were able accompanists, and Mr. T. Garside was a most efficient conductor.

HARVEST Thanksgiving Services were held at St. Peter's, Windmill Street, W., on Sunday the 6th ult. In the morning, Goss's Te Deum and Jubilate in A (unison) and several appropriate hymns were sung. In the evening the choir was augmented to thirty-six voices, and the music performed was Magnificat and Nunc dimittis (E. Prout); anthems, "Ye shall dwell in the land" (J. Stainer) and "O Lord, how manifold" (J. Barnby); the Te Deum being sung at the conclusion. Mr. A. Dorey, the organist, accompanied the music at both services, and played as voluntaries in the evening Gounod's "Marche Solennelle" and Handel's "Hallelujah."

A SERVICE of song, called "Harvest Home," arranged by M. Palmer, was given in St. Stephen's Church, North Bow, on Thursday the 3rd ult. The choir, which was assisted by that of St. Mark's, Victoria Park, and other friends, numbered about eighty voices. The hymns and anthems were well sung, and the Psalms went smoothly. An eloquent sermon was preached by the vicar (the Rev. R. Parnell), and the service concluded with the "Hallelujah Chorus." Mr. Price, the organist of the church, presided at the organ, and Mr. E. Stroud, the newly appointed choirmaster, conducted.

HARVEST Thanksgiving Services were held at Christ Church, Westminster Road, on Wednesday the 16th and Sunday the 20th ult. The Services on both occasions included a Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in F, composed by Mr. F. G. Edwards, the organist and director of the choir; Elvey's anthem, "O give thanks," Tallis's Festal responses, and special psalms and hymns, the whole of which were well rendered by the voluntary choir of the Church, numbering fifty voices. Mr. Edwards played Handel's second Organ Concerto at the close of the Sunday evening service.

ON the 11th ult. a well-attended Concert in aid of the choir alterations was given in the school-room attached to St. Simon's Church, Chelsea, under the conductorship of Mr. H. A. Evans, organist of the church. Among the most successful performers were Miss Beata Francis and Master Horton. Songs were also contributed by Mrs. E. F. Halland, Messrs. C. Holdaway, E. Bowles, and Master L. Rose; and the anthems and part-songs by the choir were well rendered. Mr. J. Archer was accompanist, and also played a piano solo and a duet with Mr. H. A. Evans. The concert was very successful.

THE Terminal Lecture was delivered in the Sheldonian Theatre, Oxford, by the Professor of Music, on the 25th ult., and was devoted entirely to Organ Music of the English School. An unusually large number of illustrations, selected from the works of Boyce, Dupuis, Battishill, Beckwith, S. Wesley, Crotch, Adams, Jones, and S. S. Wesley, were performed by Mr. Parratt; and an efficient orchestra of seventeen performers, led and conducted by Mr. Allchin, assisted in the rendering of a Concerto in three movements by Dr. Crotch.

MR. H. DUBBER, assisted by the members of his choir, gave a Concert on Monday evening, the 21st ult., at the Lecture Hall, St. Aubyn's Road, Upper Norwood. The programme included several well-known glees and madrigals, "The bells of St. Michael's Tower" and the Bridal chorus from Wagner's "Lohengrin" being so well rendered as to secure an encore. Herr H. Progatzsky contributed a contrabasso solo, which was highly appreciated, and Miss Emmeline Dickson was encored in "It was a dream." The concert was a great success.

ON Wednesday evening, the 9th ult., a Harvest Festival Service was held at the church of St. John the Evangelist, Smith Square, Westminster. The music comprised Stainer's Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in E flat, Calkin's anthem, "I will magnify Thee, O God, my King," Handel's "Hallelujah Chorus," and some well selected voluntaries. The augmented choir of sixty voices sang throughout in a manner which reflected the highest credit upon the efforts of the organist, Mrs. H. E. Bennett, whose excellent playing is also worthy of especial commendation.

THE Sherborne Musical Union, under the able direction of Mr. Louis N. Parker, announces for performance during the ensuing session Mendelssohn's Oratorio, "Elijah," and J. F. Barnett's Cantata, "The Ancient Mariner." Much credit is due to this Society for the excellent manner in which the concerts are invariably conducted, and especially for selecting during the last season the late Sir Sterndale Bennett's strangely neglected sacred Cantata, "The Woman of Samaria," which was most satisfactorily rendered.

HARVEST Thanksgiving Services were celebrated at St. Mary's Church, Vincent Square, on Sunday the 6th ult., when the music comprised: in the morning, Best's Benedicite and Barnby's Service in E; in the evening, Attwood's Service in D, and Goss' anthem, "Fear not, O land." The music throughout was admirably sung by a well-trained (and on this occasion augmented) choir. The church was beautifully decorated with fruit and flowers, and the services were attended by large congregations.

A COMPETITION for the vacant scholarship of the Society of Arts was held at the National Training School for Music, on Monday the 30th of September last. The examiners were Arthur Sullivan, Esq., Principal, and Herr Ernst Pauer, of the Board of Principal Professors. There were twelve candidates, of ages varying from twelve to nineteen years. The scholarship was awarded to Mr. Ernest Crook (violinist), aged fourteen years.

THE Promenade Concerts at the Marble Rink, Clapham Road, deserve a special word of praise; for, although professedly aiming at no high standard of art in the selection of the programmes, a very fair band is engaged, and visitors may be certain of hearing at every performance artists o established reputation, both vocal and instrumental. The concerts are under the conductorship of Mr. F. Taylor, and the accompanist is Mr. T. Barrett.

THE Saturday Popular Organ Recitals at the Bow and Bromley Institute are maintaining their popularity. During the past month Recitals have been given by Mr. W. T. Best, Dr. Peace, Mr. W. S. Hoyte, Mr. F. Pearce, and Mr. A. Le Jeune; and on Saturday the 26th ult. the well-known choir of St. Mary's, Stoke Newington, sang a selection of church anthems, Mr. Fountain Meen presiding at the organ.

THE competition for the Sterndale Bennett Scholarship took place on Saturday the 5th ult. at the Royal Academy of Music. The examiners were Mr. W. Dorrell, Dr. Steggall, and Professor Macfarren (chairman). There were eight candidates, and the scholarship was awarded to William George Wood.

SPECIAL Services will again be held during Advent at St. Anne's Church, Soho, at which Bach's Magnificat and "My spirit was in heaviness" will be sung with orchestral accompaniment, conducted by Mr. J. Barnby. The services will be held on Friday the 29th inst., and three following Fridays.

THE following passed the examination for the degree of Doctor in Music at Oxford on the 23rd ult.: Jacob Bradford (Mus. B., New College), of London; Frederick Iliffe (Mus. B., New College), of Oxford; Joseph Gordon Saunders (Mus. B., Hertford College), of London.

PIANOFORTE Recitals will be given by Miss Agnes Zimmermann at St. Leonard's on the 13th and at Brighton on the 20th inst.

REVIEWS.

Polyeucte. Opéra en cinq actes. Paroles de Jules Barbier et Michel Carré. Musique de Ch. Gounod, de l'Institut.

[Paris: Henry Lemoine. London: Novello, Ewer & Co.]

WE have stated in another column that the libretto of this Opera was finished and in M. Gounod's hands as far back as 1869. But it is probable that the subject was in M. Gounod's thoughts years before. The French composer is a man who, when engaged upon a great work, takes time to meditate and arrange his ideas. He does nothing in a hurry, and has himself declared, in the hearing of the writer, that his attention was first directed to the subject of "Faust," and some of the music, notably the representative love-theme in D flat, actually composed, while he was a student in Rome as Grand Prix of the Conservatoire, and before a verse of the libretto had been prepared. Corneille's tragedy, moreover, was just the work to draw M. Gounod towards it. Early training and personal predilection have given him a fondness for illustrating what Wagner calls "the myth of Christianity;" and in the story of the martyrs of Mitylene he found wherewith to kindle both his fancy and his faith. We can imagine him irresistibly attracted towards it, brooding over its incidents for years, and determining upon action more from "unconscious necessity"—again, to quote Wagner—than from arbitrary choice. It is always well when this is the case, for affinity between the artist and his subject is the first step to success. Corneille's work could do little more than supply the librettists with a story and a certain number of lines. As readers of French classic drama well know, the whole visible action of the tragedy takes place in the vestibule of the palace of Félix, the story of the martyrs being narrated, not represented. MM. Barbier and Carré had therefore to go very wide indeed of Corneille, and show in actual occurrence the events he has only described. But they had to do more than this. The tragedy sets forth, before all, the unsparing ambition of Félix, the Governor of Mitylene, who was ready to sacrifice his Christian son-in-law Polyeucte, in the hope that his daughter, Pauline, might then be united to her former lover, the successful general, Sévère. This could not be made the leading idea of an Opera, and hence, Félix occupies but a subordinate position in the libretto, while Polyeucte comes to the front with his Christian heroism, Pauline with her devoted love, and Sévère with his manliness of character. Here are touches of exalted nature that can never fail of sympathetic response, and the librettists must be congratulated upon the admirable skill shown in determining the precedence of characters and motives. How far they have succeeded in themselves securing and sustaining dramatic interest, and how far they supplied M. Gounod with suggestive words, incidents, and situations will appear from what follows.

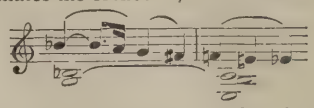
But, before accompanying us through the Opera, the reader must understand the circumstances amid which its story opens. Félix, Proconsul of Armenia, has a daughter, Pauline, who was at one time sought in marriage by the Roman general, Sévère. Circumstances, however, not essential to the plot, divided them, and Pauline gave her hand, if not her heart, to Polyeucte, a prince of the Armenian royal house. When the story opens the Christian faith is being rapidly propagated in Mitylene, the capital of the province, and Polyeucte has listened with a willing ear to the teachings of the new creed, but without open profession. As a matter of course the converts are subject to persecution "even unto death;" and no doubt the populace of Mitylene anticipate the butchery of some of them "to make a Roman holiday" when Sévère, who is approaching Mitylene after a successful campaign, enters in triumph. This is the state of things at the moment the curtain rises.

There is no overture to "Polyeucte," but only the introduction now in vogue with French and Italian composers. It consists, first, of an Allegro moderato in B flat, made up of subjects taken from the body of the work, chiefly from the scene in which the martyrs are thrown to the lions; and next of a Largo (G major) in the form of a Choral, which subsequently bursts upon the astonished revellers at the close of the Pagan ballet. This ended, the curtain rises and shows us Pauline's chamber, with its private altar and its "household gods." Pauline and her servants, Stratonice at their head, are in the room, and while the mistress meditates before the altar, her domestics sing in two-part chorus a simple melodious strain, with a delicate and beautiful accompaniment. At its close, in answer to Stratonice, Pauline explains her melancholy by reference to a dream presaging evil, and is answered: "What have you to fear?"—the music of the reply reflecting the serenity of the opening chorus. Then Pauline tells, in agitated recitative, accompanied by a theme heard again when the vision is realised, that she had seen Polyeucte bowing before Christian altars, and at once destroyed by the vengeance of Jove. In the orchestration of this passage there is nothing new, M. Gounod having resorted to the conventional tremolando and succession of "diminished" chords. The servants are at first impressed, and exclaim, "O gloomy vision, menacing presage!" but Stratonice soon calls upon Pauline to forget it and listen to their song, which is now resumed in all its beauty. Pauline, when it has again ended, sees her husband approaching, sends the women away, and awaits him. We now enter upon the second number of the Opera—a duet for Polyeucte and Pauline. The Prince looks sad and oppressed, and his wife, demanding the reason, learns that certain Christians are doomed to death on the morrow. Here a striking phrase, destined for repetition, dominates the orchestra, and arrests attention:—



Pauline attempts to justify the sacrifice, but Polyeucte in return so manifests his sympathy with the victims that she sees her worst anticipations realised, and makes a passionate appeal, responding to which Polyeucte reassures her, and speaks of the coming of Sévère, in whose honour the Christians are to perish. Pauline had regarded Sévère as dead, and now explains to her husband the relation in which they formerly stood. But Polyeucte has no fear of the meeting, and the duet continues with more protestations of anxiety from the wife and more reassuring words from the husband. So far we see nothing very remarkable in the music. It is fluent and expressive, but not of any striking excellence. The duet is at last brought to an end by Stratonice, who announces that Néarque awaits her master. "What have you to do with that friend of the new God?" exclaims Pauline, and is answered, "Have no fear." Polyeucte goes away, and Pauline sadly murmurs, "Rush on the fate that the gods have revealed to me." We now pass from the chamber to a public place in Mitylene. All is bright and gay. There are triumphal arches, and palms, and crowns; soldiers march across the stage, and everywhere the eye rests upon an enthusiastic crowd assembled to welcome the conquering general. After a fanfare, comes a triumphal march, with chorus in B major, considerably varied as to style and character, but having one broad salient theme:—

The varied nature of this triumphal music may, perhaps, be dictated by the diversified features in the procession it accompanies; and there can be no question that the music itself, through the simplicity and massiveness of its choral portions, harmonises with the scene and produces the best effect. When it comes to an end, Félix, attended by his family and officers, welcomes Sévère.

After the first stately greetings, Sévère assures the Governor that he has brought with him fond remembrances, but Pauline at once defines the actual situation by introducing Polyeucte as her husband. The blow strikes home, and all present notice the agitation it causes. Throughout this scene M. Gounod employs quasi-recitative with occasional cantabile passages, using the orchestra in a very full, rich, and suggestive manner. Now the number expands into a quartett, with chorus, in B major, passing into A flat. Brief restless phrases, both for voices and orchestra, show the distress of Sévère, and the varied feelings of his hosts. Presently the crowd, knowing nothing of the matter, begin chanting the praises of their hero in strains which contrast well with those of the solo voices; and eventually, at the change of key, we have a grand ensemble, while from the violins ring out one of those impassioned melodies of which M. Gounod, as well as Wagner, has the secret:—

The quartett and chorus lead without break to a resumption of the triumphal music, and so, with immense jubilation and brilliant effect, this important number and the first act end.

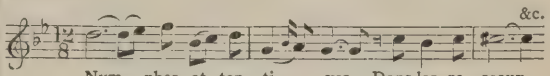
When next the curtain rises we see a garden and a temple of Vesta illuminated by the setting sun. The stage is empty, remaining so while a five-part chorus in B flat, "Que le myrte et la rose," is sung behind the scenes. This, a strain of congratulation and thankfulness, is addressed to Sévère, who might indeed be well pleased with it, for, though very simple—nothing more than a plainly harmonised melody—it is very charming and refreshing after the previous turmoil. Thus it begins:—

and is expanded to considerable dimensions. As it ends, Sévère enters the garden. "In my breast howls the tempest," he exclaims, "despair is in my heart;" and, thus moved, he sings a passionate song, "O dieux! O puissances célestes!" in F sharp minor. He despises his glory, since he cannot lay it at Pauline's feet, and dwells bitterly on the fact that another possesses her; while it must be said that his music is uncompromising in its fidelity to the situation. The song may truly be called "ungrateful," but masterly for all that, and one with which a dramatic singer could make an assured effect. At the close, Sévère, observing the approach of Pauline, stands aside, and the heroine enters, directing her attendants to pass into the temple, while herself remains kneeling on the threshold. Then begins a truly beautiful and expressive prayer to the goddess, "Chaste déesse, en qui j'espère"—one that in its grace and simplicity reminds us of the religious music of Gluck. The opening bars well show its general character:—

In the course of her prayer Pauline reveals that she had wedded Polyeucte in obedience to the wishes of her father, and Sévère overhears. So, when she rises from her knees, he confronts her with reproaches for having accepted a "detested spouse." Pauline solemnly answers, and the point is made doubly impressive by the musician's treatment, "Non, Sévère, je l'aime." Once more the love-lorn warrior falls into the depths of despair, while Pauline, in a delightful cantabile passage, appeals to his manliness and generosity. The struggle is a hard one, but, after Pauline passionately demands why he had come to trouble her, Sévère invokes the goddess to witness that their love had passed, and calls upon his companion to carry her prayers to the feet of Vesta. Pauline accepts the challenge, beseeching that the broken heart of Sévère might be healed, and that he himself might become the saviour of her husband. To the astonished exclamation of the soldier she replies that Polyeucte is in danger, and that she confides in him to preserve his life. Another appeal to his generosity follows, this time with instant success, and the long duet ends with an ensemble of the most intense and strenuous character. The theme begins as subjoined:—

The interview over, Pauline retires to the temple, and darkness falls upon the scene. But Sévère remains, presently again concealing himself as Polyeucte enters, accompanied by the Christian, Néarque. The Prince seeing Pauline in the temple, would linger, but Néarque urges him away, for "the Lord of lords demands the heart's first affection." And Sévère hears all. So ends the first tableau. In this section of the work the duet stands pre-eminent at once for dramatic character and musical interest. It is a number which can never be heard without admiration.

With the change of scene we pass to a retired spot in the midst of rocks and trees. A river flows in the background, and on the right a fountain sparkles in the moonbeams. At first no one is visible; but, after an orchestral introduction, full of mystery and passion, we hear from up the river the graceful strains of a barcarole—one of the most original and beautiful numbers in the work, and one, therefore, certain to be popular. It is written in B flat, 12-8, and accompanied very delicately. The singer calls upon the nymphs and naiads of the place to come out and sport with the gods who are awaiting them in the glades of the wood:—



His voice approaches nearer, and with the second verse a boat, bearing dames and gallants, floats down the stream. Gaily they pass as the singer, Sextus, a young patrician, speaks of the love of Diana and Endymion. Then the boat disappears, and, during the third verse of the barcarole the music fades in the distance. All this is only an episode intended to set off by contrast what follows; for no sooner is the song ended than Simeon, an aged Christian, enters. He has heard the Pagan ditty, and, in stern monotone, prays that the lying gods may, like the boat, pass away into gloom and be no more seen. Other Christians are visible among the rocks, and after a while the orchestra breaks into a religious march pp, not specially severe in point of character:—

It is but brief, for now the Christians challenge one another, the password, "Christus," going from mouth to mouth. All gather round their aged leader (the March resuming while they do so), who exclaims, "The Lord be with you;" and is answered in like terms on simple tonic and dominant chords. Then follows "To your knees," the crowd submissively responding; and Simeon leads the devotions of his brethren, the orchestra accompanying him in unison, the congregation repeating the strain in harmony:—

The "service" strictly preserves this character throughout, each section being given as a solo by Simeon, and taken up by the people. Then the Christians call to mind their sufferings, but Simeon, in powerful phrases, speaks of the glory of martyrdom, and breaks in again into fervid prayer, "Lord, give those who are no more the eternal crown of Thy holy elect," the people echoing his strains in massive, simple harmony. As the solemn music ends, the orchestra gives out short, broken phrases, previously heard when Néarque and Polyeucte appeared in the garden, and Néarque himself, followed by the Prince, is seen among the rocks at the back. Once more the watchword passes, and a phrase of the March is played while the new-comers make their way to the front. "I bring you a brother who aspires to baptism" exclaims Néarque; and as the crowd start in surprise on recognising the convert, Sévère, unnoticed by them, glides behind a rock where he can witness all that goes on. On his knees, Polyeucte demands to be received and baptised, and the congregation answers "Qu'il soit ainsi." Then, both approaching the fountain, Simeon exacts a vow of fidelity, the neophyte responding "I promise it," after every clause. This done, Simeon pours water upon his head, and in the name of the Trinity pronounces him a Christian, upon which the harps burst in with triumphant chords, a jubilant strain rings out from the full orchestra, the multitude all rise, exclaiming, "Glory to God," and Polyeucte in an ecstasy invokes the divine happiness which fills his soul. This portion of the scene is made singularly effective by the device (used in the prison-scene of "Faust") of repeating a theme in a sequence of keys, each rising one note of the scale; the power and intensity of the music naturally increasing at every step. Nothing can be more simple than the choral refrain thus treated:—

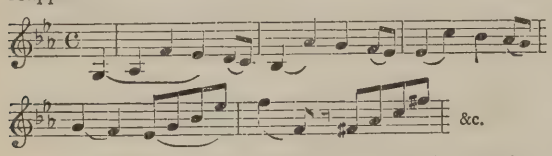
The first delicious sensations over, Polyeucte humbly prays, in a short Andante, that his heart may be washed as with water; and here we meet with a melody in the orchestra which should be noticed because it afterwards reappears:—



The rest of the number consists of reiterated ascriptions of praise and expressions of thankfulness, ending with a grand and massive ensemble, in which the melody just quoted is given to the strings with splendid effect. At this point the curtain falls for the second time, leaving us impressed by the elevation and dignity, as well as dramatic importance, of M. Gounod's work.

The third act opens in a hall of the palace, where Polyeucte, Félix, Sévère, and Albin, High Priest of Jupiter, are discovered. After a short orchestral passage these personages begin to discourse about the Christians, upon whom Félix calls for vengeance. But, to the general astonishment, Sévère rises and protests against such persecution, with which he, for one, will have nothing to do. The noble soldier admires the martyrs' constancy and courage, and makes no secret of the fact. On this Félix bids all repair to the temple of Jupiter, where the gods themselves would decide the Christians' fate. But Sévère warns him that noble heads may have to fall, and, when Félix answers that the believers in the new faith are the dregs of the people, reveals that he himself has witnessed the baptism of one equal to any then present. The Governor demands the convert's name, and, not obtaining it, avows that he would devote his own family to death should they turn from the orthodox creed. Then, accompanied by the High Priest, he sets out for the temple, leaving Sévère and Polyeucte together. All the foregoing is set to the usual quasi-recitative, and presents no features which it is essential to indicate. Sévère at once urges Polyeucte to guard his own life for the sake of those he loves, but the convert professes himself willing to die for his faith whenever called upon. Then follows an air for Sévère, "Quoi! c'est peu de perdre Pauline!" in F sharp, and consisting of, first, an Andante; next, a Larghetto in A flat; next, a short Moderato in G minor. The Larghetto is especially beautiful and full of intensity, as Sévère declares how devotedly he would worship Pauline were she his; while the Moderato, through which runs another of M. Gounod's expressive melodies for the violins, brings the number to an effective end. At its close Sévère departs, and Polyeucte, fervidly exclaiming, "God calls me, I am ready," is about to follow, when Néarque appears. The Christian teacher inquires of his proselyte, "Whither do you go?" and is answered, "To the temple." "Fly the heathen altars," he urges, but Polyeucte replies, "I will overturn them and die in the temple where they lie scattered." Here the music breaks into a march-like movement, highly energetic and stimulating:—

In contrast with this are Néarque's solemn warnings:—

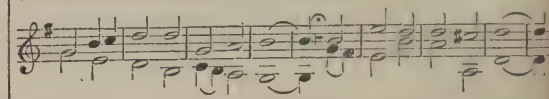
warnings which Polyeucte disdains. Finally, Néarque resolves to share his convert's fate, and the duet ends with a repetition of the tempo di marcia by both the men, who exclaim "Let us go and break these gods of stone and metal." The scene now changes to a public place in front of the temple of Jupiter, and, as the orchestra begins a pompous march, the head of a procession appears. Heralds and priests, magistrates and soldiers defile across the stage, and with them Félix, Sévère, Polyeucte, Néarque, and Pauline; the crowd the while joining in a chorus, "Gloire aux maîtres du monde," characterised by the usual simplicity and massiveness of the choral numbers in the work. When Polyeucte and Néarque reach the front the chorus is suspended, and the Prince adjures his companion, "Néarque, be ready—we go to martyrdom." A moment after and the jubilant ensemble begins again, continuing till the head of the procession enters the temple, those outside ranging themselves on the steps and among the columns. The "Fête Païenne" now begins, for which M. Gounod has written no fewer than seven different pieces of ballet music—an Invocation to the god Pan and a Pastoral, a War March to Bellona, a slow movement to accompany the appearance of Venus and Valse de Neréïdes, a Dance of Venus, music to attend the apparition of Bacchus, with a Dance of Bacchus, and, lastly, a Bacchanale. We have no hesitation in saying that these ballet airs are among the most charming the lyric stage possesses. They are so full of tune, fancy, and suggestiveness, that their popularity separate from the Opera cannot be for a moment in doubt. The whole revel comes to a startling conclusion. In full career, the Bacchanale is arrested by some bars of Adagio, and then from an organ behind the scenes peals out the Choral which forms part of the orchestral introduction:—



We cannot but think that here M. Gounod makes a mistake. No doubt the contrast is striking and suggestive, while the spectacle of the dancers terrified and motionless makes a deep impression. But one's realistic notions receive a shock, because if, as we have seen, the Christians carry on their worship by night in secret places, it is not likely that they will intrude religious hymns upon a Pagan solemnity. The Choral ended, the temple-doors open, and Albin appears calling upon the people to cease their revellings because the gods are angry and demand the sacrifice of the Christians. Then steps forth Polyeucte, burning with zeal, and exclaiming "Priest, thou liest!"

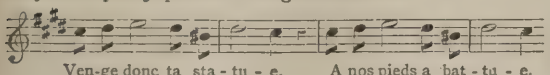
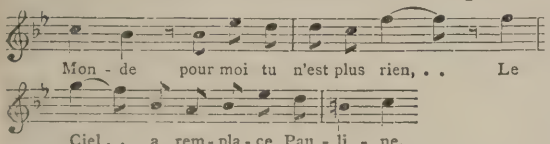
In an agony Pauline calls upon her husband; the people cry, "O madness!" Félix shouts, "O sacrilege!" Sévère sadly murmurs, "He is lost;" and Albin warningly says, "Woe to him who outrages me, I speak in the name of the gods." But Polyeucte is not to be turned aside. In a grand declamatory Adagio he hurls anathema upon the gods of murder, incest, and adultery, Néarque presently joining with him. Then, while Pauline prays to Jupiter for mercy, the two Christians mount the steps of the temple and hurl the images from their pedestals, the crowd giving forth a cry of horror as they do so. A brief silence ensues, followed by a burst of triumphant sarcasm from Polyeucte and Néarque, as they call upon Jupiter to avenge himself:—



What the god fails to do his priest attempts. Seizing a hatchet Albin rushes on Polyeucte, who is guarded, at a word from Sèvère, by the soldiers. Less fortunate, Néarque is struck down and dies, calling upon Jesus to receive his spirit, at which point—amid immense agitation, while Pauline prays for her husband, Polyeucte demands to share the fate of his friend, and the people call for vengeance—begins a grand concluding ensemble, one of the longest in the work, and also one of the most vigorous and exciting. The curtain descends while still the infuriated priests and mob strive to reach Polyeucte and tear him to pieces.

The fourth act opens in Polyeucte's prison. The destined martyr is thinking of Pauline, and in a beautiful and expressive Andante prays to be delivered from the temptations that assail him. He feels the divine strength:—



The air is considerably extended and in M. Gounod's most passionate vein. But now the cell-door opens and Pauline enters. She has come to persuade her husband to abjure his faith and live. Earnestly she pleads her love, but Polyeucte, lifting his hands and eyes to heaven, invokes Néarque to support his resolution. More than this, he takes from his bosom the Christian scriptures, and reads in monotone the story of the Nativity, while a pretty pastoral theme is heard from the orchestra:—

Again Pauline remonstrates and entreats, but Polyeucte bethinks him of the death of his master and reads aloud the narrative of the Crucifixion, his voice rising a step of the scale at each sentence, and gathering fervour as it goes. Still the urgency of the wife continues, eventually taking the form of reproach as the unmovable Polyeucte offers a prayer for her conversion:—

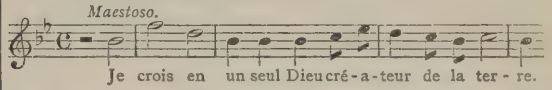
This important duet, of which we will only say that it scarcely meets the requirements of the situation, having ended, Sévère enters the cell, and adds his entreaties to those of Pauline, with no better success. The fatal phrase first quoted above reigns in the orchestra amid all the varied passion of the moment, and we know the end is coming. It is very near indeed, when, as Pauline and Sévère try to drag the martyr away, Félix, with a guard of soldiers, stands on the threshold. Polyeucte may still save his life, but will scarcely grant to fear what he has denied to love. He simply answers Félix, "I am a Christian." Then says the Governor to the guards, who have closed round the prisoner, "Go." "Whither?" asks Sévère. The answer is, "To death!" but Polyeucte cries, "To glory!" The curtain falls as Pauline drops senseless at her father's feet. The whole of the music to this finale is of the most high-strung character, full of masterly touches, and often marked by exquisite sentiment, which bespeaks the poet not less than the musician.

The fifth and last act begins in a public place fronting the arena of Mitylene. A great crowd has gathered, and is singing "Death to the Christians" in turbulent chorus, the music being that of the orchestral introduction to the entire work. Their fierce cries end abruptly as the martyr and his guards appear, while from the violins comes a long-drawn melody, also used in the introduction:—

The procession halts in the Place, while a Centurion on horseback reads the death-judgment. He would save Polyeucte and bids him even now abjure; but the steady convert replies: "Hear, all of you, priests and butchers;" and then begins his confession of Christian faith:—



Even his persecutors admire this courage, interrupting the "Credo" with their exclamations. Into the midst of this impressive scene Pauline now comes with an heroic resolution. She believes in the God that so sustains her husband, and is prepared to share the martyr's fate. Declaring this before all in fervid phrases while the harps strike trumphant chords, she seals her doom. The crowd rage more wildly than ever, but high above their noise is heard the "Credo," sung in octaves by the devoted pair. This situation is continued for some time with ever-increasing intensity, but finally the martyrs are forced into the circus, where the lions await them. A change of scene enables us to follow. The edifice is crowded, and in the centre of the arena kneel Polyeucte and Pauline, for whose blood the multitude begin once more to cry. But the agony is not prolonged. A ray of sunlight falls upon the pair, who sing together, "It is God that glorifies us and calls us to the skies." "Death!" shout the mob. Then we see the grille of the lion's den open, and an official unchaining the beasts. The curtain falls.

We have little to add. "Polyeucte" is hardly an Opera in the accepted sense of the word. It is a great religious work, exalted in its aim, and marked by immense fervour, simplicity, and power. If it may not be heard in our lyric theatres, there is a place for its music in our concert-rooms—at any rate, a place should be found, for it is music we cannot afford to lose.

The Works of Henry Purcell. Volume I. "The Yorkshire Feast-Song." [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

"Purcell," says Dr. Burney, "is as much the boast of England in music as Shakespeare in the drama, Milton in epic poetry, Locke in metaphysics, or Sir Isaac Newton in mathematics and philosophy." That this is true can scarcely admit of a doubt; but whilst the great names in the drama, poetry, metaphysics, and mathematics are kept alive by the sympathies of the many, music has had so few devotees that the works of a man who is the "boast" of our country have been almost allowed to die out. In 1788 Goodison printed as many of the master's compositions as were available; but in spite of his energetic efforts in the cause only about 100 subscribers supported him, and he soon retired from his hopeless task. Forty years afterwards Vincent Novello commenced the publication of Purcell's sacred music, and carried it on with such energy that in a short time he had given to the world what was then thought to be a complete collection. But so far from the genius of this composer having been more especially revealed through his works for the Church, it became well-known that some of his best writings were of a secular character, many indeed for the operatic stage. He is proved to have composed music for nearly fifty dramas, his odes and choral songs still in MS. numbering twenty-four; so that, even reckoning the collections of Goodison and Novello already alluded to, the few printed by himself, and under the auspices of his widow, and three works issued by the Musical Antiquarian Society, it may be imagined how many treasures are still hidden from us. It should be mentioned that since the publication of Novello's edition of the master's sacred music a folio volume has been discovered in the Royal Library containing many of his anthems with symphonies and instrumental parts, odes, and miscellaneous songs; and at York Minster several other volumes of his sacred music have come to light. It will be thus seen that the labour of publishing a complete edition of Purcell's works is no light one; but the materials being fairly before us, it required only that a number of artists and lovers of art should form themselves into an Association pledged to rescue from comparative obscurity the compositions of one who has shed such lustre upon English music. Happily this has now been accomplished: the "Purcell Society," formed in 1876 for the publication of this composer's works, most of which exist only in manuscript, and also for meeting to study and perform his compositions, is now in active operation, and the Ode at the head of our notice, composed in the year 1689 for the annual gathering in London of the gentry of the county of York, is the first volume issued. As a proof that the music of this Ode was fully appreciated on the occasion for which it was written, we may mention that in D'Urfey's "Pills to Purge Melancholy" we find the whole of the words of the "Yorkshire Feast-Song," with the heading "An Ode on the Assembly of the Nobility and Gentry of the City and County of York at the Anniversary Feast, March the 27th, 1690. Set to Musick by Mr. Henry Purcell. One of the finest compositions he ever made, and cost £100 the performing." Considering how zealous have been the exertions of Mr. W. H. Cummings in promoting the formation of the Purcell Society, and how energetically he has devoted himself to the cause, no fitter person could have been selected to edit the present volume; and it need scarcely be said how excellently he has performed his task. In his preface he says: "I possess two complete scores of the work in his (Purcell's) own handwriting, and an old transcript bearing the same date; there is also another very interesting copy of the score in a volume largely in Purcell's hand, and formerly in the possession of Purcell's son and grandson, but now happily preserved in the library of Her Majesty the Queen;" so that with these authentic records at hand we may feel perfectly assured that the work is here published precisely as the composer wrote it. Much, too, could be said, not only upon the excellent taste apparent in the "getting up" of the volume—the title-page, with a portrait of the composer, being in perfect sympathy with the general design—but upon the clear appearance both of the music and the letter-press; indeed, we have scarcely ever seen a more perfect specimen of engraving. With this tangible proof of the Society's efforts before us, there can be little doubt that the earnestness of purpose which has called the Association into existence will continue to animate the members in the noble task they have undertaken. But earnestness of purpose is not sufficient; the Society must largely increase before great results can be looked for, and we sincerely hope, therefore, that all Purcell-lovers will co-operate in the movement by enrolling their names as subscribers to a cause which should be so dear to the hearts of Englishmen.

Novello's Music Primers. Edited by Dr. Stainer.
Instrumentation, by Ebenezer Prout, B.A.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Mr. Prout has so amply proved by his orchestral works how thoroughly he has mastered the subject of instrumentation that we could scarcely doubt his power of minutely analysing the capabilities of the several instruments, and supporting his remarks by quotations from the scores of the best masters. But in reviewing his contribution to the rapidly increasing series of "Music Primers" we must award him praise far beyond that which should be accorded to one who has merely displayed an accurate knowledge of the almost inexhaustible resources of orchestration, for throughout his task he has never ceased to remember that he is a teacher—never allowed his enthusiasm for the art so to override his judgment as to make him forget that he is addressing a tyro—and in that respect, apart from the excellent material of which his treatise is composed, we cannot but believe that his work will supplant many of those which are even more complex and more fully developed. A student desirous of acquiring the art of instrumentation is of course presumed to be already a musician; and we are glad to find that, although every instrument is explained most minutely, the author strongly urges the necessity of some practical knowledge of their individual characteristics before attempting to use them in combination. "Even a little knowledge of the violin," he says, "will be of the greatest assistance to the composer of orchestral writing. If the student, too, can play nothing more than a scale on the flute, oboe, clarinet, or bassoon, it will be an advantage; while some acquaintance with the theory, if not with the practice, of the brass instruments will often save him from writing ineffectively for that important part of the orchestra." This is excellent advice, and well worth pondering by those whose ambition is apt to outstrip their knowledge; for we have within our own experience instances of even clever young musicians being placed in an awkward position amongst their fellow-students by having written passages which cannot by any possibility be played upon the instruments for which they were intended. As we have already said, the author of the work before us has the somewhat exceptional power of putting himself in the position of the pupil as well as the master; and this is especially shown in his chapter on stringed instruments, the most important, and certainly one of the best, in the book. Many authors, for example, tell us that double notes and extended chords can be played on the violin, and even furnish a list of the combinations which are capable of execution; but we have never before met with one who gives such conclusive reasons for some being easy, some more difficult, and others impossible, or who, in true sympathy with the performer as well as the composer, directs the attention of the student rather to what should be, than what may be, written. The short illustrations, too, in confirmation of the principles laid down in this chapter, are extremely happy, one great merit in the selection of these examples—and indeed in that of all throughout the book—being that, although the works of the most modern writers, Wagner more especially, are freely drawn upon, not only are extracts from the scores of Mozart, Haydn, and Beethoven given, but an earnest study of the manner in which these great masters use the various instruments strongly recommended. The description of the wind instruments merits the warmest praise, for, in addition to the explanation of their compass and resources, the weak points of each are carefully demonstrated. The transposing instruments—more particularly horns and clarinets—receive a large share of attention; and we are certain that any student of average intelligence, after attentively reading the pages devoted to this important subject, will become as perfectly acquainted with it as any book can make him. The quotations of horn passages from the standard scores are remarkably happy; and here it may be well to mention that in the extract from Auber's "Lestocq," in D minor, a B flat is placed at the signature of the horn part, an error which might perplex a beginner, especially as the author says that "the student will note here the manner in which the horn is used in a minor key." In the explanation of trumpets, trombones, and percussion instruments we have some very acute remarks both upon their use and abuse, it being truly observed, in speaking of trombones, that even Beethoven uses them very sparingly; a truth which we can, from our own knowledge, affirm is often ignored by adding them to some of the scores of this composer which can least bear so unwarrantable an intrusion. Examples taken from Schubert and Mendelssohn well illustrate the effect of trombones in piano passages, and mention is also made of the beautiful melody played by three trombones in unison in the first movement of Schubert's Symphony in C. One feature which should especially recommend this work to students is that, in addition to the lucid explanations of all the instruments used in a modern orchestra, the author particularly enlarges upon what may be termed the genius of each, and wisely cautions inexperienced composers against writing for one instrument what from its essential character belongs to another. The balance of tone, too, in combination is especially dwelt upon; and the arrangement of instrumentation when allied with voices is also a subject which occupies a large portion of the book, many excellent hints being here given, and illustrated by well-chosen quotations. It can scarcely be expected that in the short space at our disposal we can do more than indicate the salient points in Mr. Prout's Treatise; but we trust that we have said enough to enlist the attention of all interested in the subject to the merits of a work which, although an invaluable manual for students, may also, we believe, prove of much service to many who have long been out of their musical school-days.

Novello's Music Primers. Edited by Dr. Stainer.
Fugue, by James Higgs, Mus. Bac., Oxon.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

"This Primer on Fugue," the author tells us in his preface, "is addressed to all who hear or play fugues as well as to students who desire to write them." His very valuable book may even reach a fourth class of readers; people who certainly cannot play fugues, who do not take the trouble to write them, and do not care about them when they hear them; but who are irresistibly attracted towards anything possessing an anatomy capable of being pulled to pieces and reconstructed. Music is a kind of all-pervading atmosphere consisting of palpable atoms of varied structure; some of them having an affinity for metaphysics, some for mechanics. Mr. Higgs assumes that his readers possess a knowledge and a skill in the practice of double counterpoint. That condition might exclude a few metaphysicians and engineers; but if they only know what double counterpoint is, they can readily form a perfect working plan of the mechanism of a fugue by paying ordinary attention to the first few pages of Mr. Higgs's Primer. No one should take up a volume in this educational series of publications under the impression that from their generic title they are adapted only to young people. When we compare them with the musical manuals and catechisms of forty or fifty years ago, we are at once reminded of the really extraordinary advance that has since been made in the system of elementary education. The young mind is not nowadays treated as a mere receptacle to be stuffed with miscellaneous materials. It is allowed to possess certain assimilating properties; and the materials supplied undergo a process of preparation in conformity with that view. Even on so mechanical a subject as the fugue it makes a vast difference if the pieces of the machinery, when described separately, are described carelessly in regard to their adaptation to what Mr. Higgs calls "the construction of a fugue as a whole." He himself never seems to lose sight of that ultimate object. Hence his most elementary explanations possess a particular charm; and for no one so much as the young student, who is repelled by the older method of instruction, and likes to have credit for the exercise of thought as well as memory. Mr. Higgs's method is of the highest importance in the subject he explains, because musical students are apt to learn too exclusively from isolated examples. Examples are much more necessary in fugue and counterpoint than in harmony. In counterpoint they are definite and precise illustrations. In harmony they are often duly assumed illustrations of a particular theory. Mr. Higgs's examples are mostly from Bach, as we should expect from an enthusiastic and a well-known worshipper of that august and transcendent idol of contrapuntists; but he is too free from narrow prejudices not to avail himself of a "masterly stretto" by Gounod when it suits his purposes.

We do not think we have ever seen in any work on the fugue a clearer explanation of what is called the "Exposition" than Mr. Higgs gives in his first four chapters; in which the aids of example and letterpress are most happily combined. The "Exposition" consists of firstly, subject; secondly, answer; thirdly, counterpoint—when simple—and called counter-subject when the counterpoint is double; fourthly, the codetta; fifthly, the "redundant entry" of the subject, when that device is employed. Mr. Higgs then explains the "counter-exposition," an inverted edition of the "exposition," and, in its closer treatment foreshadowing the stretto. Then follows the first "episode," introduced for variety's sake, and formed of fragments of the subject, or countersubject, or of incidental counterpoints. Gradually through the second principal group in the fugue-form, which to a certain extent corresponds to the "free fantasia" in the sonata form, and wherein the composer employs all his art in the devices of imitation, inversion, augmentation, and diminution, we are led to the second episode, the coda, stretto, pedal and final close. When all these separate parts are minutely explained we come to the "construction of a fugue as a whole"; and this branch of the subject is assisted by a novelty in the shape of "charts" or diagrams consisting of two, three, four, or five horizontal lines, according to the number of parts in the fugue, and divided by vertical lines representing alternate bars numbered 1, 3, 5, &c. So that in the whole fugue we see at a glance on the chart where the different subjects and counter-subjects enter, where the episodes occur, and where the entries are shortened in the intervals of reply, and when the subject or countersubject is direct or inverted. Comparing the chart with the complete fugues given to us in the Primer in musical notation,—and in open score, even when taken from Bach's forty-eight clavier fugues—we have a mechanical aid we ourselves have found most interesting; and we are quite certain many hundreds of students will in the future adopt the system of analysis Mr. Higgs has provided.

These "charts" remind us of one or two little points that occurred to us in perusing this Primer. Mr. Higgs adopts the definition of a tonal fugue as a fugue written in a Church tone; the subject of the fugue if at the interval of a fifth is authentic, and the reply at a fourth will be plagal. As we put it the description is rather in Greek fashion than in that of the Church modes; but it comes to the same thing if we consider the subject, C—G, as in the tone C♮, divided by the dominant, and the answer, G—C, in the plagal octave of that scale divided by the tonic. We quite agree with Mr. Higgs that such is the manifest theory, if not definition, of a tonal fugue. There is, however, a little of history in the question that requires clearing up. We are generally told that of the two kinds of fugue the tonal is the more modern. That cannot be so, if we are to consider, as we think we may do, the real fugue to be a product of the modern tonality and the tonal fugue of the old tonality. We imagine the way to reconcile history with the apparent facts is simply this—that both descriptions of fugue have been a contemporaneous growth; but the progenitor of the real fugue was the canon at strict interval, one of the earliest contrapuntal forms. The tonal fugue was historically an intermediate event between the canon and the free real fugue of later times. The real fugue is therefore more ancient in respect only to its original form when issuing as it were from its prototype the canon.

Another point is the question of modulation in the fugue; on which subject we have nothing to offer at this moment by way of a substitute for the common rules quoted in the Primer from Cherubini; but Mr. Higgs so evidently throws the rules at us as if he presented them, such as they are, without accepting any responsibility on his own part, that we are inclined to ask the question, is it possible to teach the theory of the fugue with our modern notions of key with two modes, major and minor? Shall we not have to go back, and very far back, to get an inkling of what we desire to teach? The method of describing the related keys quoted in paragraph 129 from Cherubini is to our individual notions the very acme of unsystematic rule of thumb; and we know what it leads to in practice. It has been pointed out over and over again that musicians intend to write in the Me mode, and from habit they write in the Lah mode, or vice versâ. There is a vestige of this question in Chart No. 6, where the subject in Bach's C♯ minor fugue is led off in the key, and the chart shows us that the fugue finishes in F♯ because the subject in the second treble is in that key. As a question of fact, the cadence being plagal, the harmony keeps the subject in the original key, C♯.

The whole question is that of putting new wine into old bottles—the "old bottles" being the ancient system of modes still flourishing when the fugue was born, and not yet extinct. It is rather curious, although the explanation may appear obvious, that if we collect the keys given in Mr. Higgs's Chart No. 6 (Fugue C♯ minor) we get the scale 1, 7♭, 6♭, 5, 4, 3♭ (2), 1; the ordinary minor scale in descending. The No. 2 is employed by Bach (bars 66, 68) in the same part (the first treble) as No. 1, and evidently, as an excrescence or not, as absolutely necessary to the development of the fugue. It may show some technical system of modulation derived from the scale and not practised in our time. The shorter fugue (G minor), in Chart No. 4, is according to the same system hexachordal; and the B flat minor fugue (Chart No. 5) gives the Pentaphonic Scale.

Mr. Higgs naturally avoids any speculative questions; and has in the guise of a Primer produced a standard little work on the Fugue; which can be read with equal interest by the learner or the practised contrapuntist.

Christmas Carols, New and Old. Third Series. The words edited by the Rev. H. R. Bramley, M.A. The music edited by John Stainer, M.A., Mus. Doc.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

We are glad to welcome the appearance of a third series of Christmas Carols from the experienced hands of Mr. Bramley and Dr. Stainer, and to feel assured, as we do, from a careful examination of the work, that the high reputation justly gained by the two earlier series will not be impaired by the new one just published, as too often happens in similar ventures. The new series consists of twenty-six Carols, the words by a variety of authors, some of them unknown, representing every century from the fifteenth to the nineteenth. Of the melodies eight are ancient and eighteen original; and when it is mentioned that among the composers who have contributed are Dr. Steggall, Mr. Gadsby, Mr. Prout, and Mr. Thorne, not to enumerate others of greater or less note, enough has been said to convince those who are casting about for suitable Christmas music that here they will have novelty and merit worthily combined. The Editors give a caution which is not unnecessary. They point out that of the twenty-six Carols eleven might be wisely excluded from Divine Service, and they add a similar suggestion with respect to the two previous series, furnishing indeed the numbers of the Carols, which now amount to sixty-eight in all, from which selections should be made for use in Church. The others, they say, may be fitly reserved for less solemn places and occasions. Along with these three series of Carols there is published, we observe, a selection of twenty-four of the most popular of the Carols arranged for men's voices, for use as open-air music on winter nights, when soprano voices, either of boys or women, are not easily obtained.

Intermezzi Sinfonici, di Luigi Mancinelli, per la Cleopatra di P. Cossa. Edizione privilegiata in partitura d'orchestra. [Florence, 1878: G. G. Guidi.]

In these orchestral Intermezzi, which have just been published in the above handy score edition, Signor Mancinelli, the young and rising composer and conductor of the Apollo Theatre at Rome, has evidently aimed at something higher than a mere musical entr'acte diversion. The compositions are six in number—comprising an Overtura, Marcia trionfale, Battaglia d'Azio, Scherzo-orgia, Andante per quartetto ed arpa, and Marcia funebre—and are intended to illustrate certain portions of a drama by P. Cossa, entitled "Cleopatra." Thus the Intermezzi are a species of "programme" music, partly descriptive partly reflective, in which a certain local colouring is successfully sustained, while abundant evidence is furnished also of the composer's skill in the production of orchestral effects. The overture, especially, is a spirited impromptu composition, consisting of one movement only, which forms an appropriate index to the drama, and may be heard to advantage also in the concert-room. A somewhat novel effect is produced by the frequent use made of the harp in conjunction with violin passages. The music is none the worse for bearing traces here and there (and particularly in the two Marches) of the composer's intimate acquaintance with the later scores of Wagner and Verdi; there being sufficient originality in them to stamp these Intermezzi as the independent productions of a musician of no mean talent. Since their first performance in December last at Rome, the Intermezzi Sinfonici have made the round of Italian concert-rooms with great success, and have also been introduced at one of the recent Exhibition Concerts at Paris.

Stabat Mater. Composed by Emanuel Astorga. The pianoforte accompaniment arranged by Robert Franz.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The composer of this work—born in Sicily about the year 1681—became a great favourite at the court of the Emperor Leopold at Vienna, and produced, it is believed at Barcelona, a Pastoral of his composition called "Dafné," which achieved a remarkable success. His "Stabat Mater," now published in the octavo form, with a pianoforte accompaniment arranged by Robert Franz, is a very excellent specimen of his style, the sympathetic and somewhat melancholy nature of the composer being faithfully reflected in the music throughout. Many of the solos are extremely melodious and expressive, but we would especially draw attention to the opening Chorus, "Stabat Mater," which contains much clever and artistic writing.

The Dream. A Serenata. Written by William Bartholomew on the occasion of the marriage of Her Highness the Princess Royal of England with His Royal Highness Prince Frederick William of Prussia. The music composed and dedicated to their Royal Highnesses by Sir Michael Costa. The pianoforte accompaniment arranged by Charles Lucas. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

We have often wondered that this graceful and melodious Serenata should have been so long allowed to remain comparatively unknown. True it is that, written for a special occasion, like many other works produced under similar circumstances, it has scarcely been at all submitted to the judgment of the general public; but we are convinced that it has abstract musical merits which should preserve its vitality; and the edition now before us—which contains a clever pianoforte accompaniment by the composer's friend, the late Charles Lucas—will doubtless be the means of introducing the composition to the many choral Societies in search of novelty.

FOREIGN NOTES.

The first performance of M. Gounod's new five-act Opera, "Polyeucte," the production of which, at one or the other of the lyric establishments of Paris, had been anticipated at intervals by the musical press for some years past, has at last been realised at the National Opera, where the work was brought out on the 7th ult. as the great operatic novelty of the International Exhibition. We have noticed the work so fully in another part of the present number that we need only record here the complete success of the first representation, and that the Opera has since almost exclusively occupied the stage of the national theatre.

Another event in the operatic world of Paris was the first production, last month, at the Théâtre-Ventadour of "Les Amants de Vérone," the work of an amateur, the Marquis d'Ivry, who is the author of both libretto and music. The new Opera (which, by the way, the composer is said to have completed some twenty years ago), although founded on the same subject as M. Gounod's "Roméo et Juliette," and thus inviting a comparison with the work of a favourite composer, was nevertheless very well received, a result to which the excellent singing of Mdlle. Heilbronn and M. Capoul in the principal rôles is said to have contributed not a little.

At one of the numerous organ recitals which have recently been given on the powerful instrument erected in the Salle des Fêtes of the Trocadéro, M. Camille Saint-Saëns created a deep impression upon a numerous audience by his remarkable playing. Among the pieces selected by the gifted artist-composer were, besides three "Rhapsodies Bretonnes" and the Prelude to the Oratorio, "Le Déluge," of his own composition, a Prelude and Fugue by Bach, and Liszt's légende musicale, "St. Francis of Assisi preaching to the birds." This series of excellent Recitals terminated on the 8th ult.

According to the new regulations, which have just obtained the official sanction of the Marshal-President, the Paris Conservatoire admits pupils from nine to twenty-two years of age; whereas the salaries of professors have been fixed at 3,000 francs for composition, and at from 1,500 to 2,400 francs for the remaining branches of musical tuition. The examinations for admission of new pupils commenced on the 28th ult., and will extend over a fortnight, applications having to be accompanied by certificates of birth and of vaccination. M. Massenet, the well-known composer, has, it is announced, been nominated professor of counterpoint, fugue, and composition at the institution referred to, in the room of the late M. F. Bazin.

M. Ambroise Thomas, the composer of "Mignon," and Director of the Paris Conservatoire, has just been married to Mdlle. Elvire Rémaury, sister of the accomplished pianiste, Madame Montigny-Rémaury. M. Thomas is sixty-eight years of age.

The new season of the Paris Concerts-Populaires, under the direction of M. Pasdeloup, was to be inaugurated on the 27th ult. Previous to the recommencement of the performances of this excellent institution, the conductor gave two extra concerts at the Trocadéro (of which the respective programmes will be found in our usual appendix), in order to introduce his sterling orchestra to the amateur visitors to the International Exhibition. The Châtelet Concerts were likewise to resume their performances on the 27th ult.

The production of M. Leo Delibes' Opera, "Le Roi l'a dit," has been prohibited by the authorities of the Copenhagen stage, "from political motives."

The newly founded "Hoch'sche Conservatorium" at Frankfurt was formally opened by the Burgomaster of the ancient free town, Herr Mumm, on September 25, on which occasion the director, Herr Joachim Raff, delivered an appropriate speech, in which he traced the history of the art to the diffusion of which the institution will be devoted. The festive proceedings terminated with a musical performance, in which M. Josef Rubinstein, Herr Julius Stockhausen, and other professors of the young and promising institution took part.

The Society of Patrons of the Bayreuth "Bühnen-Festspiele" has just published a circular explaining the general aims it has in view, as well as stating the conditions of membership. The latter, as some of our readers may be interested to know, consist in the annual minimum subscription of M. 15 (fifteen shillings), which will entitle members to a free entrance to the projected first performance in 1880 at Bayreuth of "Parsifal," as well as to the regular receipt, gratis, of the "Bayreuther Blätter," a monthly publication issued under the auspices and with the co-operation of Richard Wagner. The tickets for the performance in question will be personal, and can only be transferred upon application being made to the central committee. The Society consists at present of 1,350 members. The musical composition of the poet-composer's new drama "Parsifal" has, notwithstanding statements to the contrary, already reached an advanced stage; and Herr Kellermann, a professor at the Sterns'che Conservatorium of Berlin, is at present engaged at Bayreuth, upon the elaboration, under the composer's supervision, of the pianoforte arrangement of the score.

The performances at the Leipzig Stadt-Theater of Wagner's "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung" continue to attract crowded audiences, and the whole mise-en-scène is said to be in many respects equal to the Bayreuth model. An opinion may be formed of the severe test to which the enthusiasm of the spectators is being subjected by the fact that the average performance of these works occupies the space of some six hours.

At the Royal Opera of Berlin the first performance took place on the 11th inst. of a new Opera in five acts, by J. J. Abert, the Stuttgart Capellmeister, entitled "Ekkehard." The work, which achieved but a moderate success, has, however, been frequently reproduced since that date.

The new season of Italian Opera at the Kroll'sche Theater, at Berlin, was opened on September 30, with "Traviata;" Mdlle. Saurel, Herr Sveet, and Signor Piccioli sustaining the principal rôles. Amongst other works, Verdi's now seldom heard "La Forza del Destino" has since been produced at the same establishment.

Herr Max Bruch, the new leader of the Stern'sche Gesangverein of Berlin, promises the performance during this season of a new work from his pen, viz., a setting of Schiller's "Lay of the Bell."

Franz Liszt writes from Rome (according to the Allgemeine Deutsche Musik-Zeitung) to the Secretary of the Conservatorium at Buda-Pesth, with reference to a new dramatic Oratorio, "St. Stanislaus," the literary author of which is Baron Dingelstedt, and which the Abbé was about to set to music: "Sometimes, when I think of writing music again, I am unconsciously seized by a spirit of discouragement, but I try to ignore it, although I feel that I am unable to express that which is stirring and fermenting in my innermost soul. Yet, whenever I am dissatisfied with myself, I experience all the more the sweet comfort and the ever newly created pleasure proceeding from the works of the past and present masters, and most of all from the sublime Word-Tone-Creations (Wort-Ton-Schöpfungen) of Richard Wagner. Most justly indeed does King Louis II. of Bavaria address that master as the 'Word-Tone-Poet.'" . . .

It is to the Germans we owe the introduction into our language of the expressive term "tone-poet," as distinct from the old-fashioned mere "composer." We trust, however, it will be a long time before we shall admit its latest development of "Word-Tone-Poet," although of royal parentage, into the vocabulary of our art-phraseology!

Madame Christine Nilsson has, it is stated, made arrangements with the impresario Fischhoff for a concert tournée in Germany, commencing on the 1st of December next.

Madame Schumann took part in a recent concert of the Gewandhaus at Leipzig, the occasion being rendered special by the fact of its being the fiftieth anniversary of the first appearance of that lady—then a child of nine years of age—as an executant at that institution.

The répertoire of the Imperial Opera at Vienna promises to be exceptionally prolific in novelties this season. Already first performances have taken place of Gounod's "Philémon et Baucis" and Bizet's "Carmen," while Gounod's "Polyeucte," Rubinstein's "Nero," Thomas's "Amor et Psyché," and Saint-Saëns' "Dalila" are in course of preparation—not to mention Wagner's "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung," the production of which will most likely be deferred until the end of the campaign.

The anniversary of the death of Franz Schubert will be solemnised on the 19th inst. in the Church of the St. Augustine Friars, at Vienna, on which occasion the composer's "German Mass" will be performed by the Viennese Männer-Gesangverein.

Anton Rubinstein was expected at Königsberg at the end of last month, where he was to direct the first performance of his Opera "Feramors." The eminent Russian composer has, it is said, written a new pianoforte Concerto for his compatriot Madame Essipoff.

The fourth volume has just been published of E. van der Straeten's elaborate work entitled "La musique aux Pays-Bas avant le XIXme Siècle," containing numerous hitherto unpublished documents relating to music and musicians, chiefly from the tenth century to the time of the Reformation.

Herr Wilhelmj, the eminent violinist, gave his first concert at Steinway Hall, New York, before an audience of upwards of 5,000 persons, who were most demonstrative in their enthusiasm for the gifted artist.

Madame Spontini, widow of the composer of "La Vestale" and "Fernando Cortez," died on September 30, at Passy, near Paris, at the age of eighty-eight. The deceased lady, who survived the composer twenty-seven years, was the sister of Sebastian Erard, the founder of the modern pianoforte.

Alexandre Villoing, the celebrated teacher of the pianoforte, and author of an as yet unpublished "Méthode de Piano," died recently at St. Petersburg. Both Anton and Josef Rubinstein were among his pupils.

Henri Potier, late professor of the Paris Conservatoire, was struck with paralysis while accompanying a pupil on the pianoforte, and died shortly after, on the 8th ult.

We have also to record the death, at Aix-la-Chapelle, of Friedrich Niederheitmann, well known as an extensive collector and connoisseur of Italian violins, and author of a valuable work on the subject, entitled, "Cremona. Eine Characteristik der italienischen Geigenbauer und ihrer Instrumente."

We subjoin, as usual, the programmes of Concerts recently given at some of the leading institutions abroad:—

Paris.—Concert Officiel (September 26): Overture Triomphale (Deffé's); Fragments from "Stabat Mater" (Bourgault-Ducoudray); Overture to "Missolonghi" (Hérold); Fête Musulmane (Hignard); Fragment from Oratorio, "Daniel" (Delahaye); Overture to "Don Quichotte" (Boulanger). Exhibition Concert by M. Pasdeloup (October 10): Overture "Patrie" (Bizet); Symphony, C minor (Beethoven); Entr'acte from "Traviata" (Verdi); Symphonie Fantastique (Ber-lioz); Serenade for strings (Haydn); Overture to "Sémiramis" (Rossini). Second Exhibition Concert by M. Pasdeloup (October 17): Overture to "Oberon" (Weber); Pastoral Symphony (Beethoven); Danse macabre (Saint-Saëns); Larghetto (Mozart); Fragments from "Le Damnation de Faust" (Berlioz); Gavotte (Lulli); Fête bohême (Massenet). Last Concert Officiel (October 10): Kyrie and Gloria from Mass (F. Verrimst); Marche Hongroise (Cte. d'Osmond); Fragments from Pianoforte Concerto (L. Kreutzer); Ode-symphonie, "La Forêt" (Madame de Grandval); "Lénore," symphonie-ballade (Duparc); "L'Harmonie universelle," chorus for six voices (De Lajarte); Violin Concerto (Garcin); "La bénédiction de la Néva" (Nibelle).

Leipzig.—Conservatorium Concert (September 20): Quintett, C major (Beethoven); Pianoforte pieces (Miss Evans, pupil); Polonaise (Pieçonka); Trio, D minor (Schumann). First Gewandhaus Concert (October 10): Symphony, D major (Mozart); Air, with violin accompaniment (Handel); Concerto, D minor (Rubinstein); Air from "Armin" (Hofmann); Pianoforte Soli (Bach, Saint-Saëns, Rubinstein); Symphony, D major (Beethoven).

Berlin.—Second and Third Bilse Concert (September —): Symphony, "Lenore" (Raff); "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage" (Mendelssohn); Danse macabre (Saint-Saëns); Overture, "Tannhäuser" (Wagner); Symphonie espagnole (Lalo); Symphony, No. 1. (Brahms), &c. First Quartett-Soirée of Herr Joachim (October 19): Quartett, C major (Mozart); Quartett, Op. 131 (Beethoven); Quartett, Op. 64 (Haydn).

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

 Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will greatly oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music pages are always stereotyped, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

The letter from a correspondent who signs himself "Onward" shall receive attention in our next number.

F. H. W.—One of the appointments in the King's chapel was that of composer in ordinary, and was held in conjunction with an organist's appointment; the composer was expected to produce a new anthem of his own composition in each of his months of duty, or waiting, as it was technically called. That Greene conscientiously performed his allotted task is evidenced by the large number of anthems he composed; about fifty have been printed, and many of these were written for special Court occasions. It is probable that Handel's antagonism to Greene arose from the fact that the latter was a partisan of Bononcini, Handel's rival. The employment of Handel by the Georges to write music for State occasions was not without precedent. The celebrated Matthew Locke was composer to Charles II., although not one of the staff of the Chapels Royal, and wrote music for the entry of the King into London.

J. Clarence Richardson.—English editions are published of Clementi's "Gradus ad Parnassum" and Plaidy's "Technical Studies." We do not know of any work on Tuning the Piano.

J. S.—You cannot master the subject by perusing books. Place yourself under an able instructor.

H. G. Smith.—We shall always be glad to insert a short account of any concerts of interest which our correspondent may forward to us.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

Beckenham.—The Tonic Sol-fa Association opened the present season with a Concert on Monday the 14th ult. The programme consisted of vocal and instrumental music, the part-singing of the choir being a great feature. The solo vocalists were the Misses Barnes, Longford, and Chatfield; and Messrs. Privitt, Jeal, Barker, and G. Clarke. Mr. W. Barnaby, the director of the class, conducted; and Mr. J. Darke Jenkins presided at the pianoforte.

Bedford.—The Concert of the Amateur Musical Society took place on the 15th ult. The programme contained selections from Masaniello, Beethoven's Trio in E flat for piano, violin, and violoncello, Mendelssohn's Wedding March, some part-songs, including "Autumn" by Mr. Diemer, and vocal solos. Miss Marian Williams was the vocalist, and the instrumentalists were Mr. Diemer (pianoforte), Mr. Rendle (violin), and Mr. Gough (violoncello).

Birmingham.—The Festival Choral Society opened their season on Thursday the 3rd ult. with a magnificent performance of Handel's Judas Maccabæus. The principal vocalists were Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Miss Miner, Miss Orridge, Mr. Vernon Rigby, Mr. Young, and Mr. Bridson, all of whom were highly successful. The greatest triumphs, however, were achieved by the choir, which Mr. Stockley has got into splendid form. Mr. Stimpson presided at the organ, and there was a strong orchestra.——On the 15th ult. Mr. Pyatt's party gave a Ballad Concert at the Town Hall. The artists were Madame Nilsson, Miss Orridge, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Mr. Bridson, vocalists; Madame Goddard, solo pianist; Mr. H. Nicholson, flautist; and Mr. Sidney Naylor, Conductor.——The Carl Rosa Opera Company gave a six-nights' season at the Theatre Royal, commencing on Monday the 21st ult. The works given were Maritana, Lily of Killarney, Bohemian Girl, Les Huguenots, and the Merry Wives of Windsor. The artists new to Birmingham—Madame Vanzini, Miss Georgina Burns, and Mr. Joseph Maas—have met with great success. ——At the first of Messrs. Harrison's Subscription Concerts the Town Hall presented an appearance only equalled and seldom excelled at the Triennial Festivals; the whole room, with the exception of the back of the orchestra, being reserved. The artists were Mesdames Adelina Patti, Nouver, and Patey; Messrs. Edward Lloyd, Maybrick, and Signor Nicolini; Mr. Charles Ould, violoncello, and Mr. Thouless, conductor and pianist.——Mr. Stockley's first Orchestral Concert, given at the Town Hall on Thursday the 24th ult., was a great treat. The band performed Gade's Symphony in B flat, Op. 20; two movements from the ballet music of Gounod's Reine de Saba; the Overtures Jubilee (Weber) and Siege of Rochelle (Balfe). Mr. Walter Bache gave a masterly rendering of Beethoven's Concerto in E flat, Op. 73, in which he was well supported by the band, and the tenth Rhapsodie Hongroise, by Liszt; and Miss Anna Williams sang with much success Mendelssohn's scena, "Infelice," and Gounod's song, "The Worker." Signor Ghilberti made a very good first appearance and met with a warm reception. Mr. Stockley conducted with his usual judgment and skill.

Bradford.—Mr. Pyatt, who, with a party of celebrated artists, is making a successful tour of the provinces, gave a Ballad Concert in St. George's Hall, on the 22nd ult. The company consists of Madame Christine Nilsson, Miss Orridge, Madame Arabella Goddard, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Bridson, and Messrs. Nicholson and Naylor. Madame Nilsson's rendering of some Swedish airs and Handel's "From mighty kings" was highly appreciated. Miss Orridge gave four thoroughly representative English songs very successfully. Mr. Sims Reeves had a most enthusiastic reception. Mr. Naylor accompanied the vocalists with much judgment, and his playing in the duets with Mr. Nicholson was very effective.

Bristol.—The first Concert of the present season of the series of Monday Popular Concerts was given in the Colston Hall on Monday, September 30. The direction of the series, which will consist of twenty concerts during the season, is under Mr. George Riseley, and the band consists of fifty performers under the leadership of Mr. A. W. Waite. The principal items performed by the band were the Overtures Anacreon (Cherubini) and La Bayadère (Auber), Mozart's grand Symphony in E flat, March from Fatinitza (Suppé), and a "Saraband et Gavotte," from J. L. Roeckel's Olivia. The oboe obbligato to Taubert's "Lieberliedchen" was played by Mr. Horton, and Mr. Lawford Huxtable was the vocalist. On Monday the 14th ult. the second Concert was given in the Colston Hall, and was also well patronised. The band gave an excellent rendering of Sir Sterndale Bennett's Symphony in G minor (Op. 43), the Overtures to Stradella (Flotow) and that in F (Op. 44), by Kalliwoda, and Scotson Clark's "Marche aux Flambeaux." Liszt's arrangement, for pianoforte and orchestra, of Schubert's grand Fantasia in C was also finely rendered, Herr C. Armbruster being at the pianoforte. Mdlle. Hélène Arnim was the vocalist. On Monday evening, the 21st ult., the Concert was given in the Lesser Colston Hall, at which a new Cantata, I will magnify Thee, O God, my King, by Mr. W. F. Dyer, of Bristol, was performed for the first time. The second part of the concert, which was conducted by Mr. Dyer, consisted of miscellaneous pieces.

Bromsgrove.—The annual Harvest Thanksgiving Services were held at All Saints' Church on Sunday the 29th of September. The church, which was beautifully decorated, was extremely well attended. The musical portions of the services were rendered with precision and expression throughout, and the organ voluntaries were excellently played by Mr. J. C. B. Tirbutt, the Organist of the Church.

Bury St. Edmunds.—A new organ, built by Hunter, of Kennington Road, London, was opened in St. John's church on the 8th ult. by Mr. Thomas Smith, the organist; the morning sermon being preached by the Bishop of Ely, and that in the evening by the Archdeacon of Sudbury. The services were entirely choral and exceedingly well rendered; the anthems being, in the morning, "In Jewry is God known" (Whitfeld), and in the evening, "Sing we merrily unto God, our strength," a recent composition by the organist. The organ at present contains five stops in the great and five in the swell, with double sixteen-feet open on pedals; the instrument is, however, built for four more stops in the great and three more in the swell, which will be added as soon as funds are available. Mr. Smith gave a Recital at the close of evening service.

Bushey, Herts.—A Concert, under the leadership of Mr. Arthur Cottam, was given in aid of the Relief Funds for the sufferers by the loss of the Princess Alice and the Abercarne Colliery explosion, in the Lecture Hall, on Wednesday evening, the 9th ult., by the "Minnesingers," assisted by Mrs. Hill, Miss Flood, and Mr. Henry Baumer, who kindly gave their services for the occasion. Among the several part-songs and glees sung by the gentlemen who compose the Minnesingers were Sir H. Bishop's "Mynheer Vandunck," Horsley's "By Celia's Arbour," Hatton's "King Witlaf's Drinking Horn," and "The Lifeboat," the serenade from Longfellow's "Spanish Student," "Stars of the Summer Night," set to music (MS.) as a solo and five-part chorus by Arthur Cottam, and "The long day closes," by Sullivan.

CASTLEFORD.—On Tuesday the 8th ult. a most interesting Lecture on "English Songs" was delivered by Mr. J. H. Eyre, Choirmaster of Doncaster Parish Church. Mr. Eyre was assisted by Miss Robinson and Mr. Carbert; Miss Eyre presiding at the pianoforte.

CHELTENHAM.—Signor Ghilberti gave a Morning Concert at the Assembly Rooms on the 3rd ult., assisted by Mrs. F. Daubeny, Mrs. Unett, the Misses Campells, Miss Burman, and Mr. Dyce Petterson. Mr. Spinney was the accompanist. Mrs. Daubeny's singing of Lillo's Canzonette, "Se non son dama di qualita," and Sullivan's "Let me dream again," was particularly good; and the concert-giver pleased much by his rendering of Panzini's, "La Sera" and Loder's "Diver." All the numbers on the programme were exceedingly well given.

CLAPHAM.—On Thursday the 10th ult. the Harvest Festival was celebrated at Christ Church, the musical portion of the services being particularly attractive. Mr. Hoyte's service was sung at the high celebration; Barnby's anthem, "O Lord how manifold," being given as the offertory anthem. As it had been widely circulated that Mendelssohn's Cantata, Lauda Sion, would be sung as the anthem at the evening service, an immense congregation assembled, and the church was crowded. Mr. G. C. Martin, Mus. B., Oxon., of St. Paul's Cathedral, played a choice selection of music before the service, and presided at the organ throughout the evening; Mr. Richard Lemaire, the organist and director of the choir, conducting the Cantata; the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were exceedingly well sung to Martin's Service in A, the former being particularly effective. The Lauda Sion went admirably. A masterly performance of one of Bach's grand fugues by Mr. Martin brought a very successful service to a close.

CLIFTON.—On Monday the 14th ult. Mr. James C. Daniel gave two Concerts in the Victoria Rooms, in connection with his series of Clifton Winter Entertainments. The following were the artists engaged: Miss Robertson, Miss Fanny Robertson, Miss Ellen de Fonblanque, Mr. Henry Guy, and Mr. Wadmore as vocalists; Mons. Albert contributing some violoncello solos, and Mr. Edward Bending conducting.

COVENTRY.—On Tuesday the 15th ult. Mr. J. Finch Thorne gave the first of a series of fortnightly Organ Recitals at St. John the Baptist's Church, in aid of a fund for the completion of the churchyard. The Recital was most successful, and a substantial sum was realised.

CROOKE, DURHAM.—On Friday evening, the 11th ult., a Concert was given in the Mechanics' Hall by Mrs. W. H. Harland. A well selected programme was performed. The principal vocalists were Mrs. Watson, Mr. W. H. Watson, and Mr. J. H. Rooks, and the solo violinist Mr. A. T. Piper. The Concert was in every respect highly successful.

DOVER.—The new organ, presented to St. Mary's Church by Mrs. Bingham Jones, was opened on Sunday the 13th ult. by Mr. F. A. Cellier, Organist of St. Andrew's, Surbiton, under whose superintendence the instrument has been built. The fine tone of the organ was fully demonstrated at the conclusion of each service, when a voluntary was played with excellent effect. The instrument is very handsome in appearance and well worthy of the reputation of the builders, Messrs. Hill and Son, York Road, London. It contains eighteen speaking stops, eight in the great organ, eight in the small, and two in the pedal organ, as well as five composition pedals and swell octave, making a total of 1,100 pipes. Mr. Lancaster, a pupil of Dr. Longhurst's, from Canterbury, has been engaged as permanent organist.

DUNFERMLINE, N.B.—The new Organ, presented by the ladies of this town and surrounding district, was opened in St. Margaret's Hall, on Tuesday the 1st ult. by Mr. Harrison, of Edinburgh. The vocalists engaged from London were Miss Marion Williams, Miss Lloyd, Mr. Faulkner Leigh, and Signor Brocolini, all of whom were well received. Mr. Harrison was highly successful in his organ solos, which were judiciously selected.

DUNSTON.—The consecration of St. Leonard's Church, near Penkridge, took place on the 18th ult. Amongst the clergy present were the Bishop of the Diocese, the Bishop of Manchester, the Bishop of Columbia, Bishop Hobhouse, &c. The Bishop of Lichfield performed the usual ordination ceremonies. The service was a full choral one, Mr. Inglis Bervon, organist of the Parish Church, Stafford, presiding at the organ. The anthem was "How lovely are the messengers," Mendelssohn. The Bishop of Manchester delivered an eloquent sermon.

ECCLESFIELD.—The annual Harvest Festival was held on the 25th of September, when the fine old church was beautifully decorated. The musical portions of the service were most effective, the anthem, "Ye shall dwell in the land" (Stainer), being greatly admired. The choir was conducted by Mr. J. H. Eyre, of Doncaster, Mr. Hedgeman presiding at the organ.

ENNISKILLEN, IRELAND.—On Monday, September 30, a Musical and Literary Entertainment was given in the Protestant Hall, in aid of the Hermanagh Protestant Orphan Society, before a large audience. The readings were given by Rev. B. F. F. Dane, of London, and songs were rendered by Mrs. Prevost, Miss Graham, Messrs. Black and Trimble. Mr. Matthew Arnold, Professor of Music, presided at the pianoforte.

GLASGOW.—The opening night of the Saturday Evening Concerts, in the City Hall, took place on the 28th of September, when the hall was crowded in every part, the artists engaged being Miss Marion Williams, Miss Lloyd, Mr. Faulkner Leigh, and Mr. Thurley Beale; Madame Liebe was the solo violinist. The Concert was highly successful.

GUELPH, ONTARIO.—The Guelph Musical Union has commenced its second season with a membership of 106 and a small but efficient orchestra; Mr. W. Philp, organist of the Dublin Street Church, being Conductor.——A military band has been organised in connection with the artillery batteries of Guelph. Selections and choruses from Handel and Haydn's works are now being practised under Mr. W. Philp, bandmaster.

HALSTEAD.—On Wednesday the 16th ult. a Harvest Thanksgiving Service was held at the church of the Holy Trinity. The service was fully choral, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. Mr. Snell, of Witham. The new organ was used in its complete state for the first time, although it had been previously opened in a formal manner. The instrument is by Norman, of Norwich.

KIDDERMINSTER.—The Oratorio of St. John the Baptist, composed by Mr. W. Taylor, Mus. Bac., Oxon., Organist and Choirmaster of the Parish Church, was performed under favourable circumstances at the above place of worship on Thursday the 3rd ult. The music of the Oratorio throughout is of the most strictly reverential and imposing character. The principal vocalists were Mrs. Glover-Eaton, Mrs. Cotton, Mrs. Shann, Mr. Dyson (of the Worcester Cathedral Choir), Mr. Cotton, and Mr. Muston. Mr. Taylor presided at the organ, Mr. Wadeley at the pianoforte, and Mr. Fitzgerald conducted. The instrumental part of the music was performed in a manner which reflected the highest credit upon all who took part in it. The singing of the principal soloists was exceedingly good, and, being well supported by the choir, the effect was very satisfactory. The encomiums passed upon the work were of the most flattering description.

LEAMINGTON.—A very successful Festival of Choirs of the Choral Association in the Coventry Archdeaconry was held in the Parish Church on Tuesday the 15th ult. The choristers numbered over two hundred, and the music was throughout admirably rendered. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Canon Temple, Vicar of St. John's, Leeds. Mr. John Heywood, of Birmingham, was Choirmaster, and Mr. Frank Spinney, the Organist of the Parish Church, presided at the organ.

LEEDS.—On Monday evening, the 5th ult., Mr. William Smith, of Morley, delivered in East Parade Chapel his popular Lecture on "Sacred Minstrelsy, Ancient and Modern." In the unavoidable absence of the Rev. E. R. Conder, Mr. Archibald Campbell presided. Excellent as the lecture was in itself, its interest was materially enhanced by a choice variety of musical illustrations. Under the direction of Mr. Marshall, the Morley Harmonic Society rendered the choral selections, accompanied on the organ by Mr. Wilkinson, of the Harrow Music School, organist of the chapel. Miss Newell kindly gave her services; and Mr. H. T. Bywater, of Wolverhampton, was engaged. This gentleman is especially popular as a tenor vocalist in the midland counties. His voice is one of singular purity and power, and his rendering of "Sound an alarm" was received with enthusiasm.——A Festival of the united choirs of the various churches within the borough of Leeds was held on the 7th ult. at the Parish Church, under the auspices of the Council of the Leeds Church Institute and Sunday School Association. The church still wore its harvest thanksgiving decorations—flowers and cereals intertwined, and suspended banners and illuminated inscriptions—and thus the scene was all the more imposing. Mr. R. S. Burton, who had taken infinite pains in the training of the choirs, presided with the most consummate ability at the organ. The prayers were intoned by the Rev. Smith-Dorrien, the succentor, and the Rev. H. J. Wilkinson, the precentor. The sermon was preached by the Bishop of Pennsylvania.

LINCOLN.—A Recital of Organ Music was given in the Hannah Memorial Wesleyan Chapel, High Street, on Friday evening, the 11th ult., by Mr. J. Barratt, M.B., Oxon., Organist of Wesley Chapel. The programme was well selected and the various pieces rendered in masterly style, effectively exhibiting the qualities of the instrument as well as the abilities of the performer. There was a large and appreciative audience; and several of the pieces were redemanded.

LIVERPOOL.—The second Subscription Concert of the Philharmonic Society for the current season was given on the 22nd ult., the special feature being the reproduction of Sir Julius Benedict's Cantata, Undine. The principal solos—entrusted to Miss Robertson, Madame Patey, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Maybrick—were all most adequately rendered, and the beautiful orchestration received the fullest justice from the band. Sir Julius Benedict, who conducted his work, was repeatedly cheered, and at the end received quite an ovation from audience, band, and chorus. The instrumental portion of the Concert included Sir Sterndale Bennett's Overture the Naiades, Mozart's Symphony in D, the Gavotte from Mignon (encored), and Weber's Overture to Turandot; and the miscellaneous vocal music was well selected and successfully rendered.

MELBOURNE.—On Monday evening, August 19, the Melbourner Deutsche Liedertafel gave a Concert at Hockin's Rooms. Among the items in the programme were Kuhlau's Andante and Rondo for piano and flute, a violoncello solo, Batta and Doppler's Idylle "Souvenir du Rigi" for flute, violoncello, and piano. Several part-songs were excellently rendered by the Liedertafel, notably Kücken's "Young Musicians," Mohr's "Father Rhine," and Hennig's "Frog Cantata." Mr. Julius Siede conducted.—— The Philharmonic Society gave its second Subscription Concert on the 27th of August at the Town Hall. The work selected was Schumann's Paradise and the Peri. The principal singers were Miss Carandine, Miss Christian, R.A.M., and Herr Johannes Emblad. The Concert opened with Mendelssohn's Overture to the Midsummer Night's Dream, which was well rendered and greatly applauded. Mr. George Peake presided at the organ, and Mr. David Lee conducted.——On the 31st of August the Musical Artists' Society held its Annual Meeting at Messrs. Nicholson and Ascherberg's Concert-Room. After the report and balance-sheet for last year had been read and adopted, and office bearers elected for the ensuing year, Mr. E. A. Jäger, the President, read a very interesting paper on Mendelssohn; the rest of the evening being devoted to illustrations from the works of that great master. Mendelssohn's Trio in D minor was splendidly played by Signor Zelman (piano), Mr. Curtis (violin), and Mr. Montague (violoncello). This Society must be congratulated for its efforts to promote the culture of "high art" amongst its members.

Miles Platting, near Manchester.—On the 3rd ult. a new organ was opened at St. Luke's Church, with a special Service. The instrument has been built by Messrs. Alexander Young and Sons, of Manchester. The organ, which consists of two manuals, for great and swell organ, and separate pedal organ, is not large, but is exceedingly well built; its power and quality of tone being good, and the stops pure and effective in character. The great organ has twelve stops; there are ten to the swell organ and three to the pedal organ; while five couplers and six composition pedals largely increase the resources of the player. The instrument is of course tuned to the equal temperament system. The case is of pitch pine, designed to fit the corner of the church in which the organ is placed. Some slight effort towards obtaining a suitable instrument was made during the restoration by the late Mr. Taylor, but the accomplishment of the design is mainly due to the exertions of the newly-appointed rector, the Rev. Fergus Hill, M.A. Mr. C. J. Hall ably presided at the organ, and, in addition to accompanying the music of the service, played with excellent taste a varied and interesting selection of organ pieces.

Montreal.—A Concert, in aid of the sufferers from yellow fever in the Southern States, was given on the 26th of September at the Victoria Skating Rink. An excellent programme was provided, the principal features of which were the artistic pianoforte playing of Miss Holmes, and the finished singing of Mrs. Barnes, who was well known to the English public before her marriage as Miss Leonora Braham. She has a pure soprano voice, and sings with much expression, her rendering of a song by her husband, the Organist of Christ Church Cathedral, being most warmly applauded. The other vocalists were Miss Maltby, Mr. Delahunt, and Mr. Maillet; and Mr. Reichling (violin), and Mr. Harzè (horn), were the solo instrumentalists.

New Mill, near Huddersfield.—The Harvest Festival commenced on Thursday evening, September 26, by a Service of Song entitled "Harvest Home," given in the church by the Sunday scholars, assisted by the choir. The various hymns and anthems comprised in the service were admirably rendered, particularly the opening Solo, "With verdure clad" (Creation), by Miss M. E. Roberts; and Clarke-Whitfeld's Anthem, "O praise God in His holiness," the solo parts of which were sung by Miss Annie Jenkinson and Mr. George Hirst. The Festival was continued on Sunday the 29th, when at the morning service W. H. Callcott's Anthem, "Thou visitest the earth," was sung, Miss M E. Roberts ably sustaining the solo part. In the evening the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were taken to Dr. Smith's (Dublin) Service in B flat, and the Anthem was "The Lord is full of compassion," adapted from Himmel and Haydn by G. Wilkinson. Miss Annie Jenkinson rendered the solo with taste and feeling, and the Quartett and Chorus were sung with marked effect. Handel's "Hallelujah" was given with vigour and precision. Mr. C. E. Holmes, Choirmaster, presided at the organ. The prayers were read by the Rev. E. Weight, curate-in-charge; and the sermons were preached by the Rev. B. J. Holmes, M.A., Vicar of St. Mary's, Berwick-upon-Tweed.

Richmond, Yorks.—Mr. James H. Rooks, the organist of the Parish Church, engaged the services of some of the most talented artists of the day for his Concert in the Assembly Rooms on Tuesday the 8th ult. The programme was divided into two parts, sacred and secular, and the leading composers were represented. The vocalists were Miss Banks, Miss Helen D'Alton, Signor Fabrini, and Mr. Henry Pope; solo violoncello, Sir John Lawson, Bart.; Conductor, Mr. James H. Rooks.

Rochester.—The public testimonial to the earnestness and ability of the Rev. W. H. Nutter, M.A., Minor Canon of Rochester, in his voluntary capacity of Conductor of the Rochester, Strood, and Chatham Choral Society, was recently presented, in the old Corn Exchange, in the presence of a crowded assemblage of members and of subscribers to the Society. The testimonial consisted of a boudoir-grand piano by C. Bechstein, of Berlin and London, an illuminated address, and a silk purse containing the balance (about a hundred guineas) of the money subscribed. The presentation was made by the Mayor of Rochester (G. Booth, Esq.). At the end of the proceedings Mr. and Mrs. Nutter gave a musical recital for the purpose of exhibiting the tone of the instrument.

Sheffield.—During the Church Congress week special services were held in the venerable old parish church. The service-book for the opening on Tuesday the 1st ult. was carefully compiled by Mr. Tallis Trimnell, Mus. B., the organist; the special features being Sullivan's Morning Service in D and Goss's setting of "The Wilderness" as the morning Anthem, both of which were exceedingly well rendered by the parish choir, assisted by a few members of other choirs in the town. Each afternoon during the week, at 5.15, full choral service was held. The reading of a musical paper for the last evening at the Albert Hall was followed by a very interesting programme of sacred music, given at the Conversazione by the members of the Albert Choral Society, Mr. Trimnell presiding at the organ. During the proceedings of the evening His Grace the Lord Archbishop of York alluded in very eulogistic terms to the great services rendered by Mr. Trimnell to the Congress Committee and all connected with the parish church. The new organ in the parish church, built by Messrs. Brindley and Foster, of Sheffield, at a cost of about £2,000, was ready for the opening of Congress week. It is greatly admired, both for tone and workmanship; the case, which is of dark wainscot oak, exquisitely carved, is exceedingly handsome in design.——Messrs. Peck and Wainwright opened the concert season of Sheffield on the 9th ult. with a grand Concert in the Albert Hall. Miss Agnes Zimmermann and Signor Guido Papini were the instrumentalists, and Mr. Santley the vocalist. Mr. Trimnell accompanied. Miss Zimmermann made her first appearance in Sheffield and was very cordially welcomed. Signor Papini's playing was highly appreciated. Mr. Santley was greeted with plaudits of the warmest character. A word of praise is due to Mr. Trimnell for the manner in which he filled the important post of accompanist, not only of the songs but of Signor Papini's violin solos.——The first of a series of three Subscription Concerts promoted by Mr. Charles Harvey, took place at the Albert Hall on the 21st ult., the programme consisting principally of English songs. The vocalists were Madame Nouver, Madame Patey, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Maybrick; instrumentalists: Mr. Thouless, pianoforte; and Mr. C. Ould, violoncello. The members of the Church Institute choir (conducted by Mr. S. Hadfield and accompanied on the piano by Mr. Arthur Hadfield) contributed a couple of part-songs very creditably.

Sherborne.—It is announced that this town has been made a Centre for the local examinations of Trinity College, London, and that Mr. Louis N. Parker has been elected hon. local Secretary.

St. Asaph.—Messrs. Tomkinson, Lewis Williams, J. M. Powell, and S. Powell (Lay Clerks of St. Asaph Cathedral), held their fifth annual morning and evening Concerts in the National Schoolroom on Tuesday the 8th ult. Mrs. Warren (of Mr. Charles Hallé's Concerts), was specially engaged for the occasion; her artistic rendering of her songs gave the utmost pleasure to her hearers and she was enthusiastically received. Miss Annie Brown (of the Royal Academy of Music), who kindly gave her services, played three pianoforte solos in a most skilful and masterly manner. Mr. N. L. Van Grinsen greatly delighted the audience in his brilliant violin solo. The music was under the direction of the Rev. W. Morton (Succentor), and Mr. R. A. Atkins (Cathedral Organist), both of whom greatly contributed to the success of the Concerts.

Stalybridge.—The members of the Stalybridge Harmonic Society gave their thirty-fourth annual performance in the Mechanics' Institution on Thursday evening, the 10th ult., Handel's Oratorio Israel in Egypt being the work selected. The vocalists were Miss Arthur, Miss Damian, and Mr. Verney Binns. The well-known bass duet, "The Lord is a man of war," was given by the whole of the bass singers. Of the manner in which the choruses were rendered it is impossible to speak too highly. Mr. S. Garlick conducted, and Mr. J. Smith occupied his old place as leader of the instrumentalists.

Stroud.—A meeting was held at the Subscription Rooms on the 2nd ult. for the purpose of distributing the certificates and prizes awarded to Stroud and Stonehouse candidates at the Trinity College (London) local examination last June. Rev. Dr. Badcock presided, and the meeting was addressed by Mr. Stanton, M.P., Mr. Sibree, M.A., and Dr. Paine. Mr. Frederic Clark, late the local but now the organising Secretary, distributed the prizes, and gave some very useful advice to students. He mentioned that the average of success at Stroud was very high, amounting to 72 per cent. Of the seven prizes subscribed for at the Gloucester Centre, Stroud took three, and these were distributed amidst applause to the Misses Hogg, Webb, and Grist. Mr. Chew has been appointed the local Secretary.

Sutton, Surrey.—The Harvest Thanksgiving Service was held on Wednesday the 9th ult. in All Saints', Benhilton Parish Church. The choir of the church was assisted by several men and boys from Banstead, St. Nicholas, Sutton, and St. Philip's, Battersea, and numbered, including the clergy, about one hundred. The processional hymn, "Come ye thankful," commenced the service. The Rev. C. R. Patey intoned the prayers; the responses were from Tallis; the psalms to Goss in D and Turle in G; Magnificat and Nunc dimittis to Stainer's Parisian tones, the latter being especially well rendered. The anthem was Stainer's "Ye shall dwell in the land," the solos in which were most effectively sung by Messrs. Burgon and Home. The sermon was preached by Canon Bridges, of Beddington; the offertory was devoted to a fund for a peal of bells. The church was beautifully decorated. Mr. Sharp presided most ably at the organ. The festival was continued on the Sunday following.

Taunton.—The Rev. F. J. Smith, Vicar of St. John's, Taunton, having made the noble offer of £3,000 towards a fund for building a new church at Rowbarton, Taunton, provided £2,000 are otherwise raised by the end of the year, a Concert in aid of the fund was given by Mr. W. J. Trenchard on Tuesday the 8th ult. at the London Hotel Assembly Rooms. The soloists were Miss Gertrude Portman, Miss Clara Samuell, R.A.M., Madame Alice Barnett, Mr. Harper Kearton, Dr. Bonn, Mr. F. M. Newton, and Mr. W. J. Trenchard; Mr. Fletcher (violin), accompanied by Miss H. Douglas and Miss Mary Gibson (pianoforte), all of whom were highly successful. Three part-songs were well given by a party of eight gentlemen. Mr. T. L. Perkins conducted. A very fair sum was added to the fund.

Wandsworth (New).—The usual Harvest Thanksgiving Services were held on Friday the 11th and Sunday the 13th ult. at St. Paul's Church, which was beautifully decorated for the occasion. The choir was on Friday augmented by members of the choirs of St. Anne's and All Saints', Wandsworth; Holy Trinity, Tooting; and St. Mark's, Battersea. The musical portion of the service was excellently rendered. Mr. C. W. Hanson, Organist and Director of the Choir, presided at the organ and played Batiste's Grande Offertoire in D (No. 5) as a concluding voluntary.

Wellington, Somerset.—The members of the Harmonic Society, under their Conductor, Mr. W. Manley, have commenced their season with the practice of Elijah. On Friday evening, the 18th ult., they presented Miss Warren with handsomely bound copies of Novello, Ewer & Co.'s folio edition of the Messiah, Elijah, and Palestine, together with Sir John Goss's "Organist's Companion," in four volumes, as a mark of their appreciation of her valuable services at rehearsals and concerts.

Weston-super-Mare.—The annual Harvest Festival Service was held at St. John's (the Parish) Church on Tuesday evening the 8th ult. The musical portions of the service were rendered by the choirs of St. John's, Trinity, Emmanuel, and Christ Churches, making a total of about one hundred voices. The music was chants to special psalms, Wesley in C and Attwood in D; the anthem, "I will magnify Thee" (Goss); and hymns, "Come, ye thankful," "To Thee, O Lord," "We plough the fields," "The Church's one foundation," and the "Old Hundredth." The sermon was preached by Rev. Prebendary Stephenson, the offertory being for the church improvement fund. Mr. Arthur E. Crook, the organist, presided at the organ.

Wombourn.—The annual Harvest Thanksgiving Festival was celebrated in St. Benedict's Church on Sunday the 26th of September, the church being artistically decorated for the occasion by the members of the congregation. The sermon in the morning was preached by the Rev. A. F. Forbes, Rector of Badger, Shropshire; and in the evening by the Rev. T. J. Jones, Vicar of Hanfair, North Wales. The services were full choral, and were most efficiently rendered by the choir. Mr. Frederick Arnold Lister presided at the organ, and played an excellent selection of voluntaries before and after the services.

WORCESTER.—The prospectus of the fifth season of Mr. Edward J. Spark's Subscription Concerts announces three performances, two before Christmas and one early next year. The services of many eminent artists have been engaged, and there is every prospect that the reputation of these Concerts will continue to be fully maintained.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. H. J. Vaughan, to St. James's, Brighton.—Mr. Thomas Augustus Aldridge, Organist and Choirmaster to Bodicote Church, Banbury, Oxon.—Mr. George J. Halford, Organist and Choirmaster to St. George's Church, Birmingham.—Mr. George Sampson, Organist and Choirmaster to St. James's Church, Bristol.—Mr. W. Warder Harvey, to the Congregational Church, Andover.—Mr. M. SECOND CONCERT, THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 28, AT 8.

HAYDN'S

"CREATION."

PRICES: For the Series of Ten Concerts, £2 12s. 6d., £2, £1 10s., and £1 1s. For single tickets, 7s. 6d., 5s., 4s., 3s., and 1s. The tickets are now ready, and may be had of the usual Agents, and at the Royal Albert Hall.

BACH'S MAGNIFICAT, and "MY SPIRIT WAS IN HEAVINESS" will be sung at St. Anne's Church, Soho, with orchestral accompaniment under the direction of Mr. J. BARNBY, on FRIDAYS, November 29, December 6, 13, and 20.

NEW NORTH ROAD, HOXTON, WESLEYAN CHAPEL.—On THURSDAY EVENING, November 21, at Eight p.m., an ORGAN RECITAL will be given by Mr. W. C. FILBY, on the New Organ recently erected in the above chapel by Messrs. Maley, Young, and Oldknow, King's Road, St. Pancras, N.W. Admission, One Shilling. Tickets may be had at Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co.'s, 80 & 81, Queen Street, E.C.

COMPETITION PRIZE of £5.—The TANNAHILL ANNIVERSARY COMMITTEE offer a PRIZE of £5 for the best Melody, harmonised for four voices, and suitable for open-air singing, set to the words of Tannahill's Song commencing with "The Midges dance abune the burn," for copy of which see Tannahill's works. Competitors are requested to forward their Manuscripts to the Secretary, Mr. William Peattie, 2, Gilmour Street, Paisley, on or before the 31st of December, 1878. To insure impartiality, the Manuscripts should be signed with a Motto only; and a sealed letter sent at same time, marked outside for "Tannahill Competition," and giving inside the name and address of the composer, with the motto adopted; the latter to remain unopened till after the adjudication has taken place. The adjudicators will be appointed by the Committee; and, as soon as the decision has been made, the Prize will be sent to the successful Competitor, and the Manuscript will become the copyright property of the Tannahill Committee. The unsuccessful Manuscripts will be returned to the addresses given.

THE PSALTER AND CANTICLES

POINTED AND SET TO ACCOMPANYING

CHANTS, ANCIENT AND MODERN,

By the Rev. SIR H. W. BAKER, Bart., and

WILLIAM HENRY MONK,

Professor of Vocal Music in King's College, London.

The Cheap Edition, with Vocal Score (Gregorians in unison), is now ready; size, double post 16mo.

Limp cloth, cut flush, and lettered ... ... 2s. od.
Cloth boards, turned in, and lettered ... ... 2s. 6d.
Cloth boards, turned in, gilt lettered, red edges ... 3s. od.

A large Imperial 8vo Edition, with accompanying harmonies for the Gregorian Tones, is in the Press.

The distinctive object aimed at is to unite under the same pointing two forms of chant hitherto considered incompatible—the Ancient and the Modern, the Gregorian and the Anglican—and to introduce a new form of Chant, which is commended with confidence for the use of Parish Choirs.

The work includes about 50 varieties of the Gregorian Chants, some from sources not easily accessible; and about 390 chants of the Anglican form, of which 100 are more or less well known, the remainder having been composed expressly for this work by musicians of distinction, including most of our Cathedral Organists.

Canticles only, 6d., 9d., and 1s.

Tonic Sol-fa and Plain Song Editions will be published as soon as possible.

London: W. CLOWES and SONS, 13, Charing Cross, S.W.

LORETTO SCHOOL, MIDLOTHIAN, MUSICAL SCHOLARSHIP. Free board and education while treble voice lasts; remission of three-fourth fees afterwards; usual fees, ninety guineas. Good treble voice necessary, but other circumstances taken into account. Apply to the Secretary.

A LONDON ORGANIST would be glad to receive a Young Gentleman as a RESIDENT PUPIL, to study with the son of a clergyman. Exceptional advantages. Moderate terms. Organista, Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co., 1, Berners Street, W.

A GOOD SITUATION is now at liberty for a very steady outdoor TUNER, who thoroughly understands every branch of the business. Good Pianist. No other need apply. One from Messrs. Broadwood or Collard preferred. Age and reference from last place indispensable. Address, R. W. Aldridge, 44, London Street, Southport.

EXPERIENCED PIANOFORTE-ACTION FINISHERS WANTED. Permanent situations, with good wages offered, to clever Regulators, who understand every detail of action-fitting and fine finishing. Good references indispensable. Address inquiries to Pohlmann and Son, Iron Pianoforte Makers, Halifax, Yorkshire.

ORGANS RETURNED from HIRE, &c.—Several excellent instruments of one, two, and three manuals to be sold at low prices. Gray and Davison (Limited), 370, Euston Road, N.W.

MUSIC AUTOGRAPHY.—Songs, Anthems, &c., reproduced, from twelve copies upwards, at trifling cost. Black ink and music size. Specimens, one stamp. G. Dinham, 114, Jamaica Level, London, S.E.

TWILIGHT HARMONY. Sequel to "The Lost Chord." Song for contralto, mezzo, or soprano, with ad lib. accompaniment for Organ or Harmonium.

TRADE NOTICE.—TWILIGHT HARMONY. Sequel to "The Lost Chord," advertised in Telegraph, Illustrated London News, Graphic, Queen, and country papers. Liberal terms to the trade post-free. Author's property. Address, Edward Phillips, Musicseller, Clapham Common, London, S.W.

SIX CHRISTMAS CAROLS, set to Music by JOHN H. MEE, M.A., Fellow of Merton College and Succentor of Queen's College, Oxford. Price 2d.
Oxford: W. R. BOWDEN, 59, High Street.

WARD'S

ROYAL PIANOFORTE AND HARMONIUM LAMP,

FOR PROVIDING A CENTRAL & DIRECT LIGHT FOR THE PERFORMER.

The inconvenience of the present mode of lighting a performer at a pianoforte or harmonium by means of sconces fitted at the extremities of the instrument has long been a subject of complaint. The requirement is a central light to fall direct upon the music-book. This can be obtained by using Thomas Ward's Royal Pianoforte Lamp, which can be fitted to any form of instrument without defacing the same. Vocalists also will thus find a convenience which does not exist in other modes of lighting.

PROSPECTUSES POST-FREE.

Price 10s. 6d.

Agents: Mr. J. WILLIAMS, 23, Berners Street, Oxford Street, W., and Messrs. METZLER and Co., 37, Great Marlborough Street, W. Sole Agents for Sussex: Messrs. J. and W. CHESTER, 1, Palace Place, Brighton.

ORGAN-TONED HARMONIUMS.

W. HATTERSLEY & CO.'S

CELEBRATED

ORGAN-TONED HARMONIUMS,

WHICH, FOR DURABILITY, SWEETNESS OF TONE, AND RAPIDITY OF TOUCH, ARE UNEQUALLED BY ANY OTHER MAKER.

These splendid Instruments are manufactured only by W. HATTERSLEY & CO., with improved Sound Board, in double veneered cases, and from well-seasoned material, and have been tried side by side with the best English, American, French, and German Harmoniums, and have been pronounced to be far better, both in quality of tone, variety in the stops, repetition in touch, and predominance of the treble over the bass. The large instruments, with double action and several other improvements, are nearer to the Organ than anything yet made.

SPECIAL ATTENTION is called to their Celebrated 17-Guinea ORGAN-TONED DRAWING-ROOM MODEL.

9 Stops (all effective), with double-knee Swells, as being the finest instruments made at the price.

The whole of these instruments are 15 per cent. cheaper than the London or any other makers, considering workmanship, &c., irrespective of a much superior tone.

HATTERSLEY AND CO.'S CELEBRATED SCHOOL AND CHURCH HARMONIUM, 11 Stops, Manufactured and Voiced specially for large rooms. Price 20 Guineas.

BOOKS OF DESIGNS AND ABOVE 200 TESTIMONIALS FREE BY POST UPON APPLICATION.

THE LEEDS TUNE-BOOK

A MANUAL OF 274 HYMN-TUNES OF ALL METRES FOR ALL DENOMINATIONS,

COMPILED AND ARRANGED IN SHORT SCORE FOR VOICES OR ORGAN, BY

JOSEPH LANCASTER,

ORGANIST, MILL HILL CHAPEL, LEEDS.

Quarto. Large type. Price 4s. 6d. Congregations and Choirs supplied at Reduced Rates.

"The harmonies evince an amount of technical knowledge and careful arrangement which is creditable in the highest degree to the compiler."—Musical Times.

"This collection contains 274 tunes, selected with taste and judgment, including not only the principal ancient and modern tunes in general use, but a number of new and original tunes, some of which are of great merit."—Illustrated London News.

"It is an admirable collection of very choice tunes for congregational worship, and we most heartily commend it for use in the church and in the home, believing it will be found very widely acceptable. The book is clearly printed, and can be had to order of any book or musicseller."—Kent Herald.

"Mr. Lancaster has reproduced many of the standard tunes, both ancient and modern; and he has mingled with them many original compositions. The work, which is not at all sectarian or denominational in character, is thoroughly legitimate in its purpose, and in many respects highly creditable in its execution."—Globe.

"'The Leeds Tune-Book' is a handsomely printed quarto volume, with the tunes in short score, and contains the usual amount of ancient and modern favourites, with about ninety tunes composed expressly for the collection, and printed for the first time. Many of the original tunes are remarkably good. We may particularly instance those by Dr. Naylor, Mr. Hird, and a many of the Editor's contributions."—Choir and Musical Record.

"It is charmingly printed in duodecimo; a handy book, and a good collection. We heartily recommend it."—Yorkshire Post.

"An excellent tune-book, and will be found a most useful supplement to the tune-books already in use."—Leeds Mercury.

"This collection consists of 274 tunes of all metres, all bearing the true stamp of the effective music so generally heard in places of worship in Yorkshire. It is printed in beautifully clear type, is well bound, is moderate in price, and in every respect a very acceptable addition to the present list of such publications."—Yorkshire Orchestra.

"We welcome the appearance of this new tune-book, as a valuable compendium, either for a complete collection or as a supplement to any other tune-book."—Scarborough Gazette.

MUSICAL FORM, being Book III. of "Musical Theory." By JOHN CURWEN. This book abounds in examples and illustrations, which are all printed in both notations. Its first part exhibits those "Structural Relations" in a piece of music which go to make up its "Form"—relations of Measure and Speed, of Rhythmical Proportion, of Key and Mode, of Cadence, of Response, of Emotional Expression and Point, and of Accompaniment. After the pupil's ear has been trained to the quick perception of these Structural Relations, he is introduced in the second and larger part of the work to the study of Complete Forms, and of these more than usual attention is given to the Forms of Popular Music, especially Hymn-tunes and Songs. The Part-song, the Madrigal, the Anthem, the March, and the Dance then take their turn for illustration and exposition. After these come the Forms of "free music"—the Variation, the Rondo, the Haydn or First Movement Form, the Canon, the Fugue, &c. A system of parsing or analysis is provided for these Forms, and a course of exercises is arranged, which may be corrected through the post at the Tonic Sol-fa College. Published at the TONIC SOL-FA AGENCY, 8, Warwick Lane, London, E.C. Price 1s. 4d.

THE MANCHESTER GENTLEMEN'S GLEE CLUB'S PRIZE GLEES, 1878.

HENCE, LOATHED MELANCHOLY!

A CHEERFUL GLEE FOR FIVE VOICES.

COMPOSED BY HENRY LAHEE. PRICE SIXPENCE.

"Mr. Lahee's setting of the opening lines of Milton's 'L'Allegro obtained the Manchester prize for a 'cheerful' composition of its class. It begins with a movement in C minor, directed to be sung 'heavily and in firm time,' massive as to character, and decidedly effective. Let us add that the music is none the worse for suggesting Handel, while it is not unworthy, by reason of the correct and easy flow of the parts, to be in the manner of the great old master. The invocation to Euphrosyne has, of course, a very different character. Here all is lightness and grace (the key changing to C major), and we consider that Mr. Lahee has been particularly happy in his setting of the passage 'Jest and youthful jollity,' &c., a simple phrase, airily treated in imitation, producing the best effect. At 'These delights if thou canst give,' another change takes place. The music becomes more sedate, and a tuneful, plainly harmonised movement ends the work. We should add that the composer has been careful not to exact too much from his executants. The glee is an easy one, and as pleasing as easy."—Musical Times, June, 1878.

HUSHED IN DEATH.

A SERIOUS GLEE FOR S.A.T.B.

COMPOSED BY DR. H. HILES. PRICE SIXPENCE.

"We have great pleasure in noticing the excellent manner in which Dr. Hiles's admirable work was given. The Glee fulfils all the requirements of a work of the kind, and if the judges who awarded the first prize to it were present they could not but be gratified to hear their verdict confirmed by the emphatic approval of the audience. Scholarly writing one always expects from Dr. Hiles, whose experience as a choirmaster has also given him peculiar advantages as a writer of vocal harmony, and his Prize Glee could only have been written by an accomplished musician. The melody of the first part of the Glee is flowing and graceful, and the fugue at the end is exceedingly effective. It cannot but be gratifying to Manchester that a local composer should have been successful in a competition in which he had to contend against not a few distinguished composers."—Manchester Examiner and Times, May 9, 1878.

MUSIC PRIMERS

EDITED BY

DR. STAINER.

In issuing this series of Music Primers the Editor sees with pleasure the realisation of a desire he has long felt, to place in the hands of teachers and students of music a set of educational works of a high standard at a price so low as to render them attainable by all.

The growing interest in music generally, and rapid spread of its study, so very evident in this country, render it of the utmost importance that the student's first steps in every branch should be directed with skill and based on sound principles. The Editor has kept this object steadily in view, and he believes that each one of these Primers will prove to be as carefully constructed in detail as it is comprehensive in design.

Such a result would have been impossible but for the hearty support and sympathy of those authors, men of known ability in their special branches of art, who have embodied the results of their long and valuable experience in their respective contributions.

While gratefully acknowledging the kindness of these gentlemen, the Editor cannot but express a hope that the Primers may prove as useful to the public, and as beneficial to art, as both authors and publishers have endeavoured to make them.

18, WIGMORE STREET, LONDON, W.

ON THE THREE YEARS' SYSTEM, AT ALL THE PRINCIPAL MUSIC WAREHOUSES.

JOHN BRINSMEAD AND SONS'

GOLD MEDAL PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

Sir JULIUS BENEDICT. "This most ingenious and valuable invention cannot fail to meet with success."

SYDNEY SMITH. "The touch is absolute perfection."

BRINLEY RICHARDS. "A very clever and useful invention, and likely to be extensively adopted."

JOHN BRINSMEAD AND SONS'

SHORT IRON GRAND PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

"The improvements made in English pianos have caused this trade rapidly to increase, until one pianoforte manufactory after another has been built to supply the growing demand. One of the largest of these, lately erected by Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons, of Wigmore Street, covers nearly an acre of ground in the Grafton Road, Kentish Town, and is intended to accommodate 300 workmen. These works alone can supply 3,000 pianos annually, and there are at least three manufactories in London capable of making an equal number."—Illustrated London News.

JOHN BRINSMEAD AND SONS'

GOLD MEDAL PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

"The softest touch is sufficient to secure a reply, the touch and facility of repetition are really perfect."—Belgravia.

"The touch is very sure, light, and elastic."—Musical Times.

"This invention is simplicity itself."—The Queen.

JOHN BRINSMEAD AND SONS'

GOLD MEDAL PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

On the Three Years' System.

"Receive the greatest approbation everywhere of musicians and manufacturers."—Standard.

JOHN BRINSMEAD AND SONS'

SHORT IRON GRAND PIANOS. Six feet six inches in length, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action. Price 105 to 115 Guineas.

"The tone of the Grand now referred to possessed all the qualities that a good piano ought to have, and in touch and action was perfect. The sweet and silvery quality of the upper octaves was worthy of special admiration."—The Era.

"Sir Julius Benedict played his well-known composition, 'Where the Bee sucks,' on one of Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons' Grand Pianos, with the recently patented improvements, which enabled him to produce the sustained tones with great variety of effect in the light and shade of tones, especially so when extreme delicacy of touch is required."—Court Journal.

JOHN BRINSMEAD AND SONS'

GOLD MEDAL PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

"A metal bridge of a peculiar form is used to produce the treble, and a much finer tone is produced than if a wooden bridge were used."—Morning Post.

"Beautiful, light, and elastic touch, and an instant repetition."—Globe.

JOHN BRINSMEAD AND SONS'

SHORT IRON GRAND PIANOS. Six feet six inches in length, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action. Price 105 to 115 Guineas.

"An immense improvement in arpeggios. The rapid passages in the upper register, the beautiful flute-like tone, and quick and perfect repetition, were very effective."—Figaro.

JOHN BRINSMEAD AND SONS'

CONCERT IRON GRAND PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

"Sir Julius Benedict, now seldom heard as a soloist, delighted the public once more by his arrangement of 'Where the Bee sucks.' He played upon a new Patent Grand by Brinsmead, possessing a remarkably loud and clear tone."—Echo.

"The upright Iron Grand Piano, with sostenente sounding-board, the mechanism produces the obvious result of a fuller and richer tone."—Morning Advertiser.

"Every means are adopted to insure the production of perfect instruments."—The Orchestra.

ROYAL PIANOFORTE AND HARMONIUM LAMP,

FOR PROVIDING A CENTRAL & DIRECT LIGHT FOR THE PERFORMER.

The inconvenience of the present mode of lighting a performer at a pianoforte or harmonium by means of sconces fitted at the extremities of the instrument has long been a subject of complaint. The requirement is a central light to fall direct upon the music-book. This can be obtained by using Thomas Ward's Royal Pianoforte Lamp, which can be fitted to any form of instrument without defacing the same. Vocalists also will thus find a convenience which does not exist in other modes of lighting.

THE CRISIS IN MUSICAL EDUCATION.

MR. HENRY LESLIE is one of the acting committee engaged in promoting the scheme for the amalgamation of the Royal Academy of Music with the National Training School for Music, and giving to the joint institutions a more extended scope and importance, under the title of Royal College of Music. Considering the distinguished position that gentleman holds as a musical professor, and the means he possesses of acquiring the best information on the subject he refers to, we cannot be wrong in receiving in the light of a manifesto the letter he has recently addressed to the Times. He tells us that "a great crisis is imminent," and that "preparations are in progress to make the musicians of Great Britain such an offer as has never been previously dreamt of." We feel quite certain that the musicians of Great Britain are always open to any reasonable offer; but before they can admit that it surpasses their fondest dreams, they will probably like to know more about it. Mr. Leslie seems to write under the impression that there already exists in the musical profession some prejudice against the scheme of amalgamation. He speaks of "ominous rumours" emanating from "hopes and fears," whilst he assures us that the project for the founding of a Royal College of Music has not collapsed. On the contrary, "an attempt," he says, "is being made to reconcile the diverging interests of our two chief educational establishments, and in combination with them to form an institution which shall be worthy of the art and an honour and credit to the country." Surely, if such is the attempt, and if it is likely to succeed, there will be no "diverging interests" of any kind. As an earnest of probable success, Mr. Leslie reminds us that the scheme was initiated by His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, that His Royal Highness Prince Christian occupies the post of chairman of the acting committee, and that it has the personal support of a large number of distinguished personages of the highest social position. All that is of itself overwhelming; but we are told, in addition, that Her Majesty's Commissioners of the 1851 Exhibition are ready to grant whatever land may be necessary for the requirements of the establishment; and that the Council of the Royal Albert Hall are prepared to go "great lengths" in the wish to overcome difficulties. We should like to breathe here, but there is yet more, and of greater importance. "Her Majesty's Ministers," says Mr. Leslie, "will be memorialised on the subject; and it is hoped that so good a case will be presented to their notice that they will only be too ready to make amends for past neglect of that beautiful art on behalf of which the appeal will be made, by according an ample endowment for the new College." That is the point, "ample endowment," and what will it amount to? Shall we say a paltry four per cent. per annum on half a million of money, or half that sum or a quarter? We should not like to go much lower, considering that the scale of expenditure, even for professors of music in London, is very different to that of Bologna, or Leipsic, or Paris. Unfortunately we have not yet arrived at that pitch of perfection in the existing régime, that Her Majesty's Ministers can make any grant of importance without the intervention of Parliament. Setting aside the winter session, it is to be hoped that after Easter, when the country is flushed with military success and trade has revived, the House will, as Mr. Leslie says, be only "too ready" to make any amends in its power for its past neglect of music. We quite believe that sooner or later it will have to be done. There is not the slightest doubt about it that in art, as a national question, individualism has completely failed. When the proper time comes, Mr. Leslie and the gentlemen who serve with him on the committee will have the support of the musical world, amateur and professional. If the times are not just now propitious, the project can easily be postponed. In the meantime the "good case" Mr. Leslie alludes to will have been presented not only to the notice of Her Majesty's Ministers, but to the notice of the public; and we shall know exactly what are the practical methods by which Mr. Leslie and his committee propose to raise music from a "Cinderella to the dignity of a princess." Mr. Leslie informs us that in the project, as far as it has gone, "great care has been taken to have the professional element adequately represented." Surely in this case the professional element will take care of itself. It cannot be that the distinguished personages of high social position are to give lessons on the fiddle. What a Cherubini, a Perne, or an Auber might have complained of was not a committee of distinguished amateurs, but an administrateur. That nuisance was considered bad enough by those able musicians who at different periods were responsible for the progress of the students at the Paris Conservatoire; but it was perhaps a necessity in a State institution.

"It is proposed," says Mr. Leslie, "that there shall be a board of professors, and a council consisting of equal numbers of professors and laymen. This may serve to dispel all illusions as to contemplated amateur management." Qui s'excuse s'accuse. Who could have thought of an amateur management of a Conservatorium or Royal College of Music?

That a State institution could not possibly be in the hands of a body, or very often a clique, of musical professors is quite intelligible; but before we exchange the advantages we have—whilst admitting with Mr. Leslie that neither the Royal Academy nor the National Training School for Music can be said to be "incapable of improvement"—what we want to know, without being "infatuated friends of either institution," is plainly and simply this, is the new project to be a genuine working institution under the control of the State, and organised in a manner wholly distinct from anything we have known hitherto of the kind in this country? As we have said on other occasions, what is not wanted, is a larger and more unwieldy edition of the two institutions we already possess; some outcome of dilettantism, some fresh exhibition of an exceedingly British spirit of compromise, or, in short, what our continental neighbours would call a "transaction."

We quite understand that jealousies and difficulties between the two existing musical institutions may be in course of arrangement. We care nothing about that. We thoroughly believe that Mr. Leslie is "loyal" to the Academy of the Committee of Management of which he has the honour to be a member, and he will allow other people to share in his own sense of "higher duties," in desiring, above all personal or special considerations, the "recognition," as he says, "of the musical art by the Government, in order to see it placed in a position similar to that which is accorded to it in every foreign country." Every one will second that view. The only question is the modus operandi, as to which Mr. Leslie and his friends will probably enlighten us further.

We may be permitted to observe that it is exactly three years to-day that we discussed at some length in this periodical the very question which Sir George Bowyer lately initiated. And we expressed then the same opinions that have now been repeated over and over again, as to the absurdity of the Government grant of a shilling per head on musical pupils in the National Schools. That legislative monstrosity will, no doubt, be reformed. In the meantime, Mr. Leslie and the gentlemen who are acting with him will confer a great boon on all interested in musical education, if, in the question of a National Musical Academy, their knowledge and influence can prevent the Legislature from wasting the public money in a second attempt to benefit the art of music. If that is to be done, it must be with a oneness and disinterestedness of purpose so well described by Mr. Leslie himself, who will know that the end must be pursued irrespective not only of Royal Academies and other schools, and the private interests or opinions of their respective professors and principals, but of the opinions of any persons, however exalted their position. Musicians, we think, must know as well as Mr. Leslie that any institutions that tend to disseminate amongst the whole community a love and knowledge of the art will in the long run benefit them individually, and that their "social status" may be improved by the "connection of important corporations" with a College of Music. We quite agree with Mr. Leslie that a "wrong step" at this juncture may throw away the chance of having in England "an officially recognised home for music." But he is mistaken if he supposes that the danger resides in the prejudice of musicians themselves. A much greater danger exists in the possibility of a "wrong step" being taken by the committee itself.

A NEW EDITION OF MOZART.

By H. Heathcote Statham.

It was with peculiarly sympathetic feelings that, on returning the other day from an admirable performance of the "Jupiter" Symphony at the Crystal Palace, we looked at a large heap of paper-covered folios, constituting a considerable portion of the "Kritisch durchgesehene Gesammt-Ausgabe," the collected and critically edited works of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, now in course of issue by the firm of Breitkopf and Härtel. Of the edition itself as a musical publication it is not proposed to speak here with much particularity of detail, the rather as it is not yet completed or apparently near to completion. It may be sufficient to say that the engraving is of that clear and elegant type* which has always characterised the publications of the eminent Leipzig firm who are bringing out the work, and that it promises to form a very fine and complete representative edition of the composer for a musical library. Two points may, however, be noted in regard to the editing. One is the distinction in the score of the "Requiem" of all the movements and score-parts which are positively known to have been by Mozart from those for which it is now almost certain that Süssmayer alone is accountable, the distinction being made in an unobtrusive manner by the letters "M" or "S" in brackets at the heading of each part at the commencement of a movement, or inserted above the stave at the points where one composer breaks off and another goes on. The authority for assigning these various portions to Mozart and to Süssmayer respectively it is unnecessary to recapitulate here; the whole story of the evidence on the subject was given in the fullest manner by Dr. Pole in a series of articles in this paper extending from April to October, 1869; and whatever latitude there may be for difference of opinion as to how Süssmayer came by the ideas of those movements which are entirely or chiefly assigned to him, there can be no question as to the absence of any positive evidence which can assign them to the greater composer. It is therefore well that this fact should be distinctly recognised and stereotyped in an important new edition of the score: and it may be here suggested that the publication of this information in a more popular pianoforte-score edition would be very desirable when the opportunity occurs, in order that the general musical public, who are at present almost uninformed on this point, should be put in possession of the facts about the composition of the "Requiem" as far as they are known or (probably) can be known now.

The other comment which an inspection of the new edition certainly suggests is in regard to the precise duties and limits of musical editing in reference to such details as marks of expression, and of forte and piano, and so on. The significance of this question is nowhere more brought out than in regard to the most popularly exercised form of music, that for pianoforte solo, into which the personal element of editing seems to be more decidedly imported than into any other form of composition; partly, no doubt, because the large demand for pianoforte works by the great composers calls for a great many editions, and every editor has a not unnatural feeling that he must impart some specialty of his own into his own edition. In some cases a specially careful study and collation of original manuscripts and older editions is made the foundation of a claim for special accuracy in representing the composer's original intentions; but this, though the most important and valuable achievement that an editor can possibly make, soon reaches its boundaries, for when an edition is as correct on this basis as investigation can make it, the limit is reached, and a second editor cannot make it more than correct, unless another manuscript is providentially unearthed which will furnish a basis for new readings. The engraving may be improved, but the glory of that is rather with the publisher than the editor. There remain the resources of fingering and of adding new marks of expression. Fingering, of course, is all right; most passages allow a certain variety of method, and most editors who finger can give a logical reason for preferring one or another method. But marks of expression open a very wide field, and may affect the reading of the composition so much as to materially alter the expression of a passage according as they are adopted or not; and it therefore becomes a question of considerable importance whether these indications of the method of execution and phrasing are the ascertained indications of the composer carefully corrected by the best authority; whether they are the editor's opinion as to the way in which the composer would have played them himself; or whether, lastly, they represent only the editor's own peculiar taste and style in regard to phrasing and expression. In the first case they are invaluable, and worth any trouble to attain; in the second case they may be of great value if the work of an editor with keen critical power and thorough insight into the composer's style and the musical habits (so to speak) of his period; in the third case they are too often misleading and injurious by importing into the reading of the composition the peculiarities of one performer, or imparting a style and expression characteristic of modern playing and foreign to the style of the composer's own period. In the two latter cases it ought at all events to be distinctly stated, or indicated by distinction of type, which expression marks are those of the composer and which are interpolated by the editor; and even the observance of this rule would not of course excuse the introduction of a style of expression foreign to the genius and school of the music.

* There is one peculiarity, by the way, in the manner of engraving adopted by this firm, which seems odd and unnecessary; that is, that the long fish-hook-looking tails of the separate quavers, so familiar to us in German engraving, are, in all the cases where the shank of the note is turned downward, produced till they meet the head of the note, and make a complete loop. This looks awkward and unmeaning, and is contradictory of the real derivation of the "tail."

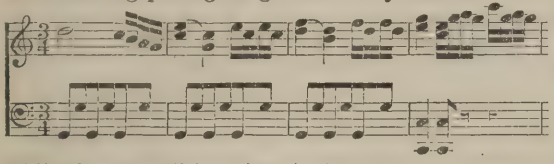
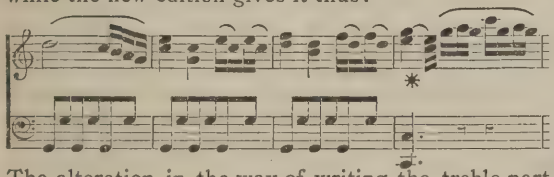
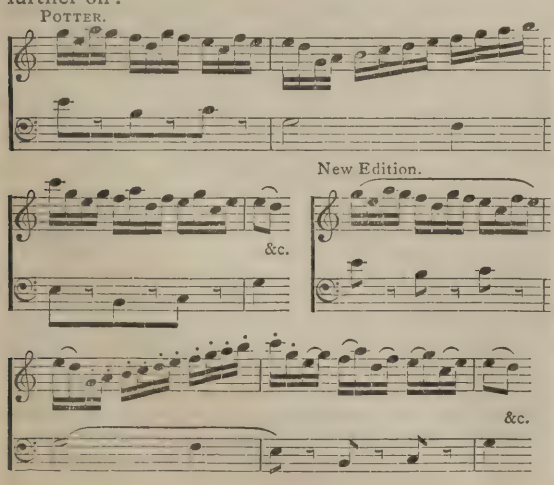
In short, there is such a thing as music being over-edited in such particulars—and the new edition seems not free from this fault. One or two illustrations may be given from a composition which, though not in one sense one of the most important of Mozart's works, is of peculiar interest, because it is the one which he most frequently selected to exhibit his own playing when a youth of nineteen or twenty, at the Paris period, when he was playing as a "lion" at salons. This is the set of variations on Fischer's Minuet; and if we could really get any authoritative statement as to Mozart's manner of playing and phrasing his favourite piece, it would be of the highest interest, even if the music itself seem faded and old-fashioned to our ears. On this head the new edition varies much from former ones. The differences between the marks of expression found here and those in the edition brought out many years ago in England under the editorship of Cipriani Potter, though they look trifling on paper, are very important if we take them as indications of what was or was not Mozart's style of phrasing his passages, and of his intentions in regard to execution and expression. In the theme the following passage is given thus by Potter:—



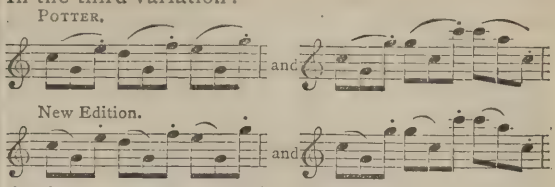
while the new edition gives it thus:—



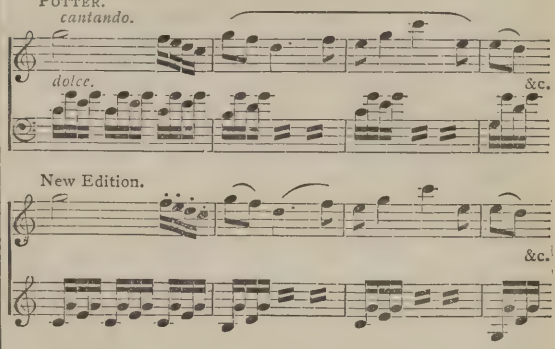
The alteration in the way of writing the treble part at * is an obvious improvement, as representing to the eye the way in which it must inevitably be played, but the slurring of the other semiquaver groups in couplets gives quite a different expression from the other way of writing them, and appears at best to be arbitrary. One or two other examples will show that the new editing has a decided tendency of its own in regard to phrasing. This occurs two or three bars further on:—



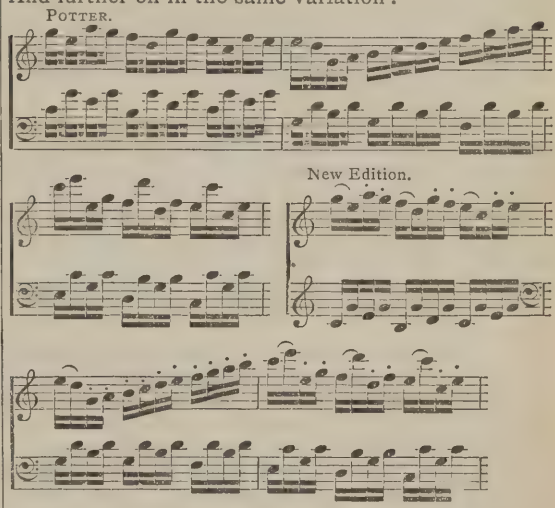
In the third variation:—



At the commencement of the sixth variation:—



And further on in the same variation:—



In the last quotation but one, from the commencement of the Sixth Variation, the difference between the reading of Potter's Edition, with its directions "cantando" and "dolce," and that of the new edition, with the semiquaver phrase dotted as staccato, amounts to giving a completely different expression to the music; and without ignoring all editions since Potter's, it may certainly be pleaded that he, a pupil of Mozart, and brought up in the old school of pianoforte playing, was likely to understand the right rendering, if any one was. The difference is as great in the last passage quoted; and though the new reading imparts a certain additional point to the passage, and though many modern pianists would very probably play it so whether marked or not, the evidence that Mozart would have played it so is not forthcoming, and there seems very little probability that the style of phrasing, of which the above quotations are examples (and which exhibits the tendency shown throughout the piano music in the new edition), represents the manner of Mozart as a pianoforte player. There is considerable evidence, in Mozart's recorded remarks, of his sympathy for a comparatively broad and cantando style of playing, so far as the instruments of his day would have afforded scope for such a style; and the manner of phrasing illustrated in the new edition is, in fact, prompted by a certain preference for finesse and piquancy of phrasing which is essentially a characteristic of modern pianoforte playing, in which the tendency is rather to overdo phrasing than otherwise, in a manner which gives often great brilliancy and (as one may almost say) wit to the rendering of passages, but which also is adverse to the qualities of repose and breadth of style. It must be remembered, too, that passages of ornament and bravura which to modern ears sound tame, had a different effect a century ago, when they were comparatively new resources; and it is likely that to Mozart and his auditors such passages as the last of the above quotations appeared to possess quite sufficient of interest and brilliancy when played in the smooth equable manner which was probably the characteristic of Mozart's own execution. Whether, in playing music of this date before a modern audience, it is allowable to impart a more modern interest and greater brilliancy to it by adopting a modern style of handling is a question in regard to which much may be said on both sides: there is no doubt that an interest has been frequently given to both the pianoforte and organ works of Bach by playing them with a degree and variety of expression which at the time when they were written was not contemplated, and for which the means of expression did not then exist; and the same may be true, to a more limited extent, of Mozart's compositions, which are of course nearer to our own day in form and feeling. But whatever may be urged in regard to playing, it can hardly be questioned that in a standard edition the aim should be to represent the music as the composer would have played it, not as a modern editor considers it would be most effective; and that at all events, if a modern elaborate system of directions for phrasing and expression be added, it should be rendered distinctly evident that they are editorial only, and that there is no composer's authority for them.

Apart from such questions of detail, the interesting fact is the circumstance of the publication of so complete and exhaustive an edition of the works of Mozart as this promises to be, at the very time that we are being constantly told that his school of music has had its day, and is no longer of any interest except historically. Even among modern critics who do not go so far as this there is often an expressed or implied notion that Mozart was a kind of child in the art, to be spoken of with cordiality and a kind of condescending patronage as one who did good work in his day. Any one will understand what is meant who has noticed the patronising manner in which Mozart is patted on the back in the Crystal Palace programme-books when his Symphony in E flat is performed (not to speak of other works), the general tenor of the recognition accorded to him amounting to saying, "How very pretty it is, after all!" This is the current tone in England at present among those especially who profess adherence to the modern German school. It should be a significant fact to them that Germany is republishing all his works in a more complete form than before existed. The fact seems to be that the school of music militant has, among other unquestionably powerful traits, a great faculty and disposition for making its voice heard, as militant schools of art usually have; they cannot get on otherwise. The result is that in England this voice gets credited with being the united voice of musical Germany to an extent which is by no means really the case.

As to the precise rank to be assigned to the genius of Mozart in relation to that of the other great composers, there will probably always be a certain diversity of judgment, depending chiefly on the degree of importance which different classes of critics attach to finish of form or to spiritual intent and meaning in musical art. It was at one time almost a fashion among a large class of dilettanti to speak of him as the greatest of all the musical composers, a faith accepted and promulgated by many who hardly knew why they thought so. But it is not very difficult to understand the origin of this belief, even for those who cannot accept it. Mozart did all things, all round, more completely on the whole than any other composer. As he himself said of one of his operas, there is something for all tastes in his music, though "nothing for long ears." The musician recognises in him a profoundly scientific musical constructor, if at least one can rightly call "scientific" that power which seemed to come as spontaneously to him as to his friend Albrechtsberger, who declared that no ideas ever presented themselves to him except in the form of double counterpoint; with the difference that the one gift of Albrechtsberger was only one among many with Mozart. He had a remarkable gift of melody, in the old sense of the word, better expressed now by the word "tune" (for "melody" now means to many people something that can be put together like a puzzle), and this fused itself with his constructive power in a manner never attained with such complete balance and success by any other composer as by Mozart at his best—in such compositions as the "Jupiter" finale, the "Zauberflöte" overture, the ball-room scene of "Don Juan," and a number of other such triumphs of the union of beauty and science, or contrivance. When we come back to some of these works after an interval of devotion to some of the recent masters who are more in favour in concert-rooms at present, we realise more completely the serenity and unconscious health of the art of Mozart. Compared with the "Jupiter" finale, in which every note seems to be not only in its right place, but to be the only thing that could be written in that place, such movements as the introduction and finale of Schumann's Symphony in C sound, as we once heard an accomplished and exacting auditor remark, "like bad extemporising," the effort to express intense feeling without a full grasp over the mechanism of the means of expression. The feeling which underlies the composition, and is the motive for writing it, is real and earnest; but the artistic expression seems to be sought for and contrived with difficulty and imperfection. In Mozart they are one and indivisible; and, as Rossetti says of a beautiful woman, "we know not the body from the soul," the form from the idea. Then Mozart wrote always well and suitably for whatever means of execution he had in view: his piano passages are essentially piano passages; his vocal phrases and melodies essentially vocal; his violin phrases made for the bow: there is nothing exacting or ungainly in regard to the special means of execution. And the balance which we notice in the style and manner of his work is equally to be observed in regard to the matter of it when we regard his compositions en masse. He is neither known specially as a writer of Oratorios, like Handel; nor as a writer of Operas, like Gluck; nor of piano music, like Chopin; he tried them all: to use again his own phrase, he made music "for all kinds of people:" symphony music, chamber music, operas, masses, songs, canons, and rounds—nothing came amiss to him, "nihil quod non tetigit," and certainly "nihil quod non ornavit." He has done a greater number of different things thoroughly well than any other great composer. Beethoven comes the nearest in multifarious power, but even he is beneath Mozart in this respect, for in his writing for the voice he only in some few instances, such as "Adelaïda," attained a perfectly pure and unexceptionable vocal style, and in chorus-writing also he was very unequal.

What is the per contra to all this? For there must be one, since it is certainly the fact that Mozart is not regarded by the most considerate critics as the greatest of composers. The shortcoming seems to lie in a want of intensity characterising alike the man and his work. "Le style, c'est l'homme," is a saying very well illustrated by Mozart and his music. Both as man and musician he was eminently whole, balanced and healthy in character (for in estimating him as a man we must remember under what exceedingly adverse influences for the development of the highest character he was placed almost all his life), but that kind of character, whether in life or in art, is exactly that which does not sound the greatest depths or rise to the greatest heights of human passion. And accordingly there is very little that Mozart has done, even at his best, of which it cannot be said that something more intense and more deeply touching has been done in the same walk of composition by some one of the other great composers. For a special reason we pass over the "Requiem" at this moment. Of his other great works, his best claim to incontestable supremacy would lie probably in "Don Juan" and in the two great symphonies, the C and the G minor (for these are pitched in a higher strain than the E flat, which is commonly classed with them); and in "Don Juan" he has come as near as possible to this, and in one sense has attained to it; for in spite of the claim that may be made for Gluck of having reached a more intense expression in some of his dramatic recitative, and in spite of the fact that we certainly recognise in "Fidelio" a higher tone and purpose than we are ever conscious of in "Don Juan,"* it is probable that the work will always remain the central attraction of the operatic stage, from the variety and consistent beauty of the music throughout, and the peculiar fitness of the story for brilliant and pointed musical illustration; but it will be seen that even this way of putting it bears out what has been said of the lack of the highest intensity of feeling, for which indeed there is hardly place in the opera, considering the nature of the libretto. That was what Beethoven (perhaps in one of his "moods") alleged to be the fatal fact against the claim of "Don Juan" to be considered Mozart's greatest work; and in his own treatment of opera he gave certainly a glorious practical exemplification of the importance he attached to a serious purpose and feeling in such a work. But in spite of this there are parts of "Fidelio" which are felt to be somewhat laboured and overweighted for the situation, and this we never feel in "Don Juan." Beethoven's professed preference for "Die Zauberflöte," however, merely because there is some serious music in it, is odd enough; for the fact is that Mozart, in the very carelessness of his nature, placed some of his most serious and grand effusions side by side with a good deal that was little worthy of his genius, merely to humour the wicked manager, with whom he had entered into an unholy alliance, in the endeavour to please everybody; and he has suffered the penalty of his sins in having produced an opera that does not fully please any one, and from which those who would listen with delight to the finer portions are often kept away by their distaste for the nonsense in the piece. The symphonies stand on firmer ground, for they are each unique in their way, and no works in existence can surpass them for finish of structure and entire unity and consistency; both are among the rare things in which not a note can be altered without impairing their completeness; nor would it be easy to surpass the G minor for passion, or the first and last movements of the "Jupiter" for grandeur and elevation of style. Beethoven, whom it is the fashion to speak of as going on where Mozart stopped, &c., did not equal or come near to these in his first two symphonies; it was only when he jumped at one bound to the "Eroica" that one felt that Mozart must take the second place, and even here there is not the wholeness and consistency of Mozart, for the finale is weaker than the rest, and does not seem to belong to it as Mozart's finales belong to what has preceded them. However, Beethoven wrote the C minor Symphony, and after that there was no more to be said on the matter: and in the pianoforte works, of course, there is no comparison, nor is there any "Adelaïda" among Mozart's songs—"L'Addio" is the expression of the tenderest and most pathetic personal parting, but "Adelaïda" rises to the dignity of a typical love-poem, a song from the heart of half mankind.

The style of Mozart is as specially notable for balance and combination of various qualities often supposed to be incompatible with each other, as is the general tone and scope of his genius. In style he is anything but a German musician in an exclusive sense, in that kind of way in which Bach and Schumann are so decidedly German. To a great extent this might be said of Beethoven, who was far more cosmopolitan in his style, or rather in the variety of style which he contrived to assimilate and unite under his own banner, than are any of those more recent German composers who have professed their devout adherence to him as their model and the direct first cause of their art. They have mostly taken one side of Beethoven, the German side of him, and developed it in their own way, and always in a spirit exclusively German. But in Mozart the non-German element is far stronger than in Beethoven. It is hardly recognised in general how exceedingly allied he is to the spirit of Italian music, especially in regard to its best side—the faculty of writing naturally and sympathetically for the voice. "Don Juan" itself might be called an Italian opera into which the constructive power characteristic of the German musical mind had somehow got infused. This was, in fact, another of Beethoven's charges against the work—that it was not true German opera; a criticism the wisdom of which is more than doubtful, for it is this Italian element in the opera which goes far to make its lasting charm both for performers and hearers. As a piece of musical workmanship it is equally complete both in regard to the vocal and instrumental portion, which can hardly be said of "Fidelio." This equable quality of style is a lasting and pervading beauty extending over the whole field of Mozart's productions; it is a quality of the highest value, and which is one of the most thoroughly permanent in its charm; but the continual preservation of it is no doubt an occasional obstacle in the way of very passionate or piquant effect. Mozart could hardly have introduced into any work of his so poignant an incident of dramatic excitement as the shriek of Florestan's wife in "Fidelio," when she arrests the threatened murder of her husband; nor could he have indulged in anything so grotesquely savage as Gluck's Scythian dances: either attempt would have shaken the delicate balance of his style too much. Balance and purity of style were his aim; but the aim can hardly be realised without a certain sacrifice. Another result of this equable artistic temperament is perhaps the fact of a certain similarity of character in the forms of his passages and motivi, which impresses one with the feeling that there was one particular artistic mould into which his ideas, whether consciously or not, were run. He could voluntarily break from this when he chose, as is shown by his two supremely clever pianoforte pieces in imitation of Handel and Bach respectively (for the fugue in the Fantasia in C, though not so avowed, is an obvious imitation of Bach); but as a rule there is a well-defined groove in which the Mozart ideas run, and the late Henry Chorley, in defending his idol Mendelssohn from the charge of exceptional mannerism, went so far as to assert that there was in Mozart as constant a recurrence of the same forms of passages and cadences as we all know there is in Mendelssohn. That was an exaggerated view, but there is really more ground for it than perhaps would be supposed till we come to look into his music with this object. The existence of a prominently marked manner in Mozart has been amusingly illustrated by the success with which a clever French musician (whose name has escaped us at this moment) has concocted and published among his own pianoforte pieces "three favourite andantes" with the name of Mozart appended to them, and his own name as editor, with just that degree of vagueness of statement as to the real authorship which would keep him clear of the charge of making an absolutely false statement as to the authorship. In these the manner of Mozart has been reproduced with great cleverness and delicacy of perception* as to nuances of style, a quality in which few French musicians are deficient.

* Though we did hear a careful father affirm, the other day, that he always took his sons at an early age to see "Don Juan," because the moral lesson conveyed by the closing scene was so striking. But even this apparent solemnity of moral purpose in the opera would be removed if it were performed as originally written, closing (without any chorus) with a half-grotesque "Oh!" on the high D from Leporello, an incident which keeps up the professed intent of the work as opera buffa, and is exactly in the spirit of Molière's treatment of the story, in which, after Don Juan has been carried off by the statue, the play closes by Sganarelle running in a distracted manner to the front, wringing his hands, and exclaiming pathetically, "Mes gages! Mes gages!"

It is right, however, in estimating the degree of serious aim and pathetic feeling in Mozart's work, to take into account the age at which he died, and the tone and feeling of his latest production. The "Requiem," in the portions which were finished or entirely outlined by Mozart, does realise the deepest and most earnest phase of human feeling, and it is not impossible that if it had been completely finished by the composer, it might have presented a whole which would have nearly justified the rather forced encomium that has been passed on it, as the "greatest work of the greatest master." It is at least too fragmentary, in regard to what in it really belongs to Mozart, to hold this place; but it seems to mark an era in the development of his genius which might have ushered in things far greater than he had ever done before, if he had lived to have the opportunity of realising them, especially as he had just received the means, in the shape of a permanent appointment, to render him independent of all the crew of Schickaneders; and he is perhaps the only one of the greatest composers of whom it can be said that he was steadily advancing in power up to his end, and that his last work, though unfinished, was his greatest.

We had intended some remarks, à propos of the subject, on Mozart's pianoforte works in particular, in their relation to the development of the pianoforte style, but must defer these to another occasion.

* This certainly cannot be said of another Mozart forgery of this kind, the Pastorale variée, which, to our astonishment, so artistic a pianist as Madame Remaury has not scrupled to play without note or comment, and which a French house has chosen to publish with the name of Mozart as the composer. It might certainly, however, be urged in defence that persons so abjectly insensible to style as to imagine that this composition could have been written by Mozart or by any composer of his day, deserve to be taken in. The piece is remarkably pretty, and a credit to whoever wrote it, but it is utterly impossible that Mozart could have been its author.

THE LITERATURE OF NATIONAL MUSIC.

By Carl Engel.

No doubt, the introduction of extraneous matter into a discussion is generally objectionable as it is an impediment to the contemplated aim. There are however exceptional instances, in which a few steps aside from the road may not be amiss, were it only to pluck a wild flower. Although I cannot venture to offer the reader anything so pleasant as this, I believe, considering how little is known of the life of the famous "Father Smith," English organists and musical antiquarians will readily pardon a short divergence called forth by the name of the editor of the old dance-tunes just noticed. The celebrated English organ-builder Smith was a native of Germany. His German name was Bernhard Schmid (or Schmidt). He came to England about the year 1660, accompanied by his nephews Gerhard and Bernhard Christian, who worked with him. He was called Father Smith to distinguish him from his nephews; and perhaps also, as Dr. Burney states in his "History of Music," "to express the reverence due to his abilities, which placed him at the head of his profession." As he was so highly appreciated, it is rather singular that hardly any biographical notice of the man has been transmitted to us. The name Schmidt is as common in Germany as Smith is in England; and this perhaps accounts for the birthplace of Father Smith being unknown. His Christian name is, however, not so common. There were two organists of the name of Bernhard Schmidt in the Thomas Church at Strassburg, during the second half of the sixteenth century. The profession of organ-builder was not unfrequently combined with that of organ-player. For instance, Johann Daniel Silbermann, in 1746, and Johann Heinrich Silbermann, in 1754, two sons of the well-known Andreas Silbermann—and likewise Johann Friedrich Silbermann, a grandson of Andreas—practised both professions. Thus also Father Smith, who was organist at St. Margaret's, Westminster. Insufficient as this circumstantial evidence is to determine the original home of Father Smith, it may put the inquirer upon the right track. Andreas Silbermann, born in Saxony, in the year 1678, was the elder brother of the famous Gottfried Silbermann, and the father of a large family of organ-builders. Having settled in Strassburg, he married, in the year 1708, Anne Maria Schmidt—perhaps a relation of Father Smith. These hints must suffice. It is impossible to expatiate here upon a subject which, considering the name involved in it, would lead to endless inquiries.

Neither will it be necessary to enlarge upon the artistic employment of national dance-tunes by our classical composers, as shown in the old suites and such-like publications. These may be supposed to be well known to every musician who has studied his art. It may however interest the reader to have his attention drawn to the continual change in fashion to which even national dances are subjected. Scarcely any of the dances which were so much admired by our forefathers a century or two ago are still in popular favour; and although in some districts of European countries genuine national dances of high antiquity have not entirely yielded to the influence of modern civilisation, there is reason to surmise that they will gradually experience the same decay which has already been, to a great extent, the fate of the old and characteristic usages, notions, poetry, and music of the people. In fact, many of the national dances of the present time are comparatively of modern origin. For instance the Bolero, which from its wide-spread popularity in some countries of America as well as in Spain, might be supposed to be a very old Spanish dance, is, according to some musical historians, an invention of Don Sebastian Zerezo, dating from about the year 1780. However this may be, it is not exactly a new invention, but rather a modification of the Seguidilla, an old Spanish dance which is performed to a song.

The Polka, which in the present century has had its run through almost every civilised country, is only about fifty years old. According to A. Waldau, who relates its history in his little book already mentioned, it was invented, about the year 1830, by a country-lass in Bohemia, who was in service with a citizen in Elbe-Teinitz. Josef Neruda, the schoolmaster of that little town, happening to witness the performance of the dance by the girl, which she had contrived merely for her own amusement, wrote down the tune as she sang it while dancing. The new dance soon found admirers in Elbe-Teinitz, and in the year 1835 it made its way into Prague, the Bohemian metropolis, where it received the name Polka, probably on account of the half-step occurring in the dance; for the Bohemian word Pulka designates "the half." Four years later, its tune, which had now become a great favourite in Prague, was carried to Vienna by a military band which, under the direction of the able bandmaster Pregler, in Prague had obtained some reputation, and which visited Vienna in the year 1839. The Polka became now rapidly known throughout Austria. In 1840 it was danced the first time at the Odéon, a theatre in Paris, by Raab, a dancing-master from Prague. Here it found so much favour that it was introduced with astonishing rapidity into the most elegant and fashionable dancing saloons and private balls of Paris. From France it spread over all Europe, and even through North America. Celebrated composers wrote new tunes to it, and the original tune, which the girl sang, now seems to be lost.

The reader may judge from these statements how difficult it must be in many instances to ascertain the original home of a popular dance-tune. In truth most of the published collections of national dance-tunes contain some specimens which do not properly belong to the country to which they are assigned. It is seldom that these publications include annotations, or even indications which might assist the student. There are, however, a few praiseworthy exceptions. Take, for instance, "A Collection of the Dance Music of Ireland, consisting of upwards of One Hundred National Jigs, Reels, Hornpipes, &c., arranged with easy basses for the pianoforte," by R. M. Levey (London: Jefferys, 1858; folio). This book, too, contains some melodies which are known not to be genuine Irish; but the editor shows, from certain remarks in his Preface, that he is familiar with the peculiar features of the Irish music, and that his special endeavour has been to preserve the tunes intact.

Furthermore, in order to appreciate correctly a national dance-tune, an acquaintance with the usual manner of its performance is even more indispensable than it is in catching the true spirit of a national song. Let us take, for example, a Spanish Fandango arranged for the pianoforte, as it is usually presented to the musical world. To obtain from such an arrangement a right impression of the effect of the music in its original condition, we must know that it is played on the guitar to the flexible and graceful movements and pantomimic action of a male and a female dancer, holding in their hands castanets, which they clatter at certain stages of the dance. We must be able to imagine the picturesque costume of the dancers and of the spectators, who on a Spanish summer evening are assembled on a lawn illuminated by torches, the air being scented by fragrant flowers.

Some of the numerous treatises on the art of dancing which have been published contain descriptions of dances appertaining to uncivilised races. In "A Treatise of the Art of Dancing," by Giovanni Andrea Gallini (London, 1772; 8vo), the student will find a whole chapter on the subject. Much more accurate information, respecting the social habits and amusements of savages in different parts of the world has been obtained since that treatise was published. A small handy book, written in German, and recently issued, may be recommended as useful to inquirers in this branch of national music, although it treats chiefly on the obsolete dances of our ancestors. The title of the book is "Geschichte der Tanzkunst bei den cultivirten Völkern," by Albert Czerwinski (Leipzig: Weber, 1862; 8vo). There is also a chapter on national dances in my book entitled "An Introduction to the Study of National Music, comprising researches into popular songs, traditions, and customs" (London: Longmans and Co, 1866; 8vo). In this book the student will find the titles of many works which, for the sake of brevity, are in the present survey only indicated by the name of the author and the place and date of publication.

There are, besides dance-tunes, some other instrumental pieces which deserve to be classed with national music in a strict sense of the term. Several uncivilised nations have instrumental performances in processions, in warlike exploits, in religious ceremonies, and so on. For some account of such performances the student has to peruse the usual narrations of travellers and of residents in foreign countries, of which presently some remarks will be submitted for his consideration.

Sacred Music.

It would be a mistake, to assume that national music partakes exclusively of a secular character. This is far from being the case. Almost every European nation possesses sacred songs not used in divine worship which are genuine national songs. Some of the collections before mentioned contain specimens of such compositions; and, in Germany, several collections of popular sacred songs have been published separately, as is the case, for instance, in the following books:—

"Geistliche Volkslieder mit ihren ursprünglichen Weisen," (Paderborn: F. Schöningk, 1850; 4to). This collection was compiled by Freiherr von Haxthausen, partly from verbal communication and partly from old hymn-books. It may however be doubted whether all the airs are, as the title professes, those which originally belonged to the words.

"Cantica Spiritualia; oder Auswahl der schönsten geistlichen Lieder," &c. (Augsburg, 1845, and Munich, 1847; 4to, two vols.). The songs are mostly taken from Roman Catholic hymn-books of previous centuries. The airs are printed with a pianoforte accompaniment. Probably but few of them, if any, are still in the mouths of the people; but the publication may assist in rendering them popular again.

"Geistliche Volkslieder aus alter und neuerer Zeit, mit ihren Singweisen," by Friedrich Hommel (Leipzig: B. G. Teubner, 1864; 8vo). The editor states in his preface that in this collection all centuries, from the thirteenth to the present, are represented, and that it includes songs which are still in common use with the people of Bavaria. The airs are given in two-part harmony without any instrumental accompaniment, as the people are in the habit of singing them.

In Germany the Weihnachtslieder, or Christmas Carols, form probably the majority of the songs of this description; and the same appears to be the case in other European countries. English Christmas Carols with the tunes have been edited, in London, by E. F. Rimbault, J. Stainer, and others. Particularly noteworthy for reference are:—

"Christmas Carols, ancient and modern; including the most popular in the West of England, and the airs to which they are sung. Also specimens of French Provincial Carols; with an introduction and notes," by William Sandys (London, 1833; 8vo). And, by the same author: "Christmastide; its History, Festivities, and Carols" (London, no date; 8vo). This book contains, in an appendix, a number of airs arranged in three-part harmony.

"Songs and Carols; printed from a Manuscript of the Fifteenth Century," by Thomas Wright (London, 1842, 8vo).

As regards the Noëls, or Christmas Carols of France, several carefully compiled collections have been printed; take for instance: "Les Noëls Bressans de Bourg, de Pont-de-Vaux et des paroisses voisines,&c., par Philibert Le Duc" (Bourg-en-Bresse, 1845; sm. 8vo). "Air des Noëls Lorrains, &c., par R. Grosjean" (Saint-Dié-des-Vosges, 1862; 4to). "Recueil des Noëls anciens au patois de Besançon" (Besançon, 1852; 8vo). "Noëls nouveaux sur des vieux airs, par C. Ribault de Laugardière" (Bourges, 1857; 8vo). "Recueil des Noëls composés en Langue Provençal par Nicolas Saboly, avec les airs notés, &c., par F. Seguin," (Avignon, 1856; folio).

A published collection of Welsh Christmas Carols bears the title "Caniadau Bethlehem," and is edited by J. D. Jones (Ruthin, 1857; 12mo). Specimens of Slavonic Christmas Carols are given in "Pastoralki i Koledy," &c, by the Abbé Michel-Martin Mioduszewski (Cracow, 1843; 8vo). This interesting book likewise contains old Polish Pastorales and Christmas Carols, with the tunes; to which are added several popular melodies not intended to be sung in church. Mioduszewski has also published a collection of ancient and modern prayers and songs used in the Roman Catholic Church of Poland (Cracow, 1838), with three supplements (Leipzig, 1842, 1853, 1854).

Again, some European nations possess certain hymns, sung in divine worship, which have become so popular that they may properly be classed with the genuine national music. If we remember that the German citizens, on solemn occasions of the highest import for the Fatherland—such as the conquest of an aggressive enemy, the extermination of a raging epidemic, or other national calamity—assemble in the open place of the town to unite their voices in singing the choral, "Nun danket alle Gott" (Now thank we all our God), we cannot but regard the song and its impressive performance in a grand unison as truly national to Germany. In fact, not a few of the tunes of the old chorals were originally secular national airs. Every musician knows that in our sacred music we possess many of the most elaborate and most beautiful works of our classical composers. However, in our present research the intrinsic value of the music exclusively, or even pre-eminently, does not concern us; we have to direct our attention to such sacred music only as is stamped with certain characteristics in its construction or performance peculiar to the taste of a certain nation or race. The synagogical music of the Jews affords, in this respect, an excellent example for investigation. Although some of the hymns of the Jews may not date from so high an antiquity as is assigned to them by certain editors of Hebrew sacred songs, there can be no doubt that they are very old; and the manner of performance of them in the synagogue partakes of an oriental character. This circumstance alone would be sufficient to recommend to the student a careful examination of the Jewish music, were it not on account of its associations with the Temple music of the Hebrews at the time of David and Solomon. The published collections of Jewish sacred songs contain usually, amidst a number of tunes composed by the editor or selected by him from modern compositions, a few old standard tunes, which the student has to pick out. In the following books he will find rather more for his purpose than in other publications of the kind:—

Schir Zion; Gottesdienstliche Gesänge der Israeliten," by Salamon Sulzer (Vienna, about 1840; folio). A collection of Hebrew songs, ancient and modern, which are sung in the synagogues at Vienna. The resemblance of the mode of singing, or rather chanting, in the synagogues to the vocal performances of the Persians and other Eastern nations is unmistakable, and shows to some extent how tenaciously the Jews have preserved ancient usages connected with their religious observances.

"Schire Beth Adonai; oder Tempelgesänge für den Gottesdienst der Israeliten," by H. Weintraub, (Leipzig, 1859; folio). A large and interesting collection of chants and songs as performed in the synagogues of Königsberg, in Prussia. It contains, besides modern compositions, several melodies which are said to be of high antiquity. H. Weintraub observes that the oldest and most universally used chants in the synagogues are generally in the Phrygian and Mixolydian Modes; and as the popular melodies of the Arabs, Persians, and Turks are frequently based upon similar orders of intervals, he concludes that these chants must have originated in the East. He points this out as affording strong evidence in support of the traditional belief of the Jews that their old chants are the identical ones which were in use at the time when the Israelites sojourned in the Promised Land.

"The Ancient Melodies of the Liturgy of the Spanish and Portuguese Jews; harmonized by Emanuel Aguilar; preceded by an historical essay on the Poets, Poetry, and Melodies of the Sephardic Liturgy," by D. A. De Sola (London, 1857; royal 8vo). The editor, the Rev. D. A. De Sola, who was minister of the Spanish and Portuguese Congregation of Jews, Bevis Marks, London, says in his interesting historical essay: "A tradition exists with respect to the melody of the 'Blessing of the Priests' that it is identical with that sung in the Temple, where, as it is known, the priestly choirs were daily wont to bless the people, agreeably to the command to them in Numbers vi. 22-26. That this tradition is supported by great probability, almost amounting to direct proof, will appear from the following considerations: First, that this duty devolved exclusively on the priests, who were a numerous class, who executed it with religious awe and attention, and who, as a privilege peculiar to themselves, scrupulously transmitted it to their sons. It is, therefore, highly improbable that, on the restoration of public divine service, the priests should have used, or the people would have permitted them to introduce, any other melody except the venerated one of the Temple, especially as the blessing of the people was the only act of administration remaining to the priests after the destruction of the Sanctuary. Secondly, we find that, with slight alteration, this blessing is sung to the same melody in every Sephardic congregation. And though our brethren following the German Liturgy have more than one melody for it, they seem to be of comparatively modern introduction; and one of them, said to be the most ancient, contains unmistakable traces of this, which we must consider to be the original melody."

Even more open to criticism is the bold conjecture of the editor respecting the tune of the "Song of Moses," which is also held to be of very remote origin. The tune is given in the book. De Sola remarks upon it: "According to a very ancient Spanish work, printed, if I recollect rightly, in Portugal, 'Some have affirmed that what we now sing to the "Song of Moses" is the same melody which Miriam and her companions sang.' This legend would not merit any serious consideration here, except that it undoubtedly proves that the knowledge of the origin of the melody was already long lost when the ancient Spanish book was written: and here again the acute remark of Dr. Sachs is applicable, that 'Fable soon occupies itself to speak where history is silent.' It is, therefore, highly probable that this melody belongs to a period anterior to the regular settlement of the Jews in Spain. The general adoption thereof by every congregation of the Sephardic Liturgy furnishes also a strong proof in favour of the high antiquity of its origin."

"Hagadah; oder Erzählung von Israels Auszug aus Egypten, &c.; mit Musikbeilagen," by J. Offenbach (Cologne, 1838; 8vo). This curious book, with musical notations of Hebrew songs, contains a solemn narrative of the departure of the Israelites from Egypt, and is intended to be used in the family devotional ceremonies which are observed on the first two evenings of the Matzoth rite, when the Jews eat the unleavened bread, called Matzoth, and the "bitter herbs," consisting of a little parsley dipped in vinegar or salt and water. A German translation, printed in juxtaposition to the Hebrew text, enables the uninitiated reader also to comprehend the singular directions, prayers, and reflections in the book, intended to commemorate the great event of the delivery of the Israelites from Egyptian bondage. The editor was the principal singer of the Jewish synagogue at Cologne, and the father of the composer Offenbach, whose flippant operas found recently many admirers, especially in Paris.

"A Selection of Hebrew Melodies, Ancient and Modern, &c.," by T. Nathan. The poetry written expressly for the work by Lord Byron (London, 1824; folio, four vols.). The first edition was published in the year 1815 by Nathan and Braham conjointly.

There are also collections of synagogical songs edited by Salaman and Verrinder (London; oblong 8vo), by A. A. Wolff (Copenhagen, 1839; 8vo), by Emile Jonas (Paris, 1854), by Mayer and Staab (Mayence, 1861; 4to), &c.

As regards the liturgic songs of the Greek Church, a comprehensive collection has been brought out by J. C. N. Chaviara, the principal singer in the Church of the Greeks at Vienna. A revised edition of his work (Vienna, 1859; royal 8vo, six numbers) has the text printed with Roman letters placed under the Greek letters, which may be convenient to some musicians. The melodies are the original Greek ones, but they are harmonised for four voices by B. Randhartinger, the director of the Greek Church music at Vienna. Equally interesting, or perhaps even more so, are the published works of vocal compositions appertaining to the Greek Church of Russia. Take, for instance, the songs arranged for four voices by Peter Tourchannin (St. Petersburg, 1832; folio). The British Museum possesses some old collections of vocal music used in the service of the Greek Church, in 4to, which were printed in Moscow. The circumstance of these works being almost invariably issued with the Russian text only, is to most musicians of Western Europe an obstacle to their familiarising themselves with the compositions, and to their appreciating accurately whatever beauty and impressiveness the music may possess. The same remark applies even more forcibly to the sacred vocal music of nations or races less known in Western Europe than the Russians, as, for instance, the Armenians, Copts, Abyssinians, who are Christians; and, still more, to the Pagan sacred music of extra-European nations. A mere notation of such music, without some verbal explanation, is almost as a sealed book. However, we possess, as will presently be shown, treatises which may assist the intelligent inquirer.

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

I PURPOSE devoting this final chapter upon the letters of Beethoven to such indications as the later ones afford of the master's opinion on artistic subjects. Unfortunately for this purpose, as for music in general, Beethoven was not in the habit of discussing such matters with his correspondents. Though an industrious letter-writer, who scattered missives, from a note containing only a few words to a lengthy epistle, almost broadcast among his friends, he rarely touched upon the higher topics connected with art. His own wants and afflictions, family and domestic troubles, negotiations with publishers, and so on, formed the burden of the master's correspondence, and only now and then did he refer, in a casual way, to that which must have been even more than these things in his thoughts. But Beethoven does not here stand alone. The great composers of his epoch, most of them at least, were equally reticent. Haydn poured work after work from his teeming brain, and said as little about them, save in the way of business, as possible. So it was with Mozart, Weber, and even with that born letter-writer, Mendelssohn. It has been reserved for our day to witness the spectacle of composers giving formal expression to their opinions and fighting the battle of their own productions. But few and far between as are the indications in these letters of Beethoven's thoughts on musical things, they are worth notice and certain to repay observation.

In 1817 Beethoven addressed to the Hofrath von Mosel a letter in which he actually proposed to abolish the Italian words used to indicate the proper time of a composition, and this by the way is the fullest statement of opinion on a technical subject which has come to us from him. The master's remarks are so curious that I must give them entire:—

"I sincerely rejoice that we take the same view as to the terms in use to denote the proper time in music which have descended to us from barbarous ages. For example, what can be more irrational than the general term allegro, which only means lively; and how far we often are from comprehending the real time, so that the piece itself contradicts the designation. As for the four chief movements—which are, indeed, far from possessing the truth or accuracy of the four cardinal points—we readily agree to dispense with them; but it is quite another matter as to the words that indicate the character of the music; these we cannot consent to do away with, for while the time is, as it were, part and parcel of the piece, the words denote the spirit in which it is conceived. So far as I am myself concerned, I have long purposed giving up those inconsistent terms allegro, andante, adagio, and presto, and Maelzel's metronome furnishes us with the best opportunity of doing so. I here pledge myself to make use of them no longer in any of my new compositions. It is another question whether we can by this means attain the necessary universal use of the metronome. I scarcely think we shall. I make no doubt that we shall be loudly proclaimed as despots, but if the cause itself were to derive benefit from this, it would at least be better than to incur the reproach of feudalism. In our country, where music has become a national requirement, and where the use of the metronome must be enjoined on every village schoolmaster, the best plan would be for Maelzel to endeavour to sell a certain number of metronomes by subscription at the present higher prices, and, as soon as the number covers his expenses, he can sell the metronomes demanded by the national requirements at so cheap a rate that we may certainly anticipate their universal use and circulation."

It would be easy to imagine from the tone of this letter that Beethoven was really in earnest when he proposed to drive away allegro and its fellow Italians by the ticking of Maelzel's ingenious machine. Probably he himself believed in his own set purpose; but, as a matter of fact, the subject was never again touched upon, and Beethoven took no more notice of his pledge than he would have done had it been uttered in joke. Allegro flourishes to this day, relic of a barbarous time though it be, and there is reason to fear that, even in an age of School Boards, village pedagogues know little about the metronome. But it was characteristic of the man to rush at conclusions, and take up with fancies at first sight, only to drop them as quietly and quickly as possible.

Beethoven is, perhaps, more often spoken of as a "tone-poet" than any other musical composer. The expression sometimes gives rise to ridicule on the part of timid souls who dare not go outside the notion that a poet is necessarily a man who writes verses. But the master himself sanctioned the term; and, indeed, may be said to have suggested it, for in a letter addressed to Frau von Streicher he wrote: "When you visit the ancient ruins (at Baden) do not forget that Beethoven has often lingered there; when you stray through the silent pine forests, do not forget that Beethoven often wrote poetry there, or, as it is termed, composed." With this utterance the great man was always consistent. Like St. Paul, he magnified his office and claimed for it the highest intellectual and artistic honours. But while taking this large and comprehensive view of his position, and while constitutionally disinclined to matters of pettiness and routine, he was as careful about the text of his music as though he foresaw the rising up of innumerable editors prepared to edit him out of existence. Hence his constant fulminations against copyists and engravers, and hence too the surprising manner in which he would insist upon an apparently trifling alteration in a work long since finished and, as was thought, done with. At one time we find him writing to Ries in London to add a new bar to a Pianoforte Sonata, at another he directs his former pupil, then also in London, to change a single note in the oboe part of the Ninth Symphony, and at another we find him explaining to the engraver that the staccato expressed by a perpendicular dash differs from that signified by a dot, and that a "tie" embracing two notes in a group of three is not the same as that which takes in the whole. Precisely the same degree of minute care was insisted upon in the performance of his works. On one occasion he addressed Herr Meyer with regard to a representation of "Fidelio," which had not pleased him, in terms showing grave annoyance: "Pray try to persuade Herr von Seyfried to direct my opera, as I wish on this occasion to see and hear it myself from a distance. In this way my patience will at all events not be so severely tried as when I am close enough to hear my music bungled. I really do believe that it is done on purpose to annoy me! I will say nothing of the wind instruments; but all pp's, cresc., discresc., and all f's and ff's may as well be struck out of my opera, for no attention whatever is paid to them. I shall lose all pleasure in composing anything in future if I am to hear it given thus." Yet this precise individual is the man who scribbled down his thoughts in almost incomprehensible characters on whatever paper lay nearest his hand, and allowed the MSS. so to litter his room that nothing could be found when wanted. Stranger still is the fact that he repeatedly sanctioned the alteration or re-arrangement of his music by other hands. We should have expected to find Beethoven jealous to the last degree on this point. But no; he was as accommodating as any hack composer with no reputation to lose, and only his bread to get. True, we find him protesting, in one letter, that he would allow nobody to touch his works. But against this we hear him saying, in another, speaking of a march: "Several sets of wind instruments may combine in the performance of the Grand March, and if this cannot be done, and a regimental band is not strong enough for its present arrangement, any bandmaster can easily adapt it by omitting some of the parts." Again, referring to the Mass in D, he wrote: "There is no doubt that it might be almost entirely executed à la capella; in which case, however, the work would have to be arranged accordingly; perhaps you have patience to do this." Yet again, addressing Hofmeister about the Septet (Op. 20), he said: "It would be a good thing if you would arrange the Septet you are about to publish as a quintett with a flute part, for instance; this would be an advantage to amateurs of the flute, who have already importuned me on the subject, and who would swarm round it like insects and banquet on it." Beethoven was consistent in this matter, for the liberty he permitted and even incited to be taken with his own compositions he was perfectly ready to exercise as regards the works of others. Hence we read in the letter last quoted: "The arrangement of Mozart's Sonatas as quartetts will do you much credit, and, no doubt, be profitable also. I wish I could contribute more to the promotion of such an undertaking; but I am an irregular man, and too apt, even with the best intentions, to forget everything. I have, however, mentioned the matter to various people, and I everywhere find them well-disposed towards it." The advocates of "arrangements" may certainly boast of the fact that Beethoven was on their side, and are entitled to shelter themselves, as far as may be, behind his great name and formidable example. Happily, not even Beethoven was infallible.

The letters contain very few references to the great masters who preceded or were contemporary with Beethoven, and it is difficult to gather from them any full and accurate idea of how they were esteemed by the writer. In one, addressed to the Archduke Rudolph, we find the names of Bach and Handel mentioned as thus: "The chief object must be to hit off our idea at once, and in accordance with a high class of art, unless the object in view should require different and more practical treatment. On this point the ancient composers offer the best examples, as most of these possess real artistic value (though among them the German Handel and Sebastian Bach can alone lay claim to genius); but freedom and progress are our true aim in the world of art, just as in the great creation at large; and if we moderns are not so far advanced as our forefathers in solidity, still the refinement of our ideas has contributed in many ways to their enlargement." On another occasion, writing to Hofmeister, he speaks of Bach in terms enthusiastic enough to satisfy the late Mr. Samuel Wesley: "Your intention to publish Sebastian Bach's works really gladdens my heart, which beats with devotion for the lofty and grand productions of this our father of the science of harmony, and I trust I shall soon see them appear." Elsewhere Beethoven expresses anxiety to possess a copy of "Bach's five-part Mass" (the B minor), and writes thus to Gottfried Weber: "Holz tells me that it is your intention to publish a larger size of the engraving representing Handel's monument in St. Peter's Church, London. This affords me extreme pleasure independent of the fact that I was the person who suggested it." Mozart's name occurs but rarely; there is, however, one interesting letter thanking the Abbé Stadler for a pamphlet in which he had protested against an attempt to palm off certain passages in the "Requiem" as the work of that master. Addressing the Abbé as "Reverend and honoured sir," Beethoven said: "You have really done well in rendering justice to the manes of Mozart by your inimitable pamphlet, which so searchingly enters into the matter, and you have earned the gratitude of the lay and the profane, as well as of all who are musical, or have any pretensions to be so. To bring a thing of this kind forward as H. W. (supposed to be Gottfried Weber) has done, a man must either be a great personage or a nonentity. Be it remembered also that it is said this same person has written a book on composition, and yet has ascribed to Mozart such passages as the following [passage quoted], and has added such things as [two passages quoted] as examples of his own composition. H. W.'s astonishing knowledge of harmony and melody recalls the old composers of the empire. Requiescant in pace. I especially thank you, my dear friend, for the pleasure you have conferred on me by your pamphlet. I have always accounted myself one of Mozart's greatest admirers, and shall continue to be so till my last breath. I beg, venerable sir, for your blessing," &c. This is conclusive as regards Beethoven's affection for Mozart. What the master thought of his distinguished contemporary, Cherubini, we have to gather as best we may from less trustworthy evidence. In 1823, when anxious to obtain regal subscribers to his grand Mass, Beethoven addressed himself directly to Cherubini, who had influence with the King of France, and of course said a good many very complimentary things. Even this stern, outspoken master could practise a little diplomacy, and say very flattering words when the object to be gained by them seemed worth the trouble. If therefore he lauded Cherubini to the skies, we are not bound to conclude that in reality he thought the Florentine worthy of quite so high a place. Here are some of the expressions used: "The artistic world has only to lament that, in Germany at least, no new dramatic piece of yours has appeared. Highly as all your works are valued by true connoisseurs, still it is a great loss to art not to possess any fresh production of your great genius for the theatre. True art is imperishable, and the true artist feels sincere pleasure in grand works of genius, and that is what enchants me when I hear a new composition of yours; in fact, I take greater interest in it than in my own. In short, I love and honour you. Were it not that continued bad health prevents my going to see you in Paris, with what exceeding delight would I discuss questions of art with you. Do not think that this is merely intended to serve as an introduction to the favour I am about to ask of you." Beethoven then prefers his request, and adds, in a curious mixture of German and indifferent French: "Whatever may be the fate of my request to you, I shall for ever continue to love and esteem you, and you will always remain the one among my contemporaries whom I esteem the most. If you would give me extreme pleasure, write me a few lines. They would greatly solace me. Art unites all the world, how much more, then, true artists, and perhaps you deign to include me in that number." It has always been a reproach to Cherubini that he never answered this letter. True, he declared over and over again, when he discerned the importance of the affair in the eyes of the world, that he never received it, and the statement may of course be correct. But those who know anything of Cherubini's ill-grained nature find it only too easy to believe that the letter reached his hands, and was thrown aside at once. The extracts given above, though scanty, prove with sufficient clearness that Beethoven knew how to discern and reverence the greatness of others. To most of us this may seem the most natural thing in the world. But the self-esteem of a composer often throws a veil over the excellences of his rivals, besides which Beethoven must have been conscious of his own surpassing merit. It could not have been hidden from him that his music opened a new era in art, that he had given to music its most exalted expression, and that compared with him his predecessors and contemporaries were little better than "children crying in the night." This he knew, and it is this which makes so great the spectacle of Beethoven lovingly poring over the works of Handel during the last few days of his weary life.

The question may arise, In what degree was Beethoven a vain man in the sense of prizing external distinction? That he was proud we know well, but a man may be this, and yet feel utterly indifferent to the things which as a rule minister to pride. It would appear from the letters that our master was not wholly wanting in susceptibility to common-place distinctions. He speaks warmly about the notice taken of his great Mass by the King of Prussia, and says: "I received a hint at the time about the second-class of the order of the Red Eagle. I do not know what the result may be, for I have never sought such distinctions, though in these days, for many reasons, they would not be unwelcome to me." In the same letter we read, "The late King of France sent me a medal with the inscription, Donné par le Roi à M. Beethoven, accompanied by a very polite letter from le premier gentilhomme du Roi, le Duc de Châtres." I have drawn attention to these flattering marks of royal honour in order to compare Beethoven's reception of them, highly as they pleased him, with that of a tribute of respect paid by the musicians of far-away Sweden. In this comparison it is easy to see how much the artist, proud of the notice of other artists, dominated the man, pleased with a diamond ring or a Red Eagle. In 1823, Beethoven was elected an honorary member of the Royal Swedish Musical Academy, and the news so gratified him that he actually wrote to the editor of the Austrian Observer a letter announcing it to the world: "I shall feel honoured if you will be so good as to mention in your esteemed journal my nomination as honorary member of the Royal Swedish Musical Academy. Although neither vain nor ambitious, still I consider it not advisable to pass over such an occurrence, as in practical life we must live and work for others, who may often eventually benefit by it. Forgive my intrusion, and let me know if I can in any way serve you in return, which it would give me much pleasure to do." This letter was forwarded to Schindler with another, in which Beethoven's gossip and tenth-rate Boswell was characteristically addressed as "Most worthy ragamuffin of Epirus and Brundusium." In this the master betrays his anxiety to have his new distinction, such as it was, well trumpeted: "Give this letter to the editor of the Observer, but write the address on it first; ask him at the same time whether his daughter makes great progress on the piano, and if I can be of any use to her by sending her a copy of one of my compositions. I wrote that I was an honorary member. I don't know whether this is correct; perhaps I ought to have said a corresponding member, neither knowing nor caring much about such things. You had also better say something on the subject to Bernardum non sanctum (editor of the Vienna Zeitschrift). . . . Ask both these philosophical newspaper scribes whether this may be considered an honourable or dishonourable nomination." How Beethoven himself considered it his words show so plainly that there is no need to dwell upon them.

Not the least interesting references to art-matters which these letters contain are found in the epistles addressed from time to time to the Archduke Rudolph. This most musical member of the imperial family had taken lessons in composition from Beethoven, and was in the habit of sending his effusions for his old master's examination and criticism. As far as we have any evidence on the matter, Beethoven handled these works very tenderly, but sometimes gave advice which could not well be taken as implying other than reproof. In one case he speaks at unusual length: "I cannot strain my eyes yet long at a time; I beg therefore Y. R. H.'s indulgence with regard to your variations, which appear to me very charming, but still need closer revision on my part. Y. R. H. has only to persevere, especially to accustom yourself to write down your ideas at once at the piano, quickly and briefly. For this purpose a small table ought to be placed close beside the piano. By this means not only is the imagination strengthened, but you learn instantly to hold fast the most fugitive ideas. It is equally necessary to be able to write without any piano; and sometimes a simple choral melody, to be carried out in simple or varied phrases, in counterpoint or in a free manner, will certainly entail no headache on Y. R. H., but rather, in finding yourself thus right amid the centre of art, cause you very great pleasure. The faculty of representing precisely what we wish and feel comes by degrees—an essential desideratum for a noble-minded man."

With this glimpse of Beethoven uttering words ex cathedrâ I close the volumes of his letters. Many points remain unnoticed, but all the more salient ones have passed under review; and if the result has been in any degree to promote acquaintance with the most illustrious of masters, my readers and myself have not vainly "walked together in company."

POPULAR MUSIC.

By HENRY C. LUNN.

IT has often been said, and it appears to me with much truth, that he who will go out and mix with the persons for whom he legislates will derive more knowledge of their actual wants in one week than he can gain by reading and study on the subject in ten years. In Oliver Wendell Holmes's charming little book, "The Poet at the Breakfast-Table," the entomologist (who, although devoted heart and soul to the investigation of beetles, is one of the most delightful talkers we have met with) says, "I never saw the man that couldn't teach me something;" and that we may all understand the true method of drawing forth this "something" when the opportunity offers, he gives us this little bit of advice: "If you are of the large-brained variety of the race, and want to fill out your programme of the order of things in a systematic and exhaustive way, and get all the half-notes and flats and sharps of humanity into your scale, you'd a great deal better shut your front door and open your two side ones when you come across a fellow that has made a real business of doing anything."

Now it has frequently occurred to me that those who devote themselves to providing "people's music," at moderate prices, as a rule, bestow but little pains to ascertain what kind of compositions the "people" really desire. Taking it for granted that popular art must be inferior art, selections intended to attract what is usually termed the "million" are often made up of materials which would repel music-lovers, whilst they are too pretentious to suit the frivolous taste of those who desire to have their evening's amusements accompanied by a band. On the principle laid down in the book already referred to, I have constant talks with those who may be accepted as faithful specimens of the "million," and find that the elevation of the musical taste has proceeded much more rapidly than is usually supposed. At the last Gloucester Festival, for example, when the fashionably dressed promenaders were about to re-enter the cathedral for the second part of the morning's performance I was addressed by an earnest and intelligent-looking working-man, who inquired whether I thought he should be able to hear many of the choruses in the "Hymn of Praise" outside. Finding by my reply that I sympathised with him, he began to enlarge upon the wondrous beauties of the choral pieces he had already heard; but it was not until I asked him whether he would like to be inside the cathedral that the weight of his rough eloquence touched me. "Like to be there, sir!" he said, calmly and with not a tinge of bitter feeling in the tone of his voice; "yes, if I could get a corner where my poor dress would not be seen, and so would many like me. But the Festival's not for such as us. I often wonder whether the ladies and gentlemen that come in their carriages to hear the music think as much of it as I should, for if I could once listen to it as they do, I think I could die happy." The opinion expressed by this man I found fairly represented the class to which he belonged, for in conversation with many others in the town it was often observed to me not only that good music well done was shut out from "such as them," but that bad music ill done was presumed to be the kind of entertainment they craved for. I could multiply instances in confirmation of my position, both at festival towns and in the metropolis, but one more must now suffice.

I was looking at some excellent oil-paintings exhibited in a shop near Regent Street a few days ago, when a boy, carrying a small basket, stopped at my side and gazed at the pictures with an air of interest which arrested my attention. Now generally when street-boys are musically inclined they whistle, or at least hum a snatch of some popular tune; but to my surprise no sooner had this little fellow fairly entered into the spirit of the picture than he began to sing, with a clear voice and perfect intonation, "Why do the nations?" from the "Messiah." Of course I concluded that after a few bars he would break off, but, although evidently perfectly unconscious that anybody was listening, he went through the air, as I followed him up the street, not missing a single note, and executing some of the passages with remarkable precision.

With such facts before us it appears strange that we should cling to our old-world notions, and refuse to recognise a truth which (setting artistic feeling aside) I believe it would be profitable to admit. If, for example, it is possible to give, at moderate prices, a really first-rate performance of one of the standard Oratorios in a provincial town, I firmly believe that it would be considered a boon by many to whom such an opportunity might never occur again. And yet we find that the supplementary "popular" concert at the last Leeds Festival, at which the artists volunteered their services, was made up of scraps, the great works being reserved for those who can afford to pay for such luxuries: indeed, as my Gloucester friend truly observed, Oratorios are for "ladies and gentlemen;" but then it must be added that poor music-lovers may listen outside.

To refer to the cheap musical entertainments in the metropolis, it may reasonably be asked why quadrilles, waltzes, selections from operas, and "Royalty" songs should be considered the only works suitable for the general public because they were so many years ago. It is true that in the days of Jullien's "Promenade Concerts," lively dances, performed by an efficient band, and operatic selections were a real attraction, because the "people" knew nothing whatever of great orchestral works: and the Opera being shut out from them, they were content to hear the melodious gems from these popular lyrical compositions well played instead of well sung; but these times have passed away, and the persons who desire to enjoy good music should no longer be mixed up with those who merely seek the pleasure of a cheerful promenade. Even when, during Jullien's musical reign, the house was darkened for the "storm" in Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony," and theatrical thunder, lightning, and rain were added to the score, the senses of musical amateurs were only shocked by the degrading accessories employed, for the music was there; and it might be possible for enthusiasts to listen only to the composer's instrumentation; but the "British Army Quadrille," which still retains its place as a sensational piece, can have no possible claim upon the sympathies of those who can at all appreciate a higher class of composition; for it is not a "Quadrille," and as abstract music it is beneath criticism. Of the "original effects," too, something must be said; for, not to dwell upon the victorious shouting of the troops, and a few other minor matters not usually included in "programme music," it is by no means agreeable for ladies, during a short promenade for the purpose of gaining a breath of fresh air, to be chased back to their boxes by a party of Highlanders who, in the scanty costume of their country, are marching through the house to join their comrades at the rendezvous in the orchestra. It cannot with truth be said that the announcement of this composition (if so it may be termed) does not bring many persons to the theatre; but on the last occasion of its performance I heard it almost universally spoken of throughout the house with the utmost contempt, and the attempts of the members of the band to preserve their martial bearing whilst carrying their unwieldy instruments through the lobbies and up and down the staircases were received with shouts of laughter. There can be no doubt that reviving the "British Army Quadrille" in the present day is equivalent to placing upon the stage as a "thrilling" piece an old-world melodrama, such as we have seen burlesqued at the "Dramatic College Fête," with the idea that the audience will be intensely interested in the incidents. The fact is that education has taught the people how to estimate works which make no appeal to their intellectual faculties; and I feel convinced that in the pantomime season—which is now fast approaching—much might be done towards rendering this entertainment attractive, even to a high-class audience, by prefacing it with a light, melodious and artistic overture, and accompanying the action and scenic effects with appropriate and thoughtful music, instead of jumbling together a number of music-hall tunes as an introduction, and vulgarising the stage-business by the conventional common-place orchestral passages strung together without order or form. The doings of fairies, water-sprites, gnomes, and other recognised pantomimic beings have already called forth many charming compositions from the ablest musicians; and I am certain that success awaits any enterprising manager who will have the courage to present the public with a pantomime in which the music shall form one of the principal attractions. We have in the metropolis a large and rapidly increasing number of amateurs who cannot brook the degradation of art under any circumstances, and who instinctively, therefore, shrink from contact with those by whom they are surrounded even on the so-called "classical nights" at the "Promenade Concerts;" for, supposing that it were practicable for persons of cultivated taste to ignore the associations of the place, it would be impossible for them to avoid hearing the popping of champagne corks in the middle of a slow movement, or to refrain from seeing a stand-up fight close to them during the performance of a symphony. There can be no possible reason why those who consider music as a secondary attraction should not have a room set apart for their gratification; but the hybrid entertainment now provided, with the hope of attracting the musician as well as the lounger, can afford no solid gratification to either. What we really want in London is a concert-room which shall be open nightly at prices within the reach of all who love music for its own sake, and are ready to pay a moderate sum to hear it. I believe, as I have already hinted, that those who cater for the people's musical wants think that this can only be successfully done by lowering the standard of art! The crowds nightly flocking to the cheap portions of the room at the "Monday Popular Concerts" may however be accepted as sufficient evidence of the progress of public taste; and there can be little doubt that if, on the plan recommended by the Entomologist in the "Poet at the Breakfast-Table," those whose interest it is to elicit the truth were to "shut their front doors, and open their two side ones," some facts would come to light which might astonish them.

The management of an opera-house or theatre is notoriously an attractive as well as dangerous calling to men with money, and, no matter what its sinister repute, an "enterprising impresario" can generally be found willing to try his fortune at the game. It appears from a letter which we publish in another column that the Spanish Government is fully awake to this fact. At any rate, the lease of the Theatre Royal, Madrid, being disposable, the Government has acted with regard to it as though all Europe were an eager bidder. The conditions laid down are, in truth, a "caution," and we will group them closely for the reader's wonder. First, not more than 120 nor less than ninety performances between October and April. Second, twelve artists of European repute, a chorus of eighty; orchestra of a hundred. Third, a good ballet. Fourth, adequacy of engagements to be decided by a jury. Fifth, two new or unfamiliar works each year, one by a native composer. Sixth, chief part in one opera to be given, if required, to the best pupil of the National School of Music. Seventh, lease for five years certain; if a sixth season be given, lessee to put up an organ. Eighth, all scenery, decorations, &c., to remain the property of the Government. Ninth, deposit of £2,000. Subscriptions to be handed over to Treasury and withdrawn fortnightly to meet expenses pro ratâ. Tenth, rent paid in advance. Eleventh, Government may rescind the contract for breach of engagement, lessee to forfeit deposit. Had we read these terms in a comic paper we should have regarded them as a ludicrous exaggeration of an ordinary one-sided bargain; but the marvel of it is that, not only was the Government serious, but no fewer than eight gentlemen tendered for the lease. Our correspondent, Mr. Burch, assures us of this otherwise incredible fact, and says that one eager aspirant, Don Jose Fernando Riviro, offered a rental of £7,220, which was accepted. Another offer was as low as £400, and it is a curious illustration of the hap-hazard way in which these things are done that A was willing to give more than eighteen times as much as B for precisely the same article. We wish Señor Don Jose Fernando Riviro joy of his bargain, and shall be curious to know how long he "runs" the house. It is true we are not intimately acquainted with the conditions of opera in Madrid; but if the Government here shows itself an equitable landlord, on the principle of "live and let live," the Spanish capital must be the Goshen of lyric drama.

We have often wondered whether, as music becomes more general, certain portions of the metropolis will be set aside for the residences of those who practise the art, so that quiet, respectable people who return from their daily routine of commercial life may rest undisturbed by the sound of instruments or voices around them. If we may believe what we hear, some such measure must shortly be taken, for we know of professors, and even amateurs, who have been refused a house because the landlord objected to music. In some cases concessions have been made—the tenants perhaps might play two hours a day, one in the morning, and one in the evening, must not perform upon more than two instruments, and guarantee that no choral meetings shall be held—but even then the surrender of the premises to a person who habitually seeks either profit or pleasure from the art appears to be considered a favour. Now it is evident that if this state of things is to continue some compromise should be effected, more especially when we consider that landlords have partially brought the evil upon themselves; for there can be no doubt that the thickness of the party-walls of our modern houses has been diminishing as music has increased. In the first place, the practice of the scales might be allowed up to eleven o'clock a.m., exercises to twelve, and pieces in the evening—placid music only being permitted after nine p.m. Then, not only the number, but the quality of the instruments ought to be mentioned in the agreement, so that the amount of noise made by each tenant should be equalised—one trombone, for instance, balancing a flute, violin, and violoncello; one bassoon, a clarionet and harp, and so on, according to a sliding scale based upon an accurate knowledge of the sound emitted from each instrument. If something of this kind be not speedily done, apart from the alternative we have mentioned of professional artists and amateurs being banished to quarters of the town especially set apart for them, it may happen that landlords themselves would suffer; for the members of the "cheerful, musical family" we so often see advertised as an attraction at boarding-houses would assuredly become so crushed by adverse influences as to render it utterly impossible for them to be either "cheerful" or "musical."

A letter from a correspondent, who signs himself "Onward," directs our attention to a subject which we quite agree with him has hitherto been but little regarded in this country. The Universities have made their regulations for granting musical degrees much more stringent, and at many colleges examinations have been instituted, so that accredited teachers may easily be separated from the self-created professors who flourish upon the ignorance of those who employ them. Yet, as our correspondent truly says, "We have degrees and certificates for teachers of organ-playing, piano-playing, sight-singing, composition, &c., but no provision whatever for testing the capabilities of teachers of solo-singing, though it is no exaggeration to say that there is no department of musical teaching wherein incompetence is more dangerous, inasmuch as in its results it may materially affect the health of the student." We care not here to discuss the question whether it is requisite for a professor of the vocal art to have, "in addition to a musical education, a thorough knowledge of the anatomy and physiology of the throat, chest, and head, the mechanism of pronunciation, and at least the rudiments of two or three languages;" but this we do say, that whatever may be considered by a competent tribunal absolutely necessary qualifications for teachers of singing should be properly and circumstantially stated, and that diplomas should only be granted after as searching and rigid an examination as we now have for other branches of the art. It may be, as "Onward" hints, that there is a widely spread notion that "singing is simply an inferior branch of musical art which any competent musician can teach;" but, if so, the sooner this illusion is dispelled the better, for it is absurd that those who profess the pianoforte, organ, or harmony should be subjected to a rigid examination whilst persons who can merely warble a few fashionable songs are at once accepted as "singing masters."

An advertisement daily appearing in the newspapers is headed "Bad Grammar—why be laughed at?" Without stopping to consider whether it is the custom to laugh at a person who is in the habit of occasionally tripping in his native language, it must be remembered that it is only in conversation or in private letters that such mistakes are made; for a book written throughout in bad English would unquestionably be refused by every publisher to whom it was offered; and education has so far advanced that no bookseller could be found who would even publish such a work at the author's expense. How devoutly is it to be wished that we had arrived at this state of culture in music. True it is that all persons who do not mind bearing the cost have a perfect right to issue music on their own account, the grammatical inaccuracy of which would never be detected by those as imperfectly educated as themselves, but—as these productions are not submitted, like literary works, to any competent tribunal before publication—have we not a right to expect that they should be circulated exclusively amongst those for whom they are fitted? We have now innumerable compositions of this class, both vocal and instrumental, which have from time to time been forwarded to us for review. It is true that we could pass these over silently; but before committing them to oblivion it seems an act of charity to give a kindly word of advice to their authors. Leaving artistic consideration out of the question then, we ask what possible reason there can be for proclaiming your incompetence aloud? Ignorance only becomes actively offensive when it is forced upon the world as knowledge. By all means then play, sing, or compose among your equals if it gratify you; but, in the words of the warning already quoted, "Why be laughed at?"

It is unquestionably an exceedingly difficult matter to find a catching title for what is termed a "novel of modern life." In the days of "Pamela," "Evelina," "Caleb Williams," and other works of sterling literary merit, the name of the hero or heroine was usually considered sufficient, because the interest was centred in the story itself, and what it was called therefore was of secondary importance. But when three volumes of sentiment for the young ladies took the place of these works, some pretty little conceit was necessary to catch the eye in an advertisement; and we cannot be surprised therefore that shrewd lady novelists hit upon the notion of using well-known song titles. No doubt it must somewhat tax an author's powers to write a readable novel called "Good-bye, sweetheart;" to present a succession of stirring incidents which shall in some manner illustrate "Comin' through the rye;" or to invent a story which must be entitled "Cherry ripe;" but all this has been done, and the publishers will tell us with what triumphant success. It will, of course, be some time before our popular songs are exhausted by novel-writers, and we may therefore reasonably look for many more works of this class. Meanwhile, however, it would be good, we think, to look over a list of songs for some which will more decisively indicate the leading features of a story than those we have mentioned. For the adventures of an erratic young traveller, for example, who after many years of wandering returns to his native country and his first love, "I've been roaming" would be particularly applicable; and, as eccentric titles, for a temperance novel we would suggest "Drops of brandy," and for one, the principal character in which is an over-cautious old sportsman, "Pop goes the weasel."

A "second Mozart" has appeared in America, and his name is "Georgie" Fox. Master Georgie is in his eighth year, "perfect in form and features, with a handsome face, full of expression." Here, at any rate, we have one point of resemblance, for Mozart was a pretty boy; and those who have seen his portrait as a boy in the Mozarteum of Salzburg, easily call to mind the bright face and dapper little figure in Court dress. But Georgie can play the pianoforte, although "his knowledge of music is nothing," and his acquaintance with the instrument goes no further than the names of the white keys. He extemporises, moreover, and on one occasion improvised that which "took the form of a sonata." The sonata, we are told, was "correctly phrased," and its modulations were good, while it never repeated anything; which raises a doubt as to whether the reporter knew exactly what a sonata might be. A few weeks ago Georgie tried an organ for the first time, and since then he does not care for the piano. It was "wonderful to hear him" perform on the instrument he had never before touched; but it seems that the young gentleman is not always in the mood to do himself justice. Only when "the spirit moves" does Georgie appear as a wonder-child. We are not told whether this small person, whose knowledge of music is nothing, rivals Mozart at the same age in composition, but there can hardly be a doubt that Georgie Fox has an exceptional musical organisation. He is to be brought out at a benefit-concert, and we hope that his resemblance to Mozart will not be carried to the extent of forced development and premature collapse.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

It is a matter of regret that the new singer, Mdlle. Ambre, should have made her début in Verdi's sickly and somewhat repulsive Opera, "La Traviata"; but vocalists on the lyric stage will place themselves before the art, and as long as audiences will support them in doing so, we can scarcely hope for any reform. Many preliminary paragraphs have heralded the coming of Mdlle. Ambre; but as it concerns us little to know exactly where she was born, and whether it is really true that she belongs to a "distinguished Moorish family," we merely chronicle her success, reserving a more detailed criticism until we have heard her as the heroine of Gounod's "Faust," which is announced too late for notice in our present number. We may say, however, that she has a fine voice, especially in the upper register, and that in expressive singing she is extremely good. The air, "Ah! fors' e lui," was most effectively rendered, and in many portions of the Opera she showed much unexaggerated dramatic feeling. "Carmen," with Madame Trebelli as the gipsy, continues to be the principal attraction; but the stock Operas have also drawn good houses, Mdlle. Marimon having materially strengthened the cast in most of these works. The attendance on the whole has fully proved that Mr. Mapleson's "Autumn Opera" at reduced prices has become a recognised institution of the country.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

On the 2nd ult. a selection from the works of Mendelssohn formed the programme of the Saturday concert. In addition to such well-known numbers as the Scherzo and Notturno, from the "Midsummer Night's Dream," the Overture to "Athalie," and the pianoforte Concerto in G minor, two pieces, one entirely new and the other virtually so, were given for the first time at these concerts. These were an early and unpublished Symphony in F minor, for stringed orchestra, and a song from the opera, "The Wedding of Camacho." The Symphony was written by Mendelssohn at the age of fourteen; and, though remarkable as the production of a boy of that age, was altogether undeserving of a hearing on its own merits. Why Mendelssohn, himself the most fastidious of self-critics, should have his early works, which he would undoubtedly and most wisely have suppressed, brought before the public, is a question easier to ask than to answer. That the public cares little about hearing them was proved by the lukewarm applause at the close of the Symphony. The second novelty referred to was not much more interesting. Though admirably sung by Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, it produced but little effect. The Concerto was played by Madame Montigny-Rémaury, a French pianist who enjoys considerable reputation in her own country, but is as yet but little known here; and who on this occasion appeared for the first time at the Crystal Palace. Madame Rémaury is an excellent and artistic rather than a very brilliant player; her rendering of the Concerto was both neat and tasteful, but wanting in power, especially in the more rapid passages. M. Candidus, a new tenor singer, was suffering too severely from hoarseness to enable us to pronounce an opinion as to his qualifications.

The first performance in England of M. Brassin's Concerto in F major was the special feature of the Concert on the 9th, the solo part being played by the composer. The work is full of melody, while the thematic treatment and the orchestration are alike admirable. There is no remarkable individuality in the ideas; the principal theme of the finale reminds us rather too strongly of Schumann's "Variations Symphoniques;" but the Concerto is nevertheless a most interesting composition. The solo part, it is almost superfluous to say, was played to perfection by the great pianist, who has rapidly and legitimately taken rank here as a favourite of the first class with our musical public. The orchestral pieces at this concert, all of which were admirably given, were the "Jupiter" Symphony, the overture to "Elise" (Cherubini), and that to "The Masque of Pandora," by Alice Mary Smith (Mrs. Meadows-White). The last-named clever composition was put, in accordance with a custom that too frequently prevails with respect to novelties at these concerts, at the end of the programme. Mrs. Osgood sang on this afternoon for the first time since her return from America. The change of air would seem to have benefited her; for she sang (if possible) more charmingly than ever. Mdlle. Fides Keller, the other vocalist at this concert, was (like M. Candidus the week before) entirely incapacitated by a cold from doing herself justice.

The Concert on the 16th ult. requires but little notice. An exceptionally fine performance of Beethoven's C minor symphony was given, while Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" was no less well played. Mr. George Magrath, a pianist from New York, made his first appearance at the Crystal Palace with Rubinstein's Concerto in D minor (No. 4). The choice was hardly a happy one; and Mr. Magrath, though evidently an excellent player, had only qualified success. We shall wait to hear him again before pronouncing a final opinion upon him. The vocalists were Madame Pappenheim and Mr. Barton McGuckin, both of whom sang admirably; and the concert concluded with two clever, if somewhat eccentric, ballet-airs from Saint-Saëns's Biblical Opera, "Samson and Dalila."

A very charming Symphony by Haydn, which had not before been played in England, opened the Concert on the 23rd. This symphony, which is in C minor and scored for only a small orchestra, has been recently published by Rieter-Biedermann, of Leipzig. The first movement is remarkable for its fine and flowing counterpoint; the Adagio is one of those examples of "linked sweetness long drawn out," of which so many specimens may be found in the old master's quartetts; while the Minuet and the final Presto are overflowing with that quaint humour which is one of Haydn's special characteristics. Rheinberger's new Pianoforte Concerto in A flat was brought forward at this concert by Mr. Charles Hallé. The composer's works are, with the exception of a very interesting pianoforte quartett which has been more than once heard at the Monday Popular Concerts, almost unknown in this country. We do not think that the Concerto produced on Saturday will increase Herr Rheinberger's reputation. The work is unmistakably clever, the solo part very brilliant, though in the style of Hummel rather than in that of the more modern school, while the instrumentation shows not only an intimate knowledge of the resources of the orchestra, but much tact in combining it with the piano. But the ideas are for the most part wanting alike in individuality and in charm; and the general effect produced was rather one of weariness. Of the three movements the Finale is undoubtedly the most interesting. The solo part, which is at times very difficult, was admirably played by Mr. Hallé, who seems equally at home in all schools; but we think that the recall which he deservedly received at the close of his performance was a tribute of applause to the artist rather than to the music. The remaining orchestral numbers at this concert were two characteristic movements from the divertissement in M. Massenet's "Les Erinnyes" and the overture to "La Gazza Ladra." The vocalists were Mdlle. Fides Keller and Mr. Edward Lloyd.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

The twenty-first season of the performances of this excellent institution has opened in a most promising manner, both as regards the musical interest attaching to the respective programmes and the numerous audience which "assisted" on each occasion. During the four Concerts which have so far taken place the newly decorated St. James's Hall presented a crowded appearance, such as the experience of former years has taught us to look for, more especially towards the close of the season, when the attractions usually multiply. It would thus seem that the popularity of these performances, devoted as they have been from the first to the cultivation of absolute music of the highest type, is still on the increase; and while complaints have been made in some quarters that the works of English composers meet with but scanty encouragement here, we can scarcely blame the directors for adhering to their original plan (to which, indeed, these Concerts owe their success), viz., to establish a home for the regular performance of classical chamber music. Such being their aim, it followed as a matter of course that works of German classical masters, and of the more modern schools they have produced, should to some extent have monopolised the répertoire of the "Popular Concerts." Nor should the fact be entirely ignored that, whilst the taste for the class of music as here represented is rapidly growing in this country, a foreign and specifically German element still predominates among the public which frequents these Concerts. Much as we should wish therefore to see the productions of native artists take their place by the side of their foreign brethren in art, such a desired consummation of the cosmopolitan character of the institution in question may, we venture to think, safely be intrusted to the presumably growing demand on the part of the audience, rather than to the initiative of the directors.

The programme of the opening concert of the twenty-first season (on the 4th ult.) presented no novelty as regards the works produced, but it introduced M. Louis Brassin, of the Brussels Conservatoire, as solo pianist for the first time to this audience, he having previously made his début in the same capacity at one of the Crystal Palace concerts. M. Brassin had selected Beethoven's Sonata, Op. 53 (dedicated to Count Waldstein) for his solo performance, a work than which none more appropriate could have been chosen to test the abilities, technical, intellectual, and poetical, of the performer. If, therefore, we say that he proved himself fully equal to his task we have already bestowed the highest praise, and indeed M. Brassin's interpretation of the Sonata in question was such as will have impressed itself upon the memory of most of his listeners. His executive skill is of a degree which must satisfy the most exacting technique-worshipper of the day, while his reading generally gave abundant evidence of independent thought and poetic feeling. If M. Brassin accelerated somewhat unduly the tempi of both the Allegro and the concluding portion of the final movement, it cannot, at any rate, be said that he lost for a moment that absolute clearness of phrasing which is another characteristic of this gentleman's playing. The Concert opened with a capital performance of Mendelssohn's Quartett in E minor (Madame Norman-Néruda, MM. L. Ries, Zerbini, and Piatti), and concluded with Schubert's Trio in B flat (Op. 99), played con amore by M. Brassin, Madame Norman-Néruda, and Signor Piatti. Mr. Santley (whom we have never heard in better voice) sang with much effect Signor Piatti's setting of the poet-laureate's "O swallow," and (not for the first time at these concerts) Handel's air, "Nasce al bosco." Being, as a matter of course, encored in the latter, the favourite baritone created additional enthusiasm by an excellent rendering of Gounod's "Maid of Athens."

On the succeeding Monday (the 11th ult.) the Concert opened with Haydn's Quartett in E flat (Op. 71), played in a manner worthy of its author by the quartett-party referred to above, and of whom Madame Norman-Néruda and Signor Piatti were afterwards associated with M. Louis Brassin (who was again the pianist) in a splendid rendering of Beethoven's Trio in B flat. The latter work, one of the most beautiful of its kind with which the composer has enriched the world of tone, was on this occasion performed for the twenty-fifth time at these concerts, a sufficient proof of its popularity, if indeed such proof were needed. Signor Piatti's exquisitely pure and sympathetic quality of tone was displayed to the best advantage in two compositions of his own, entitled respectively "Elegia" and "Siciliana;" and it need hardly be added that the performance of this favourite artist was most warmly applauded, and the last piece redemanded. In his rendering of Sebastian Bach's so-called "Italian Concerto," M. Brassin again proved himself fully equal to all technical exigencies, while his interpretation generally furnished conclusive evidence of the faithful and comprehensive study of an earnest artist. The Concerto has been rescued from oblivion by the great name it bears, but the interest attaching to it is chiefly historical, as showing that the master could successfully assume various styles for the purpose of perfecting that which is essentially his own. M. Brassin's performance was rewarded by enthusiastic plaudits, the audience insisting (somewhat tyrannically, we thought) upon an "encore," to which the eminent pianist responded by giving Schubert's vivacious "Impromptu" (No. 2 in Op. 90). Miss Emma Thursby, who contributed two vocal soli, "Si t' amo" (Handel), and "The Violet" (Mozart), considerably marred whatever legitimate effect belonged to her rendering by adding a high note of her own at the conclusion of each of these songs; an offence against good taste which, especially if introduced into the exquisite simplicity of Mozart's Lied, is absolutely unpardonable. The lady was accompanied on the pianoforte by Sir Julius Benedict, who acted as Conductor.

The third Concert of the past month (on the 18th ult.) was rendered specially attractive by the appearance of Dr. Hans von Bülow, the eminent and, in many respects, unrivalled German pianist, who played Schumann's elaborate and profoundly poetic Fantasia in C major in a manner worthy of his great reputation. Speaking of Dr. von Bülow's style of playing generally, it would, we know, be heresy in the eyes of most amateurs to bestow anything short of unqualified praise. His technique is marvellous, his retentive powers fairly amazing, his exposition always lucid, his interpretation invariably highly intellectual: it may be owing, then, to a defect in our own powers of perception if in all this we miss a certain artistic warmth which would permit our heart to have some share in the performance, amidst the feelings of wonder and admiration which the display of qualities so exceptional never fails to excite. Dr. von Bülow, on the occasion in question, introduced an interesting novelty from the pen of his friend Herr von Bronsart, a staunch disciple of the Lisztian school, some of whose compositions have already obtained a hearing in this country. The work referred to is a Trio for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, which, in its general construction, presents little of the revolutionary element to be looked for in a composer of such advanced tendencies. This element is to be traced rather in the rhapsodical treatment of its themes, in the attempt to establish a somewhat superficial connection between the different movements by the recurrence of certain melodic fragments, and in the fact that the Trio suggests throughout the stage rather than the "chamber," demanding, at all events, the aid of a tolerably explicit "programme" for the due appreciation of the author's meaning. In the absence of such a guide, we can only say that in the first movement (Allegro Maestoso) a certain weird and mysterious character is well maintained; and that of the remaining portions of the work the Vivace is by far the most interesting, being throughout animated and graceful, and well deserving of the applause which greeted its performance. The new Trio, though the work of talent, will, we suspect, scarcely prove a very important addition to the art-form to which it belongs. It was done all possible justice to by Dr. von Bülow, Madame Norman-Néruda, and Signor Piatti. The lady violinist just named, in conjunction with Dr. von Bülow, also gave a spirited reading of Schubert's "Rondeau Brillant" in B minor, the quartett of the evening having been Beethoven's in D major (Op. 18), played to perfection by Madame Néruda, MM. Ries, Zerbini, and Piatti. Mrs. Davison, an American lady, was the vocalist. She possesses a powerful and sympathetic soprano, and in her delivery of songs by Sullivan and Rubinstein manifested good taste and artistic feeling. Perhaps we may venture to remind the lady that one of the tests of a thorough-schooled vocalist is the possession of a perfect shake, and a singer whose deficiency lies in that direction would act discreetly in dispensing with this embellishment.

At the fourth and final Concert of last month (the 25th ult.) the performance commenced with Schubert's Quintett in C major, in which Madame Norman-Néruda occupied her accustomed position as leading violinist, the other executants being MM. Ries, Zerbini, Pezze, and Piatti. The work which, like most others of the same composer, reflects most faithfully his strongly marked individuality, received, as need hardly be added, a worthy interpretation. The only instrumental solo was contributed by Madame Montigny-Rémaury, a French pianist, who had already made her début at the preceding Saturday afternoon Concert, and who on this occasion played with much refinement Beethoven's Sonata, Op. 27, No. 1, popularly known as the "Moonlight Sonata." Madame Rémaury, it must however be admitted, was placed under a disadvantage, her appearance following so closely upon that of two artists of such exceptional attainments as M. Brassin and Dr. von Bülow; but the Sonata in question is so much of a favourite with amateurs that its performance at any time is almost sure to command a favourable reception. The lady pianist, who was much applauded, was afterwards associated with Madame Néruda and Signor Piatti in the execution (for the second time at these Concerts) of M. Camille Saint-Saëns's clever and interesting Trio in F major. Mdlle. Redeker, the gifted and sympathetic German alto, who was a great favourite at these Concerts during last season, again made her appearance on this occasion, and, as before, selected one of those seldom-heard songs of philosophical import, written by Schubert to words by Goethe and Schiller, and which on that account are none the less acceptable. Besides the song referred to ("Grenzen der Menschheit"), Mdlle. Redeker contributed three Lieder by Robert Franz. Sir Julius Benedict officiated as Conductor.

We intend in future to include under the above heading notices of events of special interest taking place during the series of Saturday afternoon performances held in connection with this institution.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

The forty-seventh season of this Society was inaugurated at Exeter Hall on the 22nd ult. with a performance of Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang" and Rossini's "Stabat Mater." The principal vocalists in the first-named work were Miss Anna Williams, Mrs. Suter, and Mr. E. Lloyd, and in the second Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Bridson, all of whom were highly successful. Sir Michael Costa, who conducted, was warmly received on entering the orchestra. At the next concert, on the 13th inst., Rossini's "Moses in Egypt," produced with such success last season, will be repeated.

DR. VON BULOW'S RECITALS.

The distinguished German pianist, Hans von Bülow, having come once more to the country about which he is reported to have said some hard things, gave a Recital in St. James's Hall on the 20th ult.—the first of two. We suppose it is in the nature of things, and for certain it cannot be owing to the decadence of Herr von Bülow's powers, that his doings amongst us excite less attention than they did. He plays now as well as ever, and as much deserves a fuss in his honour. But it should be remembered that when Dr. von Bülow first visited us, we had not seen for years so great an exemplar of the "higher development" school. He startled the public by his great executive and intellectual powers, and made that which, for want of a better word, is called a "sensation." It is often unfortunate for an artist to be regarded as "sensational," since it is in the nature of "sensations" to quickly lose their power. The public tire of them in proportion to the eagerness with which they were welcomed. A reaction sets in, and the object of it sinks as much below the level of his deserts as he may have been exalted above it previously. Further than this, since Dr. von Bülow's first visit we have had Herr Rubinstein in this country—a greater "sensation" still. Herr Rubinstein, as a professor of "higher development," can "out-Herod Herod," and any Herod coming after him takes, naturally, a second place. But under any circumstances Dr. von Bülow may rest assured that English amateurs are glad to give him a welcome. He may have a poor opinion of our discernment, and we may see good reason to believe that he is not quite perfection; but it is possible to allow each other the right of private judgment without breaking off artistic relations profitable to both parties.

We are far from sure that Dr. von Bülow was well advised to play the last five of Beethoven's Sonatas at one sitting. It looked very much like an act of bravado, although we do not say it was anything of the kind. We do say, however, that, from an artistic point of view, the programme was a mistake. Among the thousands of amateurs in London there may be fifty who know the works in question well enough to make possible an intelligent and profitable hearing of them all at once. But Dr. von Bülow, we imagine, did not open St. James's Hall to such a numerically insignificant minority. He appealed to amateurs generally, of whom it is far from libellous to say that they could no more "inwardly digest" the last five Sonatas of Beethoven at a meal than a sucking infant could thrive on beefsteak. The average amateur is, musically speaking, but a lamb, and should have the wind tempered to him, whereas Dr. von Bülow raised a tempest which must almost have blown him out of the Hall. Had one or two sonatas been performed, relieved by lighter works adapted to give the mind an interval of repose, the educational value of the Recital would have been greater than it was. Dr. von Bülow played the whole from memory, and this in itself was a remarkable feat. Yet playing without book is scarcely to be commended per se. Performers should invariably have in their heads every note of the music, but they should at the same time always have the book before their eyes. Instance after instance has proved that no guarantee exists against a sudden "slip," and it is neither respectful to the composer nor the audience to run any risk. Let us however, in justice, say that on this occasion, at least, the excessive accuracy of the entire performance astonished every listener who had provided himself with copies of the works. We cannot follow Dr. von Bülow through his reading of the five Sonatas, since the subject, adequately discussed, would take up pages of our space. Amateurs well know that the German pianist has made these works a special study, and that with regard to them he holds independent views. Wherefore, as an exposition of "Bülow upon Beethoven," the Recital was distinguished by great interest. We may have our own opinion as regards Dr. von Bülow's ability to express all the poetry of the master, but no question exists as to his knowledge of the text. There, perhaps, hardly any artist can approach him; and his reading on this occasion was followed, by those most competent to judge it, with the respectful attention it deserved. The audience, as may be imagined, was not a crowded one, neither did any special demonstrations attend the proceedings, save after the Adagio of Op. 106, and at the close, when Dr. von Bülow was twice recalled.

MADAME VIARD-LOUIS' CONCERTS.

The first of the second series of Madame Viard-Louis' Concerts took place in St. James's Hall on the 26th ult., and notwithstanding wretched weather was largely attended by the élite of London amateurs. A more interesting programme could not have bid for public support, no fewer than six works being announced as given for the first time either in London or in England. Indeed the entire scheme contained but one familiar item—the overture to "Oberon." All the rest had more or less of the charm of freshness, by way of a condiment to substantial merit. Weber's overture began the evening well. It was splendidly played, and put audience and orchestra on the best possible terms. After this came the exquisite "Danse des sylphes" from Berlioz's "Damnation de Faust," which served to show once more how Mr. Weist Hill can make English instrumentalists play with a delicacy and softness not, as a rule, characteristic of their efforts. The pretty music, given with infinite tact and taste, was encored amid loud applause. A MS. Capriccio or Study for pianoforte alone, the work of Cherubini, followed the Dance. Found among the master's papers after his death, and presented to Madame Viard-Louis by his son, the work had previously only been heard in France. It came to us therefore as an absolute novelty, the more remarkable because Cherubini wrote so little for the instrument. The Capriccio is made up of a number of movements, some brief, others well developed, and all, if not of equal merit, worthy of note. Their variety is as great as the composer's fancy could compass; a few suggesting Handel, while here and there the freedom of the modern Fantasia is approached. Best of all, perhaps, is an Andante which might have given to Mendelssohn the idea of his "Lieder ohne Worte." Madame Viard-Louis played the work as one thoroughly familiar with its many difficulties, and quite in sympathy with its character and pretensions. After Miss Emma Thursby had sung Mozart's aria, "Che pur aspro al cuore," Brahms's new Symphony was performed in a manner that did the utmost credit to every one engaged. After so much has been said in these columns respecting the Symphony, it need not be discussed now. Enough that it received ample justice and met with sympathetic hearing, every movement being loudly applauded, while the third (Scherzo) was encored. Henry Leslie's romance, "In my pleasant land of France," followed, and after it attention was called to Hummel's Pianoforte Concerto in F (No. 1 of his posthumous works), played by Madame Viard-Louis with great spirit and command of enormous difficulties. The Concerto, but especially the last movement, is a good specimen of Hummel's workmanship, though from the character of the pianoforte part, which demands the highest executive powers, it cannot be often heard. Madame Viard-Louis deserves much praise for giving the public an opportunity of acquaintance with so distinctive an example of a once very popular composer. She was heartily recalled at the close of the performance. A pretty Gavotte by Bourgault-Ducoudray having been charmingly played and encored, the Concert ended with Gevaert's Fantasia for orchestra on Spanish themes—an interesting effort to deal with national melodies in a grandiose style. Mr. Weist Hill conducted admirably throughout, and may well be proud of the success achieved.

BOROUGH OF HACKNEY CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

The first Concert of this flourishing Society for the present season was given at the Town Hall, Shoreditch, on the 18th ult., before a large and thoroughly appreciative audience. Schumann's music to Goethe's "Faust" (Third Part) presents such enormous difficulties to the most experienced singers, that the Conductor, Mr. Ebenezer Prout, earnest and indefatigable as he is known to be, would scarcely have ventured upon selecting it as the principal piece of the evening had he not felt thorough confidence in the powers of the choir over which he presides. The result, however, fully proved that his judgment was ruled by discretion, for a more triumphant success has rarely been achieved. Not only were the broad effects of the elaborate choruses in this work vividly brought out, but the minutest details were carefully attended to, the brightness of the female voices—especially in the charming semi-choruses—being the theme of general admiration. We must particularly mention the beauty of tone and faultless intonation of the altos, and also congratulate the Conductor upon the great improvement in the tenor department, the balance being now almost as perfect as it can be made. When we allude to "Woods crown with trembling hold," "A noble ray of spirit life," and the Finale to the Part as the best executed choruses in the work, it is merely because they struck us as being exceptionally good, and not with any view of disparaging the general excellence of the rendering of all the choral pieces. The solo vocalists, Miss Amy Aylward, Miss Saidie Singleton, Mrs. Irene Ware, Miss Reimar, Miss Kate Steel, Miss Clara Samuell, Madame Bolingbroke. Messrs. Sidney Tower, Theiler, and W. H. Beckett (all, with the exception of Mr. Beckett, from the Royal Academy of Music), showed unmistakable signs of the careful training they had received from their master, Signor Randegger, the whole of their exacting music being given with much care and intelligence. As so few persons can fully comprehend the subtle meaning of Goethe's poem, it can scarcely be supposed that many of the hearers at this concert thoroughly mastered the intricacies of Schumann's music—for never perhaps did two artists work together with a more kindred spirit—but the entire audience listened with reverence, and fully proved by the warmth of their applause how heartily they thanked the Conductor and his heroic little artistic army for providing them with so truly intellectual a feast. In the second part a selection from Mendelssohn's music to the "Midsummer's Night's Dream" again successfully tested the capabilities of the female voices of the choir, the solo parts being delicately sung by Mrs. Irene Ware and Miss Clara Samuell, and the remainder of the programme consisted of the quartett and chorus, "Wreath into garlands the gold of the harvest," from Weber's "Jubilee Cantata" (solos by Miss Aylward, Madame Bolingbroke, Messrs. Tower and Theiler), R. J. S. Stevens's part-song "The cloud-capt towers," and Auber's overture to "Le Domino Noir," the efficiency of the orchestra being amply proved not only by the rendering of the last-named piece, but by the execution of the instrumental portion of Mendelssohn's music, which included the Overture, Intermezzo, Notturno, Wedding March, and Funeral March. The concert was ably conducted by Mr. Prout, who received a well-earned ovation from both the audience and artists on entering the orchestra.

SION COLLEGE CHORAL UNION FESTIVAL.

The Annual Festival of the above Association took place in St. Paul's Cathedral on Tuesday, the 5th ult. We notice with pleasure the growing popularity of this service, which, though unassisted by orchestral instruments, must be pronounced to be highly interesting and satisfactory. The prayers were said by the President of the College, Rev. Dr. Simpson, Minor Canon of St. Paul's, and the lessons were read by the Rev. W. H. Milman, also Minor Canon of St. Paul's. The Union, we believe, is composed entirely of City choirs, and numbers about 500 voices. Two psalms were sung to Anglican chants, and the third was set to a Gregorian melody. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were sung to a service by Mr. E. H. Thorne, and the Anthem "O clap your hands," was by Dr. Stainer, who presided at the organ throughout the service. The singing of the Anthem must especially be commended; and Mr. Martin, who was the Conductor, must have given considerable pains and thought to his work, to have insured such precision and power from voices unaccustomed to sing together, and placed in not the most advantageous position in the Cathedral. During the offertory, Handel's "Hallelujah Chorus" and several hymns were sung, after which this interesting service was brought to a conclusion (there being no sermon) by the Dean, who pronounced the blessing.

THE BELLS OF ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL.

Dedication Service.

On the 1st ult. (All Saints' Day) the costly peal of bells lately presented by the City Companies, Lady Burdett-Coutts, and others to our National Cathedral were formally inaugurated by a short service of dedication. It is rarely one sees such an enormous crowd in and around St. Paul's as was present on this occasion. The Cathedral was filled to the western doors, while thousands congregated in the churchyard. The bells are twelve in number, and are placed in the north tower at a height of about 180 feet from the ground. The largest bell, No. 12, which sounds B flat and weighs 63 cwt., is given by the Corporation of the City of London; the next largest, No. 11, whose weight is 45 cwt., is presented by the Grocers' Company; No. 10, 33 cwt., by the Clothworkers; No. 9, by the Fishmongers; No. 8, by the Merchant Taylors; No. 7, by the Salters; Nos. 6, 5, 4, 3, by the Turners' Company and Lady Burdett-Coutts; and Nos. 2 and 1, by the Drapers' Company. The whole peal weighs about thirteen tons, and has cost £2,500, besides which the Chapter of St. Paul's have expended about £1,000 in fittings, hoistings, &c. Notwithstanding what has been said by a high authority respecting the quality and tone of the bells, most musicians agree in pronouncing them entirely satisfactory, excepting that perhaps a slightly heavier clapper might with advantage be added to the No. 11 and No. 12 bells, in order to strengthen their tone. Certain it is that the manner in which they are arranged and hung does very great credit to the founders, Messrs. Taylor and Sons, of Loughborough. After the ordinary evening service on All Saints' Day, the choir, followed by the Bishop of London, the Dean, Bishop Claughton, and the Rev. Minor Canons Povah, Webber, Coward, Simpson, Milman, and Russell, proceeded to what is called the geometrical staircase, situated in the south-west corner of the Cathedral, and, after crossing its western gallery, passed on to the singing chamber, where the dedication took place. The choir having sung psalms "De profundis," "Deus misereatur," "Afferte Domino," and "Laudate Dominum," several special prayers were offered by the Bishop and Dean. The hymn "When morning gilds the skies" having been sung, and the collect for St. Paul's Day said, this very impressive service was brought to a conclusion by the bestowal of the blessing by the Bishop of London; immediately after which the bells struck up a merry peal, and judging from the delight which greeted the first round, must have given great satisfaction to the gigantic assemblage. The Ancient College Gentle Bellringers then rang about a thousand changes in a style which, considering that the bells were comparatively strange to them, did credit to their ancient and highly efficient Society.

At the Royal Albert Hall, on Monday evening, the 18th ult., the members of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society presented their Conductor, Mr. Barnby, with a handsome service of silver plate of the value of £200, consisting of a candelabra and epergne in silver gilt, a dessert service of eleven pieces, also in silver gilt, four silver candlesticks, and a silver tea and coffee service. The choir and the visitors present on the occasion must have numbered nearly 2000 persons.

The Rev. H. W. Tucker, speaking for the committee, said advantage had been taken of an auspicious event in the life of their Conductor to present him with a testimonial which embodied in a tangible shape their appreciation not only of his professional talent, but of his great courtesy towards the members of the Society. The value of the offering would be enhanced by the fact that it was the result of the spontaneous suggestion of a large number of persons who had no opportunity of conferring with each other in respect to it. On the appointment of Mr. Barnby difficulties had to be surmounted in the amalgamation of his choir with their own, but he need only point to the present assembly to show what a triumph had been achieved. Both choirs were now proud to be called the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society, and if ever any change of name were again proposed, he imagined they would be equally as proud to be called Mr. Barnby's choir. (Cheers.) In conclusion, the reverend gentleman, addressing Mr. Barnby, said he had much pleasure in begging him to accept the accompanying service, the gift of the members of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society. (Cheers.)

Mr. Hedley (Secretary) then read the following address from an illuminated parchment, which he subsequently handed to Mr. Barnby:—

To Joseph Barnby, Esq.—The Royal Albert Hall Choral Society finds in your recent marriage the occasion, which many of its members have long desired, of showing in an enduring form their high appreciation as well of your professional talents, as of the courtesy and patience with which those talents have been exercised for their instruction and recreation. In asking your acceptance of the accompanying service of silver plate, the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society would express an earnest hope that you may long continue to render those services which have raised the choir to its present position, and that its reputation may still have the advantage of being linked with your own. To the gift now offered the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society desires to add congratulations on the auspicious event which has given to it the opportunity of thus addressing you, and to express its hope for Mrs. Barnby and yourself, that for many years "honour, love, obedience, troops of friends" may be to you among the elements of a happy life.

Mr. Barnby, who was loudly cheered, expressed his thanks for the handsome presentation which had just been made him. It appeared to him unnecessary to say a word on the relations existing between him and the Society. It was perfectly plain from the result before him that he had gained their esteem and regard during the nearly seven years that had elapsed since he succeeded M. Gounod as their conductor, and with respect to the relations between the choir and the musical public there was certainly nothing to complain about. It was, however, a curious anomaly that the Press, which was regarded as the organ of public opinion, was constantly urging upon them the necessity of educating the public by the production of new or little-known works; whilst the public were as unanimous in declining to be educated except in their own slow way. Practically the public said, "You do educate us; we would rather hear and know more of the 'Messiah,' the 'Creation,' 'Elijah,' and other comparatively well-known works, than trust ourselves on unknown ground." Consequently, however much he regretted it, it was an undoubted fact that no sooner was a new work performed than the public was "conspicuous by its absence." (Hear, hear.) He assured them that the present which he had received at their hands would be an object of admiration to himself and his wife as long as they lived. (Cheers.)

This terminated the proceedings, Dr. Stainer playing on the organ the "Wedding March" as the assemblage dispersed.

A Concert, with an exceptionally interesting programme, in aid of the Royal Normal College and Academy of Music for the Blind was given at St. James's Hall on the 19th ult. Gade's "Spring Fantasia," for solo voices, pianoforte, and orchestra, was well rendered, the vocalists (Misses Campbell and Reece, Mr. A. Wilmot and Mr. E. Schwier, and the pianist, Master Schwier) being all pupils of the College. Dr. Hans von Bülow's symphonic ballad, "Des Sänger's Fluch" (The Minstrel's Curse), which was performed on the occasion, is a contribution to the modern school of German writing with which we confess to have but small sympathy. That the orchestra is handled with consummate skill, we admit, and that the repulsive portion, at least, of Uhland's poem is well realised, we also grant; but the general want of plan, and incoherence of the several passages, prevent our classing the composition as a work of art; and we could not but wonder how the composer could play with such evident enjoyment of its beauties Beethoven's pianoforte Sonata in E flat (from the set of three, Op. 31) which indeed was one of the features of the concert. Another example of the so-called "Romantic" school was furnished in Liszt's "Danse Macabre," a paraphrase of "Dies Iræ," for orchestra and pianoforte, the object of which is to illustrate Holbein's well-known pictures bearing the same title. The pianoforte part was sympathetically played by Mr. Fritz Hartvigson; but the composition failed to excite any feeling save relief at its conclusion. Beethoven's Symphony in C minor was also included in the programme; and several pupils of the College—amongst whom was Prince Alexander of Hesse, who played with much effect Beethoven's Romance in F, for the violin—gave numerous pieces with decided success. The concert was conducted by Dr. von Bülow.

Seldom has the sympathy of the artistic public been more fully shown than on the occasion of the sudden death of Mr John L. Wadmore, the rising young baritone singer, who has left a widow and child unprovided for. The subscription opened immediately to relieve the necessities of those who depended upon him for support was liberally responded to in a few days by a large number who not only respected him as an artist, but, in memory of the endearing qualities of his character, deeply mourned him as a friend. A more wide appeal is however necessary; and a committee having been appointed, the "Wadmore Memorial Fund" is now with confidence submitted to the many who on all similar occasions so liberally respond to the call of charity. The honorary treasurers of the fund are Messrs. Lucas, Weber and Co., 84, New Bond Street, and Mr. John Gill, Secretary of the Royal Academy of Music, Tenterden Street, Hanover Square; and we sincerely hope that in our next number we may announce that the anxieties of those who have been thus unexpectedly left to the world's protection have been permanently relieved. The Hon. Secretary of the Rochester Choral Society, Mr. G. Watson, has suggested that if the members of the principal provincial Choral Societies, to whom Mr. Wadmore's talents were well known, would, with their honorary subscribers, unite in a general subscription, a considerable sum might be raised. Mr. Watson has put his suggestion to a practical test with his own Society, and has met with a ready response, which he believes will result in the collection of about £50.

The Public Orator, in recently presenting Dr. Garrett, Organist to the University of Cambridge, for the degree of Master of Arts propter merita, commenced by observing that the silence and decorum of the present congregation was in keeping with the good taste of an Athenian audience of the olden time as described by Plato, the master of the academic school (οὐ σύριξ ἦν οὐδὲ ἀμουσοι βοαὶ πληθους), and was particularly appropriate on the day when honour was due to an eminent composer of sacred music. The Orator next referred to the excellent manner in which Dr. Garrett discharged his duties as organist of the University Church and St. John's College Chapel. The degree was conferred on a day associated with the memory of Purcell (Orpheus ille Britannicus), and was also the eve of the day dedicated to St. Cecilia "quæ eo nomine a poetis Orpheum ipsum superasse fertur. Ille vix umbram revocavit Orco. Illa sublatas super astra mentes, miserit cælo."

On Wednesday evening, October 30, in the ward schools, Philip Lane, Addle Street, the choir of St. Mary, Aldermanbury, under the directi n of Mr. Edward Craig, gave a selection of music. Mr. Craig, during an interval in the proceedings, said that some members of the choir and of the congregation desired to give expression to their regard for their incumbent on his return from the Continent, and they had decided to present the Davenport which he would now ask the Rev. C. C. Collins to accept. The Rev. C. C. Collins, in thanking his choir and congregation for this mark of their regard, said that he had now entered on the twenty-fifth year of his incumbency, and had received during that time the respect of the parishioners generally. At the conclusion of the concert Mr. Wood moved a vote of thanks to Mr. Craig and the choir for the entertainment they had given them, which was carried with applause. Mr. J. A. Holliday was honorary secretary to the fund.

A series of three "Orchestral Festival Concerts" is announced to take place at St. James's Hall, commencing on Monday evening, May 5, 1879, the orchestra to consist of 110 "picked" instrumentalists, under the direction of Herr Hans Richter (of the Imperial Opera House, Vienna); leader, Herr Hermann Franke; and the vocalists to be selected from the chief Opera-houses in Germany. Each programme will include a Symphony by Beethoven; and modern composers will be represented, "with especial reference to the later works of Wagner." It is good that the details of this undertaking should be placed before the music-loving public as speedily as possible, since the prospectus informs us that all intending subscribers are requested to send in their names to the agents "before Monday, Dec. 2."

We regret to say that Mr. Edwin Ellis, the Conductor of the Adelphi orchestra—who died on the 20th of October, at the early age of thirty-five—has left a wife, nine young children, and two aged relatives, who were dependent upon his exertions, entirely destitute. That the effort made by his sympathising brother-artists to mitigate the effects of this unexpected calamity will be successful can scarcely be doubted, when we see the array of names on the programme of a Musical and Dramatic Entertainment to be given for the benefit of the bereaved survivors at St. James's Hall on the morning of the 4th inst., an appeal which should be materially strengthened by the earnest tribute to the memory of the deceased put forward by his friend Charles Reade.

The St. George's Glee Union gave its 118th monthly Concert at the Pimlico Rooms, on Friday, the 1st ult., the feature among the choral pieces being Mendelssohn's "Farewell to the forest." Pinsuti's "The sea hath its pearls," and Martin's "All hail! thou lovely Queen," were also especially well rendered by the choir. The solo vocalists were Miss Bessie Spear, Madame Belval, Mr. George Carter, and Mr. R. F. Roberts, all of whom were very successful. Miss Julia Augarde played a fantasia for pianoforte in an effective manner, and the Misses Louisa R. Distin and Louise Augarde were warmly applauded for a pianoforte duet. Miss Julia Augarde and Miss Carter accompanied, and Mr. T. Garside, assisted by Mr. Joseph Monday, conducted.

At the Evening Service at St. Andrew's, Tavistock Place, on the 3rd ult., Spohr's "Last Judgment" was performed. An excellent band did full justice to the overture and accompaniments, and the choir, augmented to 100 voices, gave the choruses effectively, being especially good in "Lord God of heaven and earth" and "Blest are the departed." The tenor part was artistically sung by Mr. Stedman, and the treble and bass solos were also very well rendered. On the 17th ult. Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" was given, and for the 30th ult. (St. Andrew's Day) Purcell's Te Deum in D, Attwood's "I was glad," and H. J. Stark's Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were announced for the evening service, with full band and increased chorus.

A very successful performance of Handel's "Acis and Galatea" was given on the occasion of the Grosvenor Choral Society's eighty-first monthly Concert at the Grosvenor Hall on the 15th ult. The choruses were particularly well rendered by the choir, numbering nearly one hundred voices, "Wretched lovers" being enthusiastically encored. Miss Nellie Dakin, in the music of Galatea, and Mr. Arthur Hooper, in that of Acis, were highly effective. Mr. Arthur Weston obtained a recall for Damon's song, "Would you gain the tender creature," and Mr. Henry Baker, as Polyphemus, was encored in "O ruddier than the cherry." The band, led by Mr. S. Dean Grimson, accompanied, and Mr. J. G. Callcott conducted, as usual.

The members of the North London Philharmonic Society gave their first invitation concert of this season on Tuesday the 19th ult. at the Athenæum, Camden Road, before a large audience; on which occasion Weber's "Jubilee" Cantata, and Sir W. Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen," &c., were performed with orchestral accompaniment. The vocalists, Miss Place, Miss Amy Dicksee, L.A.M., Miss F. O. Beves; and Messrs. Wright and Atherton Latta were much appreciated in their respective solos, and the choruses were in each case very firmly taken, the pageant music number in the "May Queen" being especially applauded. Mr. Arthur Truslove was leader of the orchestra, and Mr. Henry J. B. Dart conducted.

Northfield Hall, Highgate, was opened on Thursday, the 14th ult., with a concert, under the direction of Mr. Faulkner Leigh. The hall was crowded by a fashionable and enthusiastic audience. The artists engaged were Miss José Sherrington, Miss Helen D'Alton, Mr. Faulkner Leigh, and Mr. Walter Bolton, the solo pianist being Mr. Wilhelm Ganz; and Mr. Henry Parker acted as Conductor. Miss Sherrington was very successful in her rendering of "Spinning," as was also Miss D'Alton in Blumenthal's "Old, old story," Mr. Faulkner Leigh in "Let me like a soldier fall," and Mr. Bolton in Rossini's "Largo al factotum," the two last-named compositions being encored.

Mr. H. C. Cooper, gave a Violin Recital at the Langham Hall on the 18th. ult. The programme consisted of Bach's Chaconne (played without accompaniment), Beethoven's Romance in G, Mendelssohn's Concerto in E minor, and Ernst's Fantasia on "Le Prophète," in all of which Mr. Cooper showed his mastery over the instrument as a legitimate player. In responding to recalls Mr. Cooper played two pieces, written to illustrate difficulties of harmonies, and passages for left-hand pizzicato. Madame Tonnelier was the vocalist, and Miss Amy Turner-Burnett was the pianist, accompanying the entire concert, and acquitting herself with marked ability.

On the 19th ult. the Dedication Festival of St. Ethelburga's Church, Bishopsgate, was held. At Evensong the service was well rendered by a large choir, comprising detachments from St. Margaret Pattens, City; St. Bartholomew's, Moor Lane; St. Augustine's, Kentish Town, &c. The responses were Tallis's Festival, and the special Psalms set to Gregorian tones. The singing of the choir reflected great credit on the Organist and Choirmaster, Mr. Arthur Briscoe. At the conclusion of the service Mr. Briscoe played several pieces, amongst which was a March of his own, composed expressly for the occasion.

A very successful Concert was given on the 11th ult. in the Lecture Hall of the Camden Road Presbyterian Church by the Cleopatra Musical Union (under the direction of Mr. Henry Ward, jun.), in aid of the Hammond Street Mission. The programme consisted of part-songs, glees, and solos, all of which were exceedingly well rendered and enthusiastically received. The most interesting items were a new glee by Dr. Bridge, entitled "Peace," "Jack and Jill" (Caldicott), "The tickling trio" (Martini), and Haydn's humorous Serenade, "Maiden fair, O deign to tell." Mr. J. R. Griffiths presided at the pianoforte.

The Organ Recital at the Angell Town Institution, Brixton, on the 23rd ult., was given by Mr. Charles Joseph Frost, Mus. Bac., who played Prelude and Fugue in C minor (Mendelssohn), Andante in D (Silas), Sonata No. 3 (J. S. Bach), March in B flat major (C. J. Frost), Andante in B flat (Schubert), Overture Pastorale (Turpin), Hommage à Mozart (Calkin), Offertoire in E major (Batiste), and Grand March in B flat major (Hamilton Clarke). Mr. Frost, who played in his usual good style, was well received. The vocal illustrations were sung by Miss Kate Shaboe, R.A.M.

On Thursday the 21st ult. a Concert was given at St. Saviour's, Poplar, in aid of the school funds. Root's favourite Cantata the "Flower Queen" was performed, the parts being ably supported by Miss Garner, Miss Forty, Miss Denselow, Miss K. Lawrence, and Miss Shoring. The choruses and semi-choruses were well rendered by the teachers and children of the schools, and the Cantata was produced under the direction and management of Miss Coe. Several pieces were redemanded, and such was the demand for tickets that the concert was repeated on the following Thursday.

The eighth season of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society was inaugurated on the 8th ult. with a performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah," the principal parts being sustained by Messrs. Hilton (in consequence of the lamented decease of Mr. Wadmore, who was announced for the music of the Prophet), and Vernon Rigby; Mesdames Lemmens-Sherrington, and Antoinette Sterling, Misses Annie Sinclair and Dones, the assistance of Messrs. J. Thornton and Stanley Smith being given in the concerted music. Mr. Joseph Barnby, as usual, conducted.

The Saturday Evening Concerts at St. James's Hall, the first of which was given on the 16th ult., promise to be attractive to a thoroughly popular audience, but scarcely call for any notice from an artistic journal. Amongst the vocalists were Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Mrs. Osgood, Miss Annie Butterworth; Messrs. Vernon Rigby, E. Abercombie, and Maybrick, all of whom contributed well-worn songs; and Signor Tito Mattei's pianoforte pieces were warmly and enthusiastically welcomed. Messrs. Ganz and Thouless acted as Conductors.

The Quarterly Report of the Academical Board of Trinity College, London, announces that during the autumn vacation the principal class-room of the Institution has been enlarged, and the organ re-erected in an additional space gained by the incorporation of a smaller room on the same floor. Arrangements are in progress for the holding of classes in vocal music, conducted by Dr. W. J. Westbrook; and it has also been decided to institute meetings for the practice of instrumental music, under the direction of the Bursar.

Mr. William Hutchins Callcott, the highly-skilled musician and composer, so popular in his day, expired on Wednesday, the 6th ult., at his residence, Gravesend, at the age of 78. Mr. Callcott was more than half a century ago recognised as the principal violinist in the orchestra of Her Majesty's Theatre, and subsequently became musical director at the Adelphi, the Olympic, and Astley's. The deceased was the father of Mr. William Callcott and Mr. Albert Callcott, the well-known scenic artists.

Mr. J. Gordon Saunders, Mus. Bac., Oxon, organist of St. John's Parish Church, Hackney, having recently passed the examination for the degree of Doctor in Music at the University of Oxford, some of the present and past members of the choir of this church, headed by the honorary precentor, Mr. W. J. Woods, presented him with the hood appertaining to that degree, on the 14th ult., and an ivory bâton mounted with silver, as a token of high personal regard.

The Fishmongers' Company's Scholarship of £40 per annum in the National Training School for Music having recently been vacated, in consequence of ill-health, by Miss Lemmon, who was only appointed thereto in January, 1877, has been awarded by Mr. John Hullah and Mr. W. G. Cusins, after a severe and searching examination lasting two days, and out of twenty-five candidates, to Miss Marian Emily Stewart.

A handsome monument, composed of red polished granite, has recently been erected over the tomb of the late Mdlle. Titiens at Kensal Green Cemetery. At the head and feet are wreaths in white marble. The following is the inscription: "In memory of Therese Titiens, who died Oct. 3rd, 1877."

We understand that an association has been formed in Lancashire to extend the present "singing" in public schools into the teaching of "music." The first meeting was announced for the 20th ult., at Owens' College, Manchester, to be presided over by the Bishop of Manchester.

On Thursday the 14th ult. an Organ Recital was given at St. Andrew-by-the-Wardrobe by Mr. A. M. Colchester, Organist of that church, when an interesting selection of sacred music was excellently rendered, effectively displaying the good qualities of the instrument.

The Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's have arranged for the performance of the whole of Spohr's "Last Judgment" on the second Tuesday evening in Advent (the 10th inst.)

Mr. E. G. Meers, who recently passed the examination for Bachelor of Music at Oxford University, is the first candidate that has passed under the new regulations.

REVIEWS.

Le Roi de Lahore. Opéra en cinq actes, de Louis Gallet et J. Massenet. [Paris: Hartmann.]

Some time ago, before there was a thought of producing Bizet's "Carmen" in this country, we directed the attention of our readers to that remarkable work. We do not say, as regards this matter, post hoc, ergo propter hoc, but it is a fact, nevertheless, that the Opera was brought out at Her Majesty's Theatre not long after. We accept the omen for M. Massenet's "Le Roi de Lahore," and shall not be at all surprised if next season the second most successful recent production of French dramatic composers make its appearance on our stage.

It would be superfluous to inform our readers who M. Massenet is, and what claims his work presents because he has written it. We know something, at least, of his music in this country; we have had the man amongst us, and experience of both music and man has excited a desire for more intimate acquaintance. Let us then without further preface pass to the Opera which, by the way, is having an enviable career of success even upon the jealous stage of Italy.

The scene is laid in the "gorgeous East," what time some Mussulman conqueror threatens Lahore with fire and sword; and the curtain first rises upon the space before the temple of Indra, whither flock crowds of people to invoke the god's protection. These sing a charming, expressive chorus, in which no special attempt is made at "local colour," and are answered by the high priest, Timour (bass), with reassuring words. "If your king will not fight," he declares, "Indra will war upon the invaders." Thus comforted, the people enter the temple and leave Timour face to face with Scindia (baritone), the chief minister of state. Scindia has come to seek Sita (soprano), his niece, who resides in the temple, and whom he would now remove to his own house at the bidding of an unholy passion. Timour resists the demand; but when he is informed that a young man obtains secret admission to the temple and, as the lover of Sita, meets her in the very shadow of the altar, his anger is roused, and he willingly consents to an interview between the uncle and niece that the truth as to this matter may be extorted. The duet for the two men is highly dramatic and vigorous, though marked by the simplicity and naturalness of style that characterise the whole work. We now enter the temple, and hear the priestesses in melodious, unaffected strains encourage Sita to meet her exalted relative. Their little two-part chorus, with interspersed solos, is charming, and in M. Massenet's most pleasing style. Then follows a duet for the minister and his niece, wherein he pleads his love; but Sita, whose character is one of delightful naïveté, tells her uncle of the mysterious intruder who has won her heart, and to whom she must be faithful. Enraged at his disappointment, the minister sounds the sacred gong (a reminiscence of "Norma"), the priests and people rush in, and before them all Sita is denounced as faithless to her vestal vows. In this scene M. Massenet shows considerable dramatic power. His music easily adapts itself to the varying moods of the characters concerned, and the climax is led up to with much judgment. Now comes a stormy and exciting ensemble. Timour stirs up the wrath of the multitude against the young girl, and is answered with a fierce clamour for her instant death. In the midst of it Sita speaks. She is willing to die, but pleads that there may be no stain upon her good name, for she has not violated her sacred oath. As she concludes, the evening song of the priestesses rises from the depths of the temple, and Scindia bids her join in it if she be innocent, and reveal the name of her lover. This she refuses. Again the people cry for her blood, and while they do so a man, who emerges from a secret door in one of the pillars, exclaims, "No! Sita belongs to me. Let her live." It is the king! Tableau. A massive ensemble follows in which the conflicting emotions of the actors are expressed after the traditional manner and with great effect. At its close, Timour reproaches the monarch with the profanity of his love, threatens him with divine vengeance, and bids him expiate his offence by marching against the invader. This the king promises; the priest consents to bless the union of Alim and Sita, and the act ends with a fervid war-cry.

The second act takes place in the king's camp, where, during the absence of the army, which has gone out to battle, slaves dance and play. Sita, anxious for the result of the conflict, takes a superstitious interest in a game of chess between two of her guard, and has a presentiment of evil when "black" wins. She has not long to wait for its confirmation; but meanwhile, influenced by the calm beauty of the evening and her own happy love, she sings, with her maid Kaled (mezzo-soprano), in tender and charming strains of the joy which is hers. Here M. Massenet, although suggestive of Gounod, is at his best, and has produced music certain to be popular wherever heard. But now comes a dreadful awakening from a pleasant dream. The army, defeated and broken, rolls back in a tumultuous mass, throwing away its weapons, and declaring that the king is slain and all lost. Seizing the opportunity, Scindia offers to take the place of the fallen monarch, and lead the soldiers—back to Lahore. He is accepted, but at that moment Alim appears pale and wounded, reproaches his troops with their cowardice, and offers to put himself again at their head in the field. The soldiers refuse point-blank; the king may go, they will not. Observing this, Scindia informs the monarch that his reign has ended, and his own day of revenge come; for had he not loved Sita and been deprived of her? Infuriated, Alim bids one and another arrest the minister, but not a hand stirs; and the scene closes as the warriors mockingly bid their whilom leader go on fighting if he likes it. Throughout this prolonged ensemble M. Massenet rarely flags. He is at times somewhat coarse in his effects, but may plead the nature of the situation in excuse. We think, however, that the element of contrast is wanting, the want being made the more conspicuous by the fact that Sita stands doing nothing while the fate of her lover is decided. Left alone together for a time, Sita and Alim sing an impassioned duet—of comfort on the one side, shame and agony on the other. The king's distress reaches its climax when he hears the soldiers approaching with cries of "To Lahore," and he dies as the armed rabble stream across the stage. At the bidding of Scindia, Sita is carried away, and the curtain falls as the body of the monarch is left alone on the plain.

The third act takes us to the Gardens of the Blessed in the Paradise of Indra; and a celestial march and chorus of happy spirits, followed by a ballet, affords the most complete contrast to the strife and tumult that have gone before. The ballet music, let us add, is ingenious, and includes a genuine Hindoo melody, with five variations of the most characteristic description. At its close Alim is seen approaching the throne of the god. "Who are you that smile not?" demands Indra. Alim tells his story, and pleads to have his life renewed for Sita's sake. The deities think him a fool, but the request is granted nevertheless; and a solemn "incantation" recited by Indra, and responded to by the celestial choir, confers again the gift of human life. But Alim is no longer to be King. He will reenter earth as a humble man, but bound to Sita by a common fate, and doomed to die with her. Gladly the destiny is accepted, and his song of joy dominates the hymn of the spirits, with which the act closes. Here, also, M. Massenet shows his love for broad and striking effects. He is never so happy as when using all the resources of voice and orchestra, but it must be owned that, apart from the desirability of greater relief, he does this well and never fails to hit the mark.

When the curtain next rises we see Alim asleep upon the steps of his own palace, and hear in the far distance the celestial voices continuing their incantation. Presently the man restored from the dead wakes to the bliss of life, and also to a consciousness of his situation, for a group of officers discourse within earshot upon the splendour of Scindia's coronation. Then his thoughts turn to Sita; he recalls the scene in the desert, and at last rushes towards the palace frantically exclaiming: "It is I, Sita, come to reclaim thee." In this solo there are some charming passages, but, for the most part, it is a little overdone and wanting in spontaneity. But now Scindia's coronation procession appears to the strains of a pompous march, and a sonorous chorus in unison. Elated, the new king anticipates his union with Sita in really graceful as well as passionate periods, and then moves towards the palace. But as he mounts the steps, Alim stands above him, calm and threatening. Stupefied with terror he, his guards, and the people shrink back, whispering their fear to each other in a most dramatic chorus. Then the stranger speaks in the name of Alim, who will pardon the usurper and leave him in possession provided Sita be restored. "Seize him," exclaims Scindia, but the guards again recoil as the intruder haughtily declares "I am Alim, your king." The priests thereupon proclaim him a madman, and the people, taking up the words, ask that mercy might be shown. An unduly prolonged and very noisy finale ends at last by Timour declaring that the deity had spoken through the insane intruder, and that Sita must be given up. But at that moment Sita's train appears amid cries of "Behold, the queen," and a significant reference to the popular voice on the part of Scindia brings down the curtain.

Once more we are in the temple of Indra, whither Sita has fled rather than enter the nuptial chamber of her new lord, and where she intends to die rather than be unfaithful to the memory of her love. In fervid strains she calls upon the deity to receive her soul, and is about to put an end to life when the chants of the priestesses arise from the depths of the edifice. "It was at this time he used to appear," she muses, and Alim steps out of the pillar while the words are on her lips, but she sees him not. At last he calls her, is recognised, and all the bliss of the situation then finds expression in a duet of remarkable intensity and corresponding effect. This ended, the lovers are about to escape by the secret door when Scindia appears on its threshold. Now we see the heroic side of the woman's character. Imperiously she bids the usurper make way for his king, and not dare to lift his blood-stained hands against them. For answer Scindia summons his guards and then, despairing, Sita stabs herself. Folded in each other's arms, while the usurper stands by terror-stricken, the lovers renew their glad song of happiness; the temple opens, there is a sound of celestial voices, and in the distance can be seen the Gardens of the Blessed with Indra waiting to receive his children. As they die together so together do their spirits approach the throne while the curtain falls.

We need not add much to this description. The reader must see at once that "Le Roi de Lahore" has a highly dramatic and exciting story, and that its capacity for stage effect is immense. True repose and contrast are both wanted, but the interest is never likely to flag in any serious degree while the music, characterised by directness of purpose and a rare power of expression, is always in accord with the story, and often charming in its beauty. Should "Le Roi de Lahore" be produced in London, we risk little by predicting its success.

Musikalische Charakterköpfe. Ein kunstgeschichtliches. Skizzenbuch von W. H. Riehl. Vol. III.
[Stuttgart: J. G. Cotta, 1878.]

Just twenty-five years ago the world of amateurs in Germany was most agreeably surprised by the appearance of a volume bearing the somewhat awkward title of "Musikalische Charakterköpfe," and containing a series of historical and critical "sketches" of musical composers chiefly of the earlier romantic schools. Sketches they were, inasmuch as the painter frequently contented himself by giving merely the scanty outlines of individual portraits; but by a masterly arrangement of the historical background these outlines stood forth on the canvas with a boldness and distinctness which at once raised the "sketches" into the rank of pictures complete in themselves. There were few readers then who did not feel that a new and striking method of treating the subject had been inaugurated. The intercommunication and mutual influence existing between music and social and moral life was here, for the first time perhaps, historically considered—if only on a very limited scale—by the light of composers who (to use a German phrase) have helped to "make an epoch" in the history of the art. Fascinated by a vivacious yet solid discourse, the reader was enabled to follow the rise and progress of certain phases of musical thought, to observe their formation into distinct schools, whose influence upon general culture and whose connection with social and even political events were here set forth with striking force and brilliancy. It was impossible for even the most sceptical to peruse this volume without feeling that music was not merely the plaything of the idle or the isolated art of undefined emotions having no practical bearing upon the intellectual development of man. We are speaking, let it be remembered, of twenty-five years ago. If since then the practical and educational value of music has come to be more generally admitted, if even here and there efforts are being made to include the study of its history as an element of musical education, the fact is to no mean extent due to the stimulating influence of writings such as Herr Riehl's masterly essays.

The first volume of "Musikalische Charakterköpfe" being so n followed by a second, of equal merit and interest, the author has himself supplied the standard by which to measure the present third volume which forms the subject of our review. This standard, as we have seen, is a very high one; and if, therefore, our exacting demands are not fully realised when we come to apply it in the present instance, it does not by any means follow that this new series of character-studies does not form a very valuable contribution to musico-historical literature. A writer of Herr Riehl's comprehensive grasp of mind and critical taste cannot fail to set new ideas in motion or to revive old ones worthy of a resuscitation. Whatever of praise, therefore, we may have to bestow or fault to find ought to be meted out in a spirit of deference due to those who have rendered exceptional service in the particular sphere of their activity. In the first place, then, we miss in the new series of "character-portraits" almost throughout the very element which has distinguished their predecessors; they appear no longer artistically arranged pictures; they have become more true to the indication contained on the title-page, being in fact "leaves from a sketch-book." Many of these leaves, indeed, quite recall the peculiar charm possessed by the older volumes. Thus in "Zwei deutsche Capellmeister" we have two most engaging parallel portraits, drawn from life, of representative types of that interesting and meritorious, yet frequently undervalued, musical being known as the German Capellmeister. Again, in "Der Sänger des deutschen Commersbuchs" full justice is done to the genial composer of songs near akin to the Volkslied, Albert Methfessel; although in the course of his characterisation the author, to our thinking, lays too much stress upon the merits of the German Lied of some seventy years ago at the expense of its modern representative, seeing that it is owing in the first place to Franz Schubert that the German Lied has obtained the strong wings which fitted it for its subsequent international flight. The songs of Schulz and of Reichardt, for instance, are undoubtedly interesting from an antiquarian point of view, but they have served their turn otherwise, and their claims to a revival are considerably less strong than are those of the period immediately preceding that of the great lyrical singer just referred to. In the sketches entitled respectively "Viotti und das Geigenduett" and "Franz Krommer," Herr Riehl's predilections for chamber music, and his special devotedness, in an executive sense, to the violin, have led to very interesting and instructive analyses of the distinctive merits of the two composers for stringed instruments. The last mentioned, "Franz Krommer," will be introduced for the first time to the great majority of readers; yet he was the author of no less than sixty Quartetts and half as many Quintetts, most of them of considerable musical value. Two more essays remain to be enumerated, the most important of the present series as regards subjects, and the opening and concluding one respectively in the volume. The former of these, entitled "Die beiden Beethoven," is a double-faced portrait of the great giant in music as represented by the two chief opposing parties of the present day; the one revering in him the mightiest of symphonic tone-poets, the other professing to discern in the master's calling in of the human voice in the "Ninth Symphony" his deliberate abandonment of abstract instrumental music, and each claiming their portrait of Beethoven to be the only correct one. Much golden truth may be gathered from this thoughtful contribution to a controversy of which the end is as yet very far remote. It will be read with equal profit to themselves by the fanatics of both parties alike. In the concluding essay Herr Riehl deals with what he terms "Die Kriegsgeschichte der deutschen Oper," being an historical survey of the "struggle for existence" of the lyrical drama, with especial regard to its German representative. In this, by far the longest "sketch" of the series, the author traces with consummate knowledge of the historical material the origin and development of Opera to its gigantic outgrowth, the "music-drama" of these latter days, and arrives at the conclusion that the lyrical drama as an organic art-work is doomed. "The war-history of Opera," he says in conclusion, "is, in fact, identical with the war-history of musical æsthetics, and peace will only come with the day when Opera has become a prey to history." What then, it will be asked, is to take its place in the future? Herr Riehl is of opinion that secular Oratorio possesses sufficient vitality and elasticity to satisfy all the requirements for the musico-dramatic strivings of future artistic generations. The subject is too large to admit of our entering into it here more fully, and we must refer our readers to the volume itself for the due appreciation of the ingenious arguments advanced by the author in support of his, at any rate, remarkable theory.

Professor Riehl is a staunch advocate of the extensive cultivation of music in the family circle, and he consequently deplores the gradual disappearance in Germany of the old-fashioned quartett-parties of amateurs, indifferent performers, perhaps, but with hearts burning with an enthusiasm which supplied what was wanting in individual skill, and which could not fail to further, in the result, the true ends of music. We emphatically share Herr Riehl's regret in this respect, and would gladly see the stringed quartett restored to the chamber from whence it emanated, instead of its being reserved almost exclusively for the concert-room as in the present day. He is also the composer of an excellent volume of songs, specially intended for home use and entitled "Haus-Musik." Now it appears to us as if this new series of character-sketches had been conceived somewhat too exclusively at home in the study, especially when touching upon the modern development of the art. The more the latter has become removed from "the house" the more certainly its true appreciation will involve sometimes long and not infrequently tedious walks abroad on the part of the critic. We confess to some disappointment in this respect. Whereas in previous volumes the reader is permitted to obtain an insight into the various phases, and the, on the whole, gradual advance of the art of a few generations back, leaving him at least with the element of hope for possible progress in the present; he is, in the volume before us, but too often told that unless we go back to the old ways first there will be no salvation otherwise. The younger and more enthusiastic among amateur readers, especially, will not be altogether pleased with Herr Riehl's strictures in this direction. In the perusal of these sketches they will occasionally be reminded of Mozart's humorously doleful song lamenting the disappearance of the "good old time"—

Zu meiner Zeit, zu meiner Zeit
Bestand noch Recht und Biederkeit;
Da wurden auch aus Kindern Leute,
Da wurden auch aus Jungfern Bräute,
Doch—alles mit Bescheidenheit.

But Herr Riehl will tell us that it was not his object to please, but rather to give his valuable experience, his sound and tried judgment, and a good deal more besides, in these essays, which, beyond doubt, form a very valuable addition to the literature of art history.

Songs for Sailors. Written by W. C. Bennett. Set to Music by J. L. Hatton. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

It can hardly be necessary to discuss here how far Dr. W. C. Bennett is entitled to be considered, in respect of nautical lyrics, the Dibdin of our time. Dr. Bennett's "Songs for Sailors" have now been some time before the public, and the favour in which they are still held speaks decisively as to merit. They assuredly have a genuine smack of the sea about them. Dealing with a fight or a "jollification," in either of which Jack is at home, they speak out in rollicking strains; but they are as tender on occasion as sailors know how to be with a weak woman or a little child. It is one of the merits of the collection that it sounds every note in the gamut of a tar's feeling, and presents him under the most varied conditions. Many of the lyrics deal with the historic scenes in which our Navy has taken part; and Dr. Bennett tells, in proud though homely verse, how the Nile was won; how Rooke behaved at La Hogue, and Hawke in Quiberon Bay; how Duncan fought at Camperdown, and Rodney crossed swords with De Grasse. But Dr. Bennett makes us hear, also, how the fisher's wife longs for the fisher's return; how the sailor comforts his lass on going away; how joyfully he sets sail for home; how he thinks of his loved ones when the grog circulates on Saturday night; how he prizes his pipe, and how every fibre of his body vibrates to the cry, "Herrings are in the bay!" As a matter of fact, Dr. Bennett travels round the whole circle of the sea, and overlooks no phase of seafaring life. But we have here something more than propriety in choice of subject. The language and versification of these lyrics are admirably adapted to those for whom they are primarily intended. Polish and refinement in songs for sailors would be as much out of place as was the "popinjay" sent to demand Hotspur's prisoners on the field of battle. For such things nervous force, and frank hearty expression, which does not stand too much upon niceties, are essential. Upon a discernment of this matter, Dr. Bennett has acted with almost unvarying success. Reading the subjoined verse, for example, we seem to feel the glad sea-wind upon our faces:—

In many a port we've made
For our owners no end of trade.
Breeze, blow strong,
Put her along!
Our anchor for home is weighed.
We've sailed the world around,
But now that we're homeward bound,
Breeze, blow strong,
Put her along;
Let us soon feel English ground.

Such expressions as "no end of trade" and "put her along" would, under some conditions, smack of vulgarism, but here—and this is a typical case—they are exactly the words required. No other could fit so well, because no other gives such real life and verisimilitude to the strain. As an example of Dr. Bennett's tenderer mood, take the following, sung by a Devonshire fish-wife:—

O gull, gull, grey gull of the sea,
Gull swimming landwards, O tell it to me.
Tell me my Philip's brown trawler you see,
Riding safe home to her port on her lee,
Beating safe home to Clovelly and me.

But there is the true ring in nearly all these lyrics, and though a few of them do not appear to have been intended for music, hardly any resent the connection. Indeed the vigorous rhythm which is one of their chief characteristics seems to suggest music, and from the first the appearance of a composer fitted to give them their highest expression was only a question of time.

But many composers might have been tried before discovering one adapted in all respects to this particular task. The man who sets fitting music to such essentially English lyrics must be an Englishman and something more. He must not only have a perfect sympathy with the theme, but a thorough knowledge of all that is distinctive and popular in English song, and not only in English song, but English songs of the sea. Further, he must be satisfied to write simple, straightforward music which the ear can easily catch and retain. Yet, again, he must have great power of varied melodic expression, because no other form of expression is open to him. Generally speaking, the song composer can avail himself of more or less elaborate and descriptive accompaniment, but here anything of the kind would be entirely out of place. As in all true Volkslieder the melody must be able to stand alone, and tell whatever of the story it is the province of music to convey. The choice of Mr. J. L. Hatton for this task was a most happy one, since he fulfils all the required conditions. He knows what English song is, if anybody does, and, though a musician able, as has been proved time and again, to take a high flight, he is peculiarly at home when writing for the people. People's tunes flow easily from his pen, and he has the rare gift of the expressiveness which arises from the use of simple means. In Mr. Hatton, therefore, Dr. Bennett finds a worthy colleague, for between the music of the one and the verses of the other exists the close affinity essential to perfect union.

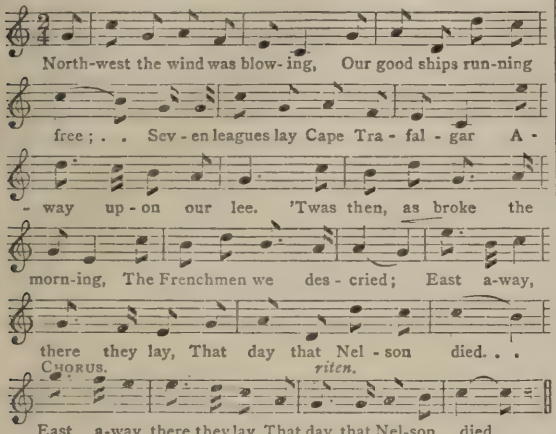
In noticing the music of these songs we have no words for art-connoisseurs as such. There is nothing here to excite the theorist, or satisfy the curious after novelty. Such persons must look elsewhere, and make room for plain men who, loving a good plain ditty, would like to be directed where to find it. To these we can only say, "Open the book at random and there you have it." We do so ourselves at this moment, and find a ballad about Nelson and Trafalgar, to which Mr. Hatton has set a diatonic melody redolent of the fok'sle. Here is the first verse:—



North-west the wind was blow-ing, Our good ships run-ning free; . . Sev-en leagues lay Cape Tra-fal-gar A-way up-on our lee. 'Twas then, as broke the morn-ing, The Frenchmen we des-cried; East a-way, there they lay, That day that Nel-son died. . .
Chorus.
riten.
East a-way, there they lay, That day that Nel-son died.

Opening the volume at random a second time, we find that Jack has come home from sea and is as "merry as a grig." Thus he sings—and thus he would sing in real life if he knew the words and music:—

Our port we make; I jump a-shore, For weeks to walk a watch no more, And home I push, and at the door, I catch and buss my Nan-cy; A jif-fy— I am snug at tea, With Jack and Nan up-
-on my knee; And am I real-ly home from sea? Yes, there sits my own Nan-cy.

These are fair samples, though chance has presented them to us, of Mr. Hatton's happy art. In nearly every other case, words and music go together as if together they had sprung from the same brain. We may predict for the collection a wide popularity. Do not Englishmen love the sea and sailors with a constancy that proves how far they have kept in their veins a dash of the old Vikings' blood? Why, even the man who cannot go down the Thames without a qualm of sickness will read the naval part of our "rough island story," and almost persuade himself that nature intended him to "lay out" on a yard in a squall. Such a book as the one before us, therefore, is sure of a sympathetic public, precisely as the amateur who, being asked to "oblige," and sings one of its ditties, will be sure of a sympathetic audience.

Essays on Ear and Throat Diseases. By Llewelyn Thomas, M.D. [J. and A. Churchill.]

Dr. Llewelyn Thomas's name is so well known in connection with the subjects upon which he treats in the work before us that we are certain his remarks will be widely read and pondered by those who suffer from any disease of the ear or throat, especially as the tone of the book is so hopeful that the patients will be rather cheered than depressed by its perusal. To the students of the Royal Academy of Music the author has lectured upon the anatomy of the vocal organs; and many young singers from that institution owe a deep debt of gratitude for valuable advice and skilful treatment they have from time to time received from him. Although the articles here collected are, as Dr. Thomas says, "essentially clinical notes," and consequently more suited for review in a medical than a musical journal, so many—more especially those upon diseases of the tonsils and uvula—are of the utmost importance to singers, that we shall be glad if we can aid in drawing attention to a book obviously the result of earnest study and long experience. "Any diseased condition of the tonsils or uvula," says our author, "has a direct tendency to affect, as a rule, both the speaking and the singing voice, either temporarily or permanently;" and it is important therefore that vocal students in the slightest degree suffering from either of these affections should at once have a medical opinion upon their case. Mr. Lennox Browne in his "Medical Hints on the Singing Voice," says: "For the consolation of those who suffer from enlarged tonsils and are deterred from having them removed by fear of the voice being injured, it may be mentioned that many of our greatest singers, from Madame Patti downwards, have undergone the operation with the greatest comfort to themselves, and with the result of increasing rather than diminishing the range of the voice;" and Dr. Thomas tells us that a young vocalist, much depressed in spirits, recently consulted him, "as she was unable to sing without daily increasing fatigue, and was constantly becoming hoarse; her tonsils were greatly enlarged, but she refused to allow any operation, as several friends assured her that she would, if operated on, lose her voice." After some time she returned and expressed her readiness to submit to an operation, although she felt convinced that she must abandon her profession. "She was, however," says Dr. Thomas, "able to accept and fulfil a public engagement within twelve days of the operation, and has subsequently and with great success carried out many most arduous London and provincial engagements." As we are told in this work that "the exciting causes of enlargement are climate, especially the English climate with its constant variations of temperature," it is important that singers in England should protect themselves as much as possible from these "variations;" and we should not wonder therefore that vocalists who have to sit for hours in an orchestra should often muffle up their throats until they rise to sing, a habit which, however, we have often heard much deprecated by those around us in a concert-room. We are glad to find that Dr. Thomas fully acknowledges the assistance he has received from his fellow-members of the medical profession, and especially from his colleague Mr. Lennox Browne.

Sonata in G minor, for the Pianoforte.

March (Bridal). Arranged for four hands for the Pianoforte.

Introduction and Polonaise, for the Pianoforte.

Composed by St. Vincent Jervis.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

That the composer of these three pieces has very decided talent there can be no doubt; but he must remember that in criticising so important a work as a Sonata no conscientious musician can feel justified in dismissing it with a few words of praise or censure; for, however well it may be written throughout as abstract music, unless the design and execution of the several movements evidence that constructive power demanded for a composition of this class, the ambition of the author must act detrimentally when his work is submitted for dispassionate judgment. The first movement opens well, a boldly marked subject announcing something which raises expectation; but the plan was evidently not in the composer's mind before he seized upon the music-paper, and the consequence is that we are lost in passages before the listener has been awakened to interest. We are bound to say that these passages are fluently written and lie well under the hand, yet that one does not grow out of the other, and that the whole does not spring from a root, a careful analysis will undoubtedly prove. In the "Allegretto" the same fault is observable, the demisemiquavers frittering away the effect of the theme before the hearers have had time to understand it; but the "Minuetto e Trio" are excellent movements, the skip of the ninth in the "Minuetto," with the creeping upward bass to the subject, and the melodious theme of the "Trio" in the tonic major, being points deserving warm praise. The dashing last movement, in 12-8 rhythm, contains the best writing in the Sonata, and also appears the most spontaneous. There is a little patchiness in portions of this "Finale," but on the whole it is fresh and vigorous; and we cannot but think that were the composer to think more of a definite plan and continuity of design than of passage-writing he would be infinitely more successful. The "Bridal March" is a comparative trifle, but it is clearly written, and makes a most effective duet, not the least of its merits being that it in no respect resembles Mendelssohn's "Wedding March." The third piece on our list has an attractive theme; but, as in the Sonata, we fail to see that many of the brilliant passages are in character with the piece. In similar showy compositions of the standard writers it is instructive to see how rarely phrases are introduced which do not seem to fit in with the general design. As we have said, Mr. Jervis evinces a power of writing good pianoforte-music, and has mastered the grammar of his art; but he has something more to do, and what that something is we have endeavoured, in a kindly spirit, to indicate.

Supplementary Book of Exercises for the use of those learning to sing at sight. Compiled and arranged by Henry Gadsby. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

As this work is dedicated to Dr. Hullah, it may be imagined that it enters not into the vexed question of the stationary or movable Do: indeed the author not only accepts the syllables so long used for the fixed sounds in Hullah's classes, but also those inflected ones expressive of the sharpened or flattened intervals, which he acknowledges to have found a valuable assistance to students. One innovation however we are extremely glad to see, and that is the discarding of the old-world plan of coupling the minor scale with that of the relative major; Mr. Gadsby decides this point by saying that "the practice of minor scales and exercises should be preceded by singing the scale of the corresponding major key; thus C minor should be preceded by singing the scale of C major, not that of E♭ major." The author tells us that the exercises are "written upon the theory that every interval beyond a second is derived from and forms part of a chord." There is much truth in this, and we have great faith in the value of the method of practising here given, for the ear becomes accustomed to the sound of intervals forming the important harmonies of the key. The difficulties of course increase when the pupil finds that the Do, Re, Mi, &c., only represent 1, 2, 3 in one major key; but this is not Mr. Gadsby's fault; he has written a very clever book, and if he have a firm belief that the fixed Do is the truth, we applaud him for so manfully upholding his theory, and warmly commend his work to those who teach on this system.

The Anglican Psalter and Canticles. The Psalms and Canticles newly adapted to Anglican Chants of ecclesiastical character. By Arthur Henry Brown.
[London: Thomas Bosworth.]

THIS is a carefully compiled Psalter, and the explanatory notes at the commencement will be found exceedingly useful to those who have the management of the musical parts of the service. The pointing is to a certain extent founded on the Gregorian or monosyllabic system, and the marks for showing the division of the chant are novel. Instead of bars the circumflex and accent are used; but, notwithstanding Mr. Brown's objection to the accepted bar system of pointing, we consider that a plan has yet to be invented which will be found to possess advantages above those of the old system. There are no less than four different sets of chants annexed to each psalm, two of which are selected with especial reference to the true spirit of the psalm, while the other two sets are adapted for festal or penitential seasons. In churches where both Gregorian and Anglican chants are used, we think this will be found to be the most suitable Psalter yet published. The price too will probably assist in making this work acceptable.

O Praise the Lord with one consent. Sixth Chandos Anthem. Composed by G. F. Handel. The pianoforte arrangement from the score with additional accompaniments by E. Silas. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

VICTOR SCHŒLCHER in his "Life of Handel" says, speaking of the Chandos Anthems, "Unhappily these great works are now neglected, and of all the musical Societies not one performs them. Even the promoters of the festivals which are held in the cathedrals seem to be unaware of their existence." There can be little doubt, however, that the day is fast approaching when, by the aid of popular editions, such as the one now before us, the people will become intimately acquainted with the hitherto neglected compositions of the great masters; and then will the concert-givers—rather as followers than as leaders of public taste—consent to unlock the many treasures which have been from time to time bequeathed to us. There is no need here to enlarge upon the manifold beauties of the Sixth Chandos Anthem. Suffice it to say that it is now accessible to all Handel-lovers in the well-known "Octavo Edition," that the music has been most carefully supervised, and that a pianoforte arrangement from the score by Mr. E. Silas is deserving of the warmest praise.

My Maggie. Song. Words by Eliza F. Morris. Music by Charles Henry Shepherd, Associate of the Royal Academy of Music. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

IT is quite a relief amongst the trite vocal compositions of the day to find one so fresh and spontaneous as Mr. Shepherd has given us. We do not say that there is anything in it to startle by its excellence; but what is attempted is accomplished, and moreover it is the work of a carefully trained musician. The theme is extremely melodious and well adapted to the words, the semiquaver accompaniment being broken just in the right place. We especially like the change from F major to B flat minor; and another good effect is where the dominant seventh takes an interrupted resolution when the melody closes on B flat. We recommend vocalists who attempt this song to sing the high A, if possible; but the composer has foreseen the difficulty by suggesting a lower note.

Evening by the Sea. Reverie for the Pianoforte. Composed by Stephen S. Stratton.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

A GRACEFUL and melodious theme in F major—12-8 rhythm—appropriately expresses the feeling intended by the composer of this piece. With the exception of the passage in G minor, however, we have but little contrast throughout; yet as it has been truly said that the sea, although one of the most beautiful, is one of the most monotonous objects in creation, Mr. Stratton may have thought that variety was not necessary. As an unpretentious sketch for amateur performance, "By the Sea" will, we think, prove acceptable; for, notwithstanding its being somewhat conventional in treatment, the workmanship is thoroughly artistic. We see, by the way, that the sign for the "tie" introduced many years ago by Sir Sterndale Bennett is used in this piece, an indication, let us hope, that its value is beginning to be appreciated.

Hymns and Litanies. By Rev. W. J. Dolan, Rev. Æ. Kirner, D.D., Rev. F. Stanfield, Florian Pascal, J. B. Waldeck, and George Child. [Joseph Williams.]

WE are unable to say that these compositions are successful from any point of view. If they are intended for congregational use the compass and general outline will frequently be found both too high and complicated, while, from a musician's point of view, many of the tunes must be pronounced unsatisfactory on account of faulty harmonies and, in many cases, excessively eccentric accent.

La Petite Espiègle (Kleiner Schalk), pour Piano, par Immanuel Liebich. [Wood and Co.]

THERE is nothing novel in this little sketch, but the theme is so attractive and its treatment so excessively graceful that we cordially recommend it to the notice of amateurs. The second subject, in the subdominant, is appropriately simple, and contrasts well with the opening melody. Apart from the intrinsic merit of this composition, it is deserving of the attention of teachers as a good exercise for the cultivation of touch, a matter always more cheerfully attended to by young players in a pleasing "piece" than in a dry "exercise;" indeed, this is undoubtedly the reason why some of Stephen Heller's "Studies" are published separately, and with titles which certainly would somewhat astonish the composer.

FOREIGN NOTES.

It is not without some feelings of envy that we refer periodically to the répertoires of the leading continental operatic establishments and notice the number and variety of works, of more or less acknowledged excellence, which they have to offer. The few instances we occasionally cite in these columns might be multiplied—if we take into consideration the numerous lyric stages of minor courts and towns—to an extent which would amaze the average frequenter of our own similiar institutions. It may be urged perhaps that the artistic value of the performances presented by these so-called second and third-rate opera-houses is generally on a par with the rank thus assigned to them; but they supply at least one essential element of the raison d'être of art-institutions, inasmuch as they afford an opportunity for the study of a fairly representative number of masterpieces of the art under conditions which alone can insure their perfect appreciation, viz.: the realisation on the stage. They thus fulfil—in a measure—the educational mission which properly belongs to them; and although in the above remarks we have chiefly had in view the example presented by Germany and Austria, the circular recently issued by the French Minister of Fine Arts (a translation of which will be found in another part of these notes) will furnish sufficient proof that the importance of the lyric stage as an element of general culture, and its consequent responsibility, are fully acknowledged also in France. We may supplement these observations by the list of representations given during four weeks at the Royal Opera of Berlin:—"La Dame Blanche," "La Muette," "Water Carrier," "Alessandro Stradella," "Belmont and Constanze," "Figaro," "Don Giovanni," "Templer und Jüdin," "Iphigenia in Aulis," "Lohengrin," "L'Africaine," "Le Prophète," "Les Huguenots," "Aïda," "Die Maccabäer" (Rubinstein), besides two comparative novelties viz.: "Armin" (Hofmann) and "Ekkehard" (Abert).

Some festivities have recently taken place at the Royal Theatre at Munich in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the foundation of this, one of the most important art-establishments in Germany. In connection with this event, Herr Grandeaux, the impresario, has issued a volume containing the chronicle of the theatre, an example which, in the interest of art-history, might be imitated with advantage by all competent persons connected with similar institutions.

A correspondent of the Times, quoting from a Munich paper, says: "The King of Bavaria has ordered that a certain percentage of the net profits of every performance of 'Fidelio' at the Royal Theatre shall be accorded to Caroline van Beethoven, a niece of the great composer."

Herr Wagner's "Siegfried" was performed for the first time at the Imperial Opera at Vienna on the 9th ult., and has had numerous repetitions since that period. The work has been magnificently placed on the stage, and the artists engaged in the performance are said to vie with each other in order to realise in a worthy manner the intentions of the composer. Frau Materna represents (as at Bayreuth) the character of Brünnhilde, and Herr Jäger that of Siegfried. The latter gentleman, the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik informs us, has during the last six months been studying at Bayreuth, under Herr Wagner's guidance, the poet-composer's latest music-drama, being designated also for the part of "Parsifal" during the projected first performance of that work at the already classical town of the "Bühnen-Festspiele." In the meantime Herr Jäger has accepted an engagement for three months at the Vienna Opera to assist in the contemplated performance at that establishment of the entire Tetralogy, "Der Ring des Nibelungen."

A romantic Opera entitled "Der Schwedensee," founded on legendary lore and composed by Herr Robert Emmerich, has just been brought out at the Hoftheater at Darmstadt, where the new work was received with every mark of success. Herr Emmerich has long been known in German musical circles as a musician of considerable merit, whose retiring disposition has hitherto prevented his talents from becoming more generally appreciated; a quality not too frequently met with in these latter days.

During the Concert recently held at the Leipzig Gewandhaus (already alluded to in our last issue) in celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the appearance in public of Madame Schumann, the programme consisted entirely of the compositions of the lady's late husband. The hall was most tastefully decorated with flowers and evergreens, and it is needless to add that the gifted artist was made the object of a perfect ovation on the part of a crowded audience. A similar festivity took place in the locality of the Hoch'sche Conservatorium at Frankfurt, Madame Schumann being one of the professors of that Institute.

We read in the Berlin papers that during a Concert recently given by M. Henri Wieniawski at the Prussian capital, the eminent violinist, who had just commenced the first movement of a new Concerto of his own composition, was suddenly seized by an attack of asthma, and was unable to go on with the performance. Herr Joachim, who happened to be present, then stepped forward to fill up the gap, and on the instrument of his colleague played the "Chaconne," by Bach, amidst the enthusiastic plaudits of the audience. It may be added that if occurrences of this nature are happily rare, it is equally rare that, in these days of travelling virtuosos, two such consummate masters of the same instrument should be found in the same room together.

M. Paul Viardot, a son of Madame Pauline Viardot-Garcia, has recently made a successful début as a violin-player at one of the Gewandhaus concerts at Leipzig.

A new edition has just been published of Van der Hagen's rare and as yet standard work on the poetry of the "Minnesinger" of the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth centuries (Leipzig: J. A. Barth).

The Abbé Liszt has, it is stated, intrusted Mdlle. Ramann, of Nürnberg, with the publication in German of a complete edition of his literary works.

Handel's "Joshua" was the work selected by Herr Ferdinand Hiller for the opening performance of the present series of concerts annually held under his direction at the Gürzenich Hall at Cologne.

Herr Brahms's Symphony in D major, which was performed the other day at the Concerts Populaires, in Paris, has found little favour with the French critics, who pronounce it to be devoid of grandeur of conception, finding, moreover, the instrumentation "colourless," and the work as a whole "music for the eye rather than for the ear."

M. A. Jullien, of the Paris journal Le Français, has made an interesting discovery, viz., the printed announcement of a concert given by Leopold Mozart (the father of the great composer), while travelling with his two precocious children, Wolfgang and Marianna. It runs as follows: "My daughter, aged twelve, and my son, who is seven years old, will execute the concertos of the greatest masters on the clavecin; my boy also a concerto on the violin. My son will cover the keys of the clavecin with a cloth, and play on the instrument equally well as though it were not so covered. From a distance, as well as near by, he will accurately guess any note or chord which may be indicated to him, either on the clavecin or a bell, or on any other instrument. In conclusion, he will improvise as long as may be desired, and according to choice, either on the organ or on the clavecin, in all keys, even the most difficult, as chosen. His organ-playing is, however, quite different to his playing the clavecin."

M. Gounod's new opera, "Polyeucte," continues almost to monopolise the répertoire of the Paris Grand-Opéra. During the recent temporary indisposition of Mdlle. Krauss the rôle of Pauline was successfully assumed by Mdlle. de Reszké. Two new operatic works were announced to be performed in the French capital during the past month, viz.: at the Opéra-Comique, "Les Noces de Fernande," by M. Deffés; and at the Renaissance, "Le Camargo," by M. Lecocq. At the former establishment the 500th performance has lately taken place of M. Thomas's "Mignon."

According to a comparative scale, published by Le Figaro, of the receipts of operatic performances in Paris during the two International Exhibitions of 1867 and 1878 respectively, and comprising the period from May 1 to October 31, the Grand Opéra realised fcs. 1,147,183 in the former against fcs. 2,082,667 in the latter; and the Opéra-Comique, fcs. 856,057 in the former against fcs. 946,295 in the latter year.

M. Bardoux, the French Minister of Fine Arts, has addressed the following circular to all directors of theatres in France, as well as to the Société des Compositeurs, and other artistic bodies:—

Monsieur,—For some time past public opinion has been in a state of uneasiness about the evident decline manifesting itself in certain phases of the dramatic and lyric art; the cause of such decadence being attributed by many excellent minds to the absolute freedom of competition accorded to our theatres by the decree of January 6, 1864. Whatever the difficulties I may have to encounter in attacking this subject, if it harbour an evil, it will be my duty to look for the remedy. There are three important interests immediately concerned which must receive an equal share of my attention—the interests of the art, of the public, and of the artists. To insure to the latter the just reward for their labour; to offer to the spectator refined and healthy entertainments; to reconcile, if possible, the dramatic and lyric art to those habits of propriety which have won for our theatres so legitimate a reputation—such is the threefold problem to the solution of which I have to direct my efforts.

In order to aid me in this task, and to have as much light thrown upon the matter as possible, I appeal to all such persons whose experience in this direction cannot be questioned, and I shall feel greatly obliged if you will communicate to me your personal views regarding the régime instituted by the decree of January 6, 1864. What have been its advantages or inconveniences? What has been the influence exercised by that régime upon the organisation of our companies, our orchestras, our choruses? Ought that régime to be maintained intact? In which sense might it be amended? What new régime might be substituted? In short, Monsieur, I request that you will favour me with any observations which you may think calculated to elucidate the question, and whatever communication you may send me will be gratefully received, and will be made the object of my attentive consideration.—Believe me to be, &c.

(Signed) Le Ministre de l'Instruction Publique, des Cultes et des Beaux-Arts, A. Bardoux.

M. Massenet, the well-known French composer, has, it is stated, just completed a new opera entitled "Herodias," which will shortly be brought out on the Paris National lyric stage.

By the death of the widow of Gasparo Spontini, the entire fortune left by the great composer becomes the property, in accordance with the stipulations of his will, of the town of Majolati, where he died, and is to be devoted to the foundation of charitable institutions.

Mdme. Adelina Patti has recently gone through a series of triumphs at Brussels, where she appeared in "Faust," "Il Barbière," and "Aïda." The diva was to continue her tournée at Berlin during the present month.

A young journeyman carpenter from Bruges, the fortunate possessor of that rare gift, a fine tenor voice, has this year gained the prize of fcs. 1,200 annually awarded by the Brussels Conservatoire.

Herr Niels Gade has, we hear, undertaken the composition of a festival Cantata to be performed on the occasion of the 400th anniversary of the founding of the University of Copenhagen, in June next.

Athens, the ancient emporium of arts, is shortly to have an Italian Opera, after having been deprived of that luxury for the period of some nine years, an operatic company having already been engaged for that purpose at Milan. The grafting of modern Italian Opera upon the classic city of the drama of ancient Greece, from which it professedly took its origin, offers suggestions fruitful alike to the historian and to the satirist.

Herr Kiel's Oratorio "Christus" will be performed during this winter by the Oratorio Society of New York, under the direction of Dr. L. Damrosch.

We have received the first number of a weekly journal published at Barcelona, under the title of El Eco de la Prensa, which will devote its pages to the interests of science, art, and commerce.

New York journals speak in flattering terms of M. Franz Rummel, the rising Belgian pianist, who is just now engaged upon a concert tournée in the United States, in association with some vocal artists. M. Rummel's interpretation of compositions of the more advanced schools is said to have especially excited the admiration of his listeners.

Madame Blaes-Meert, once a well-known singer, whose name is mentioned in flattering terms in the writings of both Mendelssohn and Schumann, died recently at the age of sixty-two at Brussels.

Hippolite Lucas, littérateur and author of several libretti of operas, died lately at Paris, aged seventy.

The death is announced at St. Petersburg of Woldemar Frackmann, a professor of the Imperial Conservatoire, and a musician of considerable attainments.

At the Russian capital also died, at the mature age of ninety, Louis Maurer, once a violinist of world-wide reputation, and the composer of several operettas and minor compositions for various instruments.

We subjoin as usual the programmes of concerts recently given at some of the leading institutions abroad.

Paris.—First Concert Populaire (October 27): Symphony, G minor (Mozart); Rêverie (Schumann); Entr'acte (Taubert); Symphony, D major (Brahms); Violin Concerto (Garcia); Septet (Beethoven). First Châtelet Concert (October 27): "La Damnation de Faust" (Berlioz). Concert Populaire (November 3): Symphony (Haydn); Offertory (Gounod); Minuet from "Capitaine Fracasse" (Pessard); Fragments from Symphony, "L'Océan" (Rubinstein); Kreutzer Sonata (Beethoven); Fragments from "Midsummer Night's Dream" (Mendelssohn). Concert Populaire (November 10): Pastoral Symphony (Beethoven); Symphonic Fragments, posthumous (Schubert); Pianoforte Concerto (B. Godard); Theme, with variations for Clarionet (Mozart); Rhapsodie Hongroise (Liszt). Concert Populaire (November 17): Symphony, in A (Beethoven); Bacchanale from "Samson et Dalila" (Saint-Saëns); Minuet (Boccherini); Symphony, B flat (Schumann); Violin Concerto (Léonard); Overture to "Der Freischütz."

Leipzig.—Gewandhaus Concert (October 31): Motett (Doles); Festival Overture (Reinecke); Air for stringed orchestra (Bach); Symphony, B flat major (Beethoven). Gewandhaus Concert (November 7): Overture to "Nordische Heerfahrt" (Hartmann); Rhapsody for alto solo, male chorus, and orchestra (Brahms); Concerto, G minor (Saint-Saëns); Symphony, B flat major (Gade); Nocturne, Etude, Scherzo (Chopin). Conservatorium Concert (November 8): Quartett, G major (Beethoven); Sonata, C major (Beethoven); Violin Sonata, G major (Beethoven); Airs (Mozart and Isouard). Conservatorium Concert November 9): Quartett, E minor (Mozart); Violin Sonata (Hauptmann); Violin Sonata, C minor (Beethoven); Quartett, B minor (Mendelssohn). Euterpe Concert (November 5): Overture to "Coriolanus" (Beethoven); Pianoforte Concerto, D minor (Brahms); Serenade for stringed orchestra (Fuchs); Symphony, B flat major (Schumann). Euterpe Concert (November 12): Overture to "Richard III." (Volkmann); Violin Concerto, No. 2 (Bruch); Violin Solos (Joachim and Leclair); Symphony, A major (Beethoven); Air from "Alcina" (Handel). Gewandhaus Concert (November 14): "The Creation" (Haydn).

Berlin.—Bilse Concert (November 5): Overtures to "Athalie," "Midsummer Night's Dream," "Hebrides," and "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage;" Wedding March, Symphony A major, &c. (Mendelssohn). Concert of the "Symphoniekapelle" (November 6): Overtures to "Melusine" and "Ruy Blas," Symphony, A minor, music to "Midsummer Night's Dream" (Mendelssohn).

CORRESPONDENCE.

DIBDIN'S PSALMODY.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—The new part of Dr. Grove's "Dictionary of Music" has a memoir, by Mr. Husk, of the late H. E. Dibdin, wherein it is said that "he is best known as the compiler of 'The Standard Psalm Tune Book,' the largest and most authentic collection of psalm-tunes ever published."

A statement by so learned a writer, widely circulated in so very valuable and interesting a book of reference, must gain the attention of many readers, and may influence the judgment of such as have not investigated the matter for themselves. Being compelled to form a very different estimate of Mr. Dibdin's work, it may be in the interest of Psalmody if I ask to be allowed to make a few remarks thereupon.

It is certainly "the largest collection ever published," containing, as it does, 696 melodies. We must, therefore, give full credit to the industry manifested in bringing together the materials.

But as to being "authentic," I venture to assert that a more unreliable book is hardly to be met with. Of course, this general charge must be established by reference to particulars.

I. As to the Letterpress. The "Notices of Particular Tunes" contain some great mistakes. Two may be specified. It is said of "Angel's Song" that "The Rev. W. H. Havergal seems the first who has publicly asserted Orlando Gibbons's claim to the tune." The truth is, that the tune, in its present shape, was printed with "Dr. Gibbons" as Composer before Mr. Havergal was born; and, to come to later times, it is so assigned in Buddicom's collection, 1827, just twenty years before Mr. Havergal undertook "to settle the authorship." Also, we read of "Easter Hymn:" "Dr. Rimbault has seen this tune in the 'Lyra Davidica,' by Walsh, 1708, where the composition is ascribed to H. Carey." Now, whatever the doctor may have seen, no Composer's name is given in "Lyra Davidica," nor is Carey mentioned at all!

Among the introductory matter is a "Chronological List of Works consulted," which has a show of research, and would be of great use if accurate, but it is not so. If Mr. Dibdin "consulted" all the books himself, he must have done it very carelessly.

1. The titles are incorrectly given in most instances. Ex. gr., that very important work, A. Hart's harmonised Psalter of 1635 is thus described: "The Psalms of David, 8vo, with their whole tunes in four and five parts, and some tunes in reports." The real title is—"The Psalmes of David in Prose and Meeter, With their whole Tunes in foure or mo parts, and some Psalmes in Reports." This is but a sample of the loose manner in which all the books are quoted.

2. The dates attached, though all given without qualification, are in many cases conjectural, and in some impossible. Two notable instances may suffice. Philip Hart's "Melodies to the Psalms" is boldly dated 1689, reference being made to Dr. Rimbault's copy; yet that copy bore no date at all, nor is there any on those in the possession of Mr. Dobson or myself. The guess is a most unfortunate one. The book contains "St. Ann's Melody," assigned to "Dr. Crofts," and we all know that Croft was not so dignified till the middle of 1713. This needs no comment. Again, Matthew Wilkins's "Book of Psalmody" is dated 1699—Mr. Dibdin seems to have been fond of an odd nine in these cases—but Wilkins was not born till 1704, and died 1772. The work could hardly have been published before 1730, at the soonest, and so Mr. Dibdin's conclusions as to the early origin of "Bedford," "Walsall," &c., all fall to the ground.

II. To come to the Music. Some of this, as Mr. Husk states, is "derived from ancient Psalters," but it is not presented as it stood in those Psalters. Melody, notation, harmony, and almost everything is interfered with.

1. Many old Psalter tunes, as Nos. 221, 240, and others, are avowedly "abbreviated" and "reduced," and similar liberties are taken with a number of the old Chorals, though no such acknowledgment is made.

2. The rhythm is altered in many instances. Thus "Bangor," "St. David," &c., are deprived of their terminal semibreves, which makes those venerable melodies look quite different. In tunes of later date, as "Althorp," No. 13, "Blackburn," No. 35, "Hampton," No. 339, &c., crotchets have been transmuted into notes of double value, to enforce "the dull monotony of interminable minims." Tunes thus reduced to notes of equal length throughout, although the melodic progressions remain, are totally changed in effect.

3. The harmonies are almost entirely altered to suit Mr. Dibdin's own views as to what they ought to have been. But this is the vice of the age.

4. There are considerable errors as to authorship. Mr. Dibdin seems not to have tolerated the idea that there might be more than one Composer of the same surname. Hence he has assigned a number of tunes to the wrong man. "Carolina," No. 50, is attributed to James Coombs, of Chippenham; but it is by W. Coombs, of Bristol, and was in print before James Coombs was of age. Again, Thomas Jackson, of Newark, a name familiar to every one well versed in Psalmody, is quite ignored; his tunes being put to the credit of William Jackson, of Exeter. The treatment of one of these is too remarkable to pass unnoticed. It is printed three times over, Nos. 59, 64, 138, under as many different names, and is given in two cases to "Wm. Jackson," but in the third to "Author unknown." Methinks, he who looks into the book with a view to find an "authentic" account of tunes runs the risk of being considerably embarrassed. Tune 368, attributed to Dr. Wainwright, is an altered copy of one by his brother Richard.

"Aylesbury," No. 359, is referred to Dr. Greene, an error arising from the earliest copy being found in James Green's collection, 1724. "Devonshire," No. 391, is also given to the doctor, but it is certainly by Lampe, and was published in his Festival Hymns, 1746, though in a very different form from Mr. Dibdin's version.

5. Many of the tunes, not wrongly assigned, are imperfectly traced. Thus, "Bella," No. 323, is referred to "Harmonia Perfecta," 1730; but it is found in "New and Easie Method," 1686. Again, "Oldenburg," No. 347, is said to be "From John Clipshaw's (it ought to be 'Clipsham's') collection, 1753;" but it had been printed in 1718, in Bennet's "Necessary Companion." The usual name is "Orange." "St. Alban's New," No. 11, is attributed to Sreeve, 1740, but is in Chetham's Psalmody, 1718.

6. The Names are capriciously altered in numerous cases. "Byzantium" is miscalled "Jackson;" "St. Clement," "Lancaster;" "Durham," "Hampton;" "Newmarket," "Attleborough;" &c. The giving local names to old Psalter proper tunes is confusing and objectionable.

I could add much more, but must not presume further on your indulgence.

In the above review of poor Mr. Dibdin's book I have not forgotten the proverbial reference to "glass-houses," and so forth. Having, in my own collection, described just twice the number of "authorities" named by him, I have had rather more opportunities afforded of slipping. Indeed, Hinc illæ lachrymæ—I am sore upon this point. Formerly, supposing that Mr. Dibdin or his alter ego, Dr. Rimbault, must know more of these things than myself, I repeated the blunders about Hart and Wilkins, and perpetrated other faults through misplaced confidence. But when I got hold of the books for myself, I soon found that I had been taken in, and thus was put to the trouble and expense of cancelling, reprinting, and all the rest of it. If any of your readers should be in possession of early copies of my "Biographical Index," I hope they will kindly accept the above excuse; and I shall be very happy to send corrected portions to any such who may signify a wish to that effect.—I am, Sir, yours, very faithfully,

HENRY PARR.

WANTED, AN IMPRESARIO.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—The following is an abstract of the conditions of the lease of the Theatre Royal, Madrid, published in the Gazette of the 5th inst.

The theatre must be taken for five years certain, with option of extending the lease to ten years, from October 15, 1879. No premium is to be charged for the lease.

Operatic performances only to be given. Season from October 1 to 15, until first fortnight in April, during which time not more than 120 nor less than ninety performances may be given. Four masked balls may be given under Government supervision. For any other performance the authority of the Minister of Finance must be obtained.

The company is to consist of three sopranos, one contralto, two first tenors, one second tenor, two baritones, two bassi, and a buffo vocalist. All these artists must be of European reputation, and must have sustained principal parts successfully for two seasons in any of the principal theatres in Naples, Milan, Paris, London, Vienna, St. Petersburg, or the Theatre Royal at Madrid. There must also be a sufficient complement of inferior but skilled artists. The chorus shall consist of at least eighty, viz., thirty female and fifty male singers.

The orchestra shall consist of at least one hundred artists, and shall have two directors, one of whom shall be a Spaniard. There shall also be a good military band.

The ballet shall consist of two principal dancers of good repute, with the necessary number of figurantes.

As a guarantee for the performance of this part of the contract, a list of the company shall, a fortnight before the opening of the subscription list, be laid before a jury, two at least of whom must be members of the Royal Academy of Fine Arts of San Fernando.

Every year shall be put on the stage one grand Opera with all the appliances necessary for competition with the principal theatres of Europe.

One Opera, old or new, that has not before been heard at Madrid, must be produced each year. Also one new Opera in three or more acts by a native composer. A jury of five composers, three nominated by the Minister of Finance and two by the establishment, shall adjudicate on the merits of those submitted, which must be sent in by November 1, and the Opera chosen must be produced before the 1st of March. The royalty to be paid to the author and performers shall be determined by the jury.

Whenever the Board of the National School of Music and Elocution shall present to the Theatre Royal a student who has obtained the first prize for singing at that institution, the said establishment shall be compelled to give such student a principal character in an opera to be agreed on. No salary will be given, but such student shall have the right of three appearances, subject to the approval of the public. The said School of Music shall also be furnished with twelve admissions per week, to be distributed among the students.

Here follow some clauses referring to the decoration of the building, &c.

If the impresario should desire to commence a sixth season he will have to erect, at his own expense, an organ suitable for the place and object. On the termination of the lease from any cause all the decorations, &c., shall be the property of the Government.

To guarantee due performance of the contract the lessee shall deposit in the General Treasury of Deposits a sum of 50,000 pesetas (say, £2,000) in cash or State paper, at the market price, to be returned at the expiration of the lease. The subscriptions shall likewise be deposited in the same General Treasury, to be drawn upon by fortnightly instalments, such withdrawals in no case to exceed the amount corresponding to the number of performances given. The latter provision may be dispensed with, under a banker's guarantee.

In case of stoppage of the performances, arising from fire, plague, war, or other calamity, the lessee may, with the consent of the Government, rescind the contract, but cannot claim compensation. The Government may likewise rescind the contract, with forfeiture of the guarantee, in case of non-compliance with any of the conditions.

The theatre shall be adjudicated to the highest bidder, and the sum offered is to be applied for the encouragement and protection of national music, by pensions to Spanish artists abroad, prizes to Spanish artists, &c., to be awarded by the Academy of San Fernando.

The rent shall be paid in advance, in quarterly instalments.

Persons desiring to send in estimates, which will be opened on November 5, 1878, must deposit the sum of 12,500 pesetas (say, £500) with the General Treasury of Deposits, which will be returned in case the offer is not accepted.

The successful competitor, who must receive the royal approbation, shall present within ten days a certificate of the deposit of 50,000 pesetas, in failure of which his deposit of 12,500 pesetas will be forfeited to the State.

On the fulfilment of these conditions the lease shall be executed in duplicate at the cost of the lessee.

This is a grand scheme; but in Spain everything is planned on a large scale.

Let us give the enhorabuena to the bold impresario who will have the courage to undertake the execution of it.

I remain, Sir, yours faithfully,

Cecil Burch.

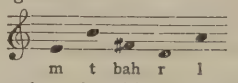
THE MINOR SCALE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—I have not seen Messrs. Novello and Co.'s "Musical Primer," No. 18, in which Mr. Curwen gives an account of the Tonic Sol-fa method.

Your critique upon it (October 1) has been brought under my notice. Passing to the more important part of it, "The Minor Scale," it seems to me that Mr. Curwen's treatment of this form of the scale has been somewhat misunderstood.

In the example given:—



there is nothing to show that this passage is minor; and in the rendering of it in the key of A, as "simplicity itself," s r l f d, it is certainly not minor, concluding as it does upon a full plagal cadence.

Neither of these translations into the Tonic Sol-fa notation given by you would ever have been imagined by any one conversant with this notation.

The passage is either in the key of G, or in the key of C, with a chromatic tone.

If in C the Sol-fa reading would be m t fe r l; if in G, l m t s r; in either of which forms it can be read by any tyro.

The intervals given by you, t bah r, are not true musical intervals. The voice would not sing them. No tempered instrument can play them. When correctly noted, t fe r, or m t s, the intervals are a perfect fourth, followed by a perfect third, and easily singable by any one who knows the scale.

May I assure your readers that a Sol-faist in singing regards intervals no more than a man ascending a ladder considers whether the steps are six, seven, or eight inches apart; his object is to place his foot upon the step, not upon the interval. So also any one crossing a ford by stepping-stones always takes care to make sure of the steps; the distances apart may be one, two, or three feet, it matters not what they are if he can only step over them.

So, in singing, a Sol-faist thinks only of making sure of the tones of the scale, diatonic or chromatic; if the true sound is sung, the intervals, large or small, can take care of themselves, for they are sure to be correct.

Your critique is generally good and fair. It surprises me to find such a hitch in it. When giving a specimen of Mr. Curwen's minor notation it should be correct, and such as every one can understand.

Yours faithfully,

Anderson's College, Glasgow, Colin Brown,
November 12, 1878. Euing Lecturer on Music.

[As we entirely endorsed Mr. Curwen's treatment of the minor scale, Mr. Brown must differ from Mr. Curwen if he differs from us. We simply advocated the supplementary study of interval, especially with a view to the application of the method of the staff notation. Sol-faists could as easily do this as pupils of any other school. The tonality of the passage in question could be definitely settled only by harmony. It is an extreme illustration of a difficulty well known to advanced Sol-faists and, we should have supposed, to Mr. Brown, if he is a singer as well as a theoretician. It is satisfactory to find Mr. Brown ingenuously supporting our argument by his discovery that the passage is easy because it contains only a perfect fourth and a perfect fifth. Mr. Brown might read the review once more with advantage.—The Writer of the Review.]

THE SIGNATURE OF THE MINOR KEY.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—May I beg a small space in your valuable paper to ask a question that may probably sound absurd to educated musicians, but with which many teachers of young pupils would, I believe, sympathise? Would it not be possible for composers and publishers to agree to adopt signatures for the minor keys more distinctive and appropriate than those now in use? Of course the fact of the minor scales being written in various ways makes any change difficult; yet now that which is known as the French mode, with minor third, minor sixth, and major seventh, both ascending and descending, is gaining ground, why not endeavour to make it general? Why, for example, should not the key of D minor have this signature:—

and C minor—

The eye would soon become accustomed to it; the idea conveyed is definite; and to both copyist and printer the mechanical labour would be lessened. I know much might be urged against such a change; but they who have experienced the difficulty of explaining to those unacquainted with the grammar of music why and how two pieces of music with the same signature may be in two different keys would, I fancy, find it a great help, for they know how often the explanation fails, the pupil retaining but a hazy idea of the difference between major and minor, and still mentally inclined to think of both as being in the same key, only that one is mystified and made difficult by the introduction of numerous accidentals the meaning of which is by no means clear to him.

I believe that some such plan as the one here suggested might be found practicable, and would be a boon to some bewildered minds.—I am, sir, yours truly,

J. F.

[" J. F." will no doubt be surprised to hear that we have seen published music in D minor with the signature suggested.—Ed. Musical Times.]

MUSIC IN ENGLISH PARISH CHURCHES.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—I am afraid "All Saints', Burstwick," is not the only church where you might hear an unexpected kind of musical instrument, and my reason for saying so is this:—

About five or six years ago I happened to attend a Sunday morning service at a country church some few miles from the cathedral city of Hereford, and, while not expecting very great things, I was hardly prepared to hear the strains of a concertina, and performed upon by the officiating clergyman! I assure you such was the case. The responses were monotoned throughout, and the canticles and hymns were sung by a young girl who, judging from appearances, was connected with the household of the clergyman. She sang everything alone, without even the assistance of the concertina; the clergyman merely playing over the different things, and then leaving the vocalist to herself. And when I say "herself" I mean it. Not a soul else in the church took any audible interest in the singing or responses, and such an extraordinary service I never before witnessed. I hope, sir, you will not think I was ungallant in not having done my best to at least make a duet of it, but the scene was so far removed from anything I could possibly have imagined that all ideas of a stranger taking any part in the service vanished, and yet it was torture to hear Dr. Dykes's beautiful setting of "Holy, Holy, Holy" (which was one of the hymns) rendered in such a style.

As the congregation seemed totally indifferent to everything connected with the service, I anticipate the same sort of thing exists to this day. I hope it may not be so, and can only feel astonished that such a thing was possible in recent years and at a church so near the cathedral city.

Yours truly,

November 5, 1878. A. G.

QUADRUPLE CHANTS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—I am desirous of being introduced to a source of a few good Quadruple Chants. The only one with which I am at present acquainted is the well-worn one of Sir Herbert Oakeley in F. I think that such chant for a long canticle like the Te Deum is preferable to an ordinary double chant in choirs, where a simple musical service is alone necessary. If either you or any of your numerous correspondents can furnish me with the information I require, and will kindly do so, it will be esteemed a great favour by the writer.—I am, obediently yours,

G. K., Organist.

Mr. Dyson's letter respecting his "Chromatic Music Stave, or Key-board System of Notation," alluded to in our last number, merely confirms the truth of our remark that his method perpetuates the feeling of the scale of C being natural, and all others departures from it. That he disbelieves, in common with most intelligent musicians, the abstract truth of this we do not doubt; but in reply to his assertion that "it is difficult to conceive of any practicable plan by which every key or scale would be so delineated as to appear equally natural and at the same time theoretically true," we beg to draw his attention to the "Sequential System of Musical Notation," in which this desirable reform is most thoroughly carried out.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

 Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will greatly oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music pages are always stereotyped, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

Belfast.—On Thursday, the 21st ult., a Ballad Concert was given in St. Mary's Hall, for the benefit of the poor visited by the members of St. Peter's branch, St. Vincent de Paul Society. Mrs. Maguire, Miss Doherty, Messrs. Glasgow, Ennis, Craig, Ritchie, and Flatley contributed the vocal solos with much success. Mr. W. H. Flood, Organist of St. Peter's, was Conductor, and performed a brilliant arrangement of some popular Irish airs. "The harp that once," harmonised by Balfe, and "The wine cup is circling," harmonised by Sir R. P. Stewart, were well rendered by a selected chorus of fifty voices. The concert was a complete success, and the committee have realised nearly £30.

Birmingham.—At a recent meeting of the General Committee of the Birmingham Musical Festival, Lord Norton in the chair, the report of the Orchestral Committee was received. It set forth that Lord Norton had accepted the offer of the presidency of the Festival of 1879, and that negotiations and arrangements had been entered into for the production of new works, the titles of which would be announced at the next meeting. The pitch of the Town Hall Organ had been restored to about the same point at which it stood ten or twelve years ago. Mr. R. Peyton was requested to act as orchestral steward. The committee was authorised to re-appoint Sir Michael Costa as Conductor, and the next Festival was fixed for Tuesday, the 26th of August, 1879, and three following days.——The singing classes in connection with the Church of the Saviour gave a Concert, under the direction of Mr. H. M. Stevenson, at the Lecture Room on the 29th of October. The programme included W. H. Birch's pastoral operetta, The Merrie Men of Sherwood Forest, and a few songs. The artists were Miss Fraser Brunner, Messrs. Roper, C. Banks, J. Beard, T. Wathen, and E. Horrex; the band and choir numbered upwards of fifty, with Mr. H. Symper as leader; Mr. Thurstan officiated as pianist. The whole of the music was well rendered, and the chorus singing was highly creditable to Mr. Stevenson.——A Concert of Chamber Music was given to the subscribers of the Society of Artists on Saturday afternoon, the 9th ult. The programme included Grieg's Sonata for violin and pianoforte, Op. 8; Beethoven's Sonata, Op. 47 (the Kreutzer); and Mendelssohn's Trio in D minor; a violin solo by Ferdinand David, pieces for pianoforte by Mayer and Schumann, and songs by Anderton, Blumenthal, and Rubinstein. The executants were M. Sainton, violin; Mrs. Hale, pianoforte; Mr. Roden, violoncello; and the Misses E. and M. Harris.——The Carl Rosa Opera Company gave a second six-night series at the Theatre Royal, commencing on Monday, the 11th ult.

The novelty on this occasion was Wallace's Lurline, which was performed twice.——On the 16th ult. Mr. D. F. Davis commenced a series of Saturday Evening Popular Concerts in the Town Hall. To increase the effect of chamber music, a platform was erected in the centre of the hall. The programmes, consisting of classical works and popular arrangements, were well received. The string quartetts were played by Messrs. Abbott, Ward, Davis, and Weston; Miss Ffrench Davis was solo pianist; Mr. Davis, harpist; and the vocalists, Miss Emma Beasley and Miss Emilie Lloyd.——Messrs. Harrison's Second Subscription Concert took place in the Town Hall on Wednesday, the 20th ult. The vocalists were the Misses Robertson, Madame Norman-Neruda was the solo violinist, Mr. Charles Hallé the pianist, and the orchestra, the celebrated band of Mr. Hallé. The chief item of the programme was Raff's Leonore Symphony—the first orchestral work of this composer given in Birmingham; it was finely rendered, and warmly received. The other orchestral pieces were the suite, L'Arlésienne, by G. Bizet; the Pageant March from Gounod's Reine de Saba, and the overtures, Der Freischütz and Tannhäuser; the latter one of the finest performances ever heard in Birmingham. Madame Neruda played a Ballade and Polonaise (with orchestral accompaniment) by Vieuxtemps, and Hungarian Airs by Sarasate, her splendid performances exciting much enthusiasm. Mr. Hallé played Mendelssohn's Capriccio Brillant in B minor, Op. 22, in his usual highly finished manner. The Misses Robertson were encored in Rubinstein's duets and their songs.——The Philharmonic Union's Second Concert was given on the 21st ult., the work performed being Handel's Messiah. The principals were Miss Jessie Royd, Madame Barnett, Mr. Abercrombie, and Mr. Woodward; Organist, Mr. Stimpson; and Conductor, Dr. C. S. Heap.

BISHOP AUCKLAND.—At the first Concert of the Auckland Musical Society for the present season Mendelssohn's Hear my Prayer, Liszt's "Chorus of Reapers," and Cowen's cantata, The Rose Maiden, were performed, with full band and chorus of about 150 performers, under the conductorship of Mr. Kilburn. The vocalists were Miss Tomlinson, Mr. G. H. Welch, R.A.M., Mr. Thornton Wood, &c.

BRADFORD.—Mr. S. Midgley gave a Concert of Chamber-Music, in the Church Institute, on the 13th ult., when he had the co-operation of Herr Straus and M. Vieuxtemps in Balfe's Trio in A, Saint-Saëns's Trio in F (Op. 18), and Beethoven's Trio in E flat (Op. 70). A piano and violoncello Sonata (Beethoven), Op. 5, No. 2, was perhaps the greatest treat of the evening. Herr Straus played an Ariette and Minuetto from a Suite by Raff, which showed the performer's execution to great advantage. M. Vieuxtemps gave a Reverie by Dunkler, into which he infused an immense amount of feeling, and for which he was much applauded. Mr. Midgley's playing, especially in the Beethoven numbers, was particularly brilliant.

BRIGHTON.—At the series of Subscription Concerts now being given by Mr. Watts, the very best artists, vocal and instrumental, are engaged. Miss Emma Thursby, Mdlle. Alwina Valleria, Madame Trebelli, and Herr Behrens have already appeared; and a noteworthy feature has been the introduction of the pianist, Baron Bodog d'Orczy, a pupil of Liszt, whose "Abendstern," a transcription from Wagner's Tannhaüser, he did full justice to. The selections at these Concerts have been uniformly excellent, and the attendances have fully rewarded Mr. Watts for his enterprise.

BRISTOL.—On Sunday, October 27, Special Services, in commemoration of the opening of the nave, were held in the Cathedral, at which the Mayor and Corporation attended in State. The service throughout the day was Wesley in F; in the morning Handel's Coronation Anthem, "The King shall rejoice," was sung, and, in the afternoon, Elvey's "In that day." The services were finely rendered. ——On Monday, October 28, another of Mr. Riseley's Popular Concerts was given in the Colston Hall, the band consisting as usual of about fifty performers. The programme included Schubert's unfinished Symphony in B minor, the Overtures to Oberon (Weber), Son and Stranger (Mendelssohn), and Die Felsenmuhle (Reissiger), and Mendelssohn's Concerto in D minor, for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 40, well rendered by Mr. J. L. Roeckel and the band. Mr. Farley Sinkins was the vocalist. Mr. A. W. Waite was leader of the band, and Mr. George Riseley conducted.——On Wednesday, October 30, a Promenade Concert was given in the Colston Hall by Mr. Riseley's band, when the programme was made up of music of a popular kind. Miss Jessie Royd and Mr. Farley Sinkins were the vocalists.——On Thursday evening, the 7th ult., a Soirée was given by the Cotham Literary and Biblical Union in the large rooms attached to the New Wesleyan Chapel. Miss Rosa Baily, of the Bath and Clifton Concerts, was specially engaged as vocalist. Her rendering of Sullivan's "Lost Chord" was greatly admired and redemanded. Mr. Hook sang two songs very effectively. Mr. J. Percy accompanied.—— On Monday, the 11th ult., the programme at Mr. Riseley's Popular Concerts included the overtures "Im Hochland" (Op. 7) (Niels W. Gade), and "Le Roi d'Yvetot" (A. Adam), Beethoven's Allegretto in E flat, and Schumann's Grand Concerto in A minor, for Pianoforte and Orchestra (Op. 34), the pianist being Mr. F. W. W. Bampfylde, R.A.M., who was loudly applauded for his performance. Mr. J. L. Roeckel's Saraband and Gavotte was also given (by desire), the composer conducting. Madame Ada Jackson was the vocalist. Mr. A. W. Waite was leader of the band, and Mr. George Riseley conducted.——On Thursday, the 21st ult., a Concert was given in the Colston Hall, when the following eminent artists took part:—Mdlle. Carlotta Patti, Signor Urio, and Signor Monari-Rocca, as vocalists; Signor Bottesini contributing some excellently played solos on the contra-basso, and Signor Tito Mattei playing a Nocturne and Waltz of his own composition, and several other pianoforte selections, with considerable skill.

BROMSGROVE.—The Annual Dedication Festival at All Saints' Church was held on Friday, the 1st ult. At the special Choral Service at 7.30 p.m. the music was judiciously selected and excellently rendered. The prayers were intoned by the Rev. J. C. Whall, M.A., and the Hon. and Rev. A. H. T. Massey, M.A. (Vicar). The Rev. E. V. Hall, M.A., Precentor of Worcester Cathedral, preached an eloquent sermon on behalf of the Choir Fund, the collection for which realised nearly £6.

CALVERLEY.—The first Concert of the season, in connection with the Calverley Choral Society, was given on the 5th ult. The first half of the programme was devoted to selections from Elijah, and the second half to secular music. The principal vocalists were Miss Henrietta Tomlinson, Miss Marianne Tomlinson, Mr. Jarvis Grimshaw, and Mr. Arthur Grimshaw. The various parts in the oratorio were sustained with great ability, and the secular selections were rendered with taste and effect. The choruses were sung with spirit and precision, reflecting great credit on the Conductor, Mr. Loaring, F.C.O. Mr. Calvert presided at the piano, and Mr. Kellet at the harmonium.

CHELTENHAM.—The new Winter Garden was opened on the 6th ult. by Lord Fitzhardinge, when an Amateur Concert was given. The selection of music was very good, and the singing of Mrs. Daubeny and Miss Ada Byron was greatly admired. Mrs. A. Von Holst's performance of Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Concerto in D minor, Op. 40, with orchestral accompaniments, was a special feature. In the evening another Concert took place, the vocalists being Madame Muncey and Mr. Henry Guy, both of whom were much applauded. The orchestra is under the direction of Mr. Pollock, R.A.M.

CHICHESTER.—Mr. Seymour Kelly gave a Concert on the 5th ult., assisted by Miss Catherine Penna, the Misses Osmond (of Chichester), Mr. Abercrombie, and Mr. C. Wrixon Kelly (of Dublin), all of whom were well received. Mr. Wrixon Kelly played in a very able manner, and encores were awarded to Miss A. Osmond for Sullivan's "Guinevère," and the concert-giver for his spirited rendering of Adams's "A Mariner Bold." Mr. T. E. Aylward, Organist of the Cathedral, acted as Conductor.——An excellent Concert was given by the Choral Society, on the 14th ult., when Mendelssohn's Athalie was the chief feature of attraction. The choir, consisting of about sixty members, had evidently been trained with considerable care by Mr. Dean, and gave, on the whole, a very fair rendering of the dramatic choruses. Madame Worrell-Duval and Miss Emma Buer sang the music allotted to the principal soprano and contralto, with much effect and artistic feeling, the second soprano part being undertaken by Miss Osmond. The illustrative verses were recited by Mr. Charles Fry, whose finished elocution several times won the applause of the numerous audience. The orchestral accompaniments were very effectively played by Mr. Pollitzer (violin), Mr. Kendall (double bass), Mr. Osmond (harmonium), and Mrs. Dean (pianoforte). The second part of the Concert was miscellaneous, the ladies before-named contributing ballads, Mr. Pollitzer, a violin solo (admirably played and warmly applauded), and the choir giving "Faithful and true" (Lohengrin), and "From harmony" (Ode to St. Cecilia's Day). The most noteworthy feature in this part of the programme was the performance of Mozart's Trio in B flat major, which, notwithstanding its admirable rendering by Mrs. Dean, Mr. Pollitzer, and Mr. Kendall, was, we regret to say, but coldly received by the audience. The Assembly Rooms were filled to overflowing, and the concert was in every respect successful. Mr. Dean and his wife (whose steady accompaniment throughout the evening deserves warm commendation) are to be congratulated on the result of their efforts on behalf of good music in this quiet cathedral town. On the previous evening a Shakesperian Recital was successfully given by Mr. Charles Fry, at the Literary Institution, but as the readings were not interspersed with music, we can do no more than record the fact.

CLIFTON.—On Thursday, the 31st of October, Mr. James C. Daniel gave another Concert in connection with his Clifton Winter Evening Entertainments, at the Victoria Rooms. The artists engaged were:—Madame Nouver, Madame Patey, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Maybrick, with Mr. Thouless as solo violoncellist, and Mr. Edwin Bending as pianist and conductor.——The first Concert of Mrs. Viner Pomeroy's second season of Classical Chamber Concerts took place at the Victoria Rooms on Wednesday evening, the 6th ult. The instrumentalists included Herr Ludwig Straus (first violin), Herr Carl Beryon (second violin), Mr. W. H. Mann (viola), Mr. J. Pomeroy (violoncello), Mr. J. O. Brooke (clarionet), and Mrs. Viner Pomeroy (pianoforte). The programme opened with Mozart's Quintet in A, Op. 108, for clarionet, two violins, viola, and violoncello, most artistically rendered by all the executants; and the other items of the programme were Beethoven's Quartett in B flat, No. 6, Op. 18, for two violins, viola, and violoncello; Spohr's Duet in D minor, No. 1, Op. 39, and Schumann's Quintett in E flat, Op. 44, for piano, two violins, viola, and violoncello, which was played by request. The concert was much appreciated. ——On Monday evening, the 18th ult., Mr. James C. Daniel gave another Concert in connection with his Clifton Winter Evening Entertainments, in the Victoria Rooms. This was designated a Ballad Concert, and the following were the vocalists:—Madame Edith Wynne, Miss Trevelyan, Miss Helen D'Alton, Mr. Barton McGuckin, and Mr. Thurley Beale, the programme including many old favourite songs, &c. Madame Therese Liebe gave some violin solos most efficiently, and Herr Carl Weber conducted and acted as accompanist.

COVENTRY.—The Stabat Mater and Hymn of Praise were given by the Musical Society on the 29th of October. The soloists were Madame Nouver, Madame Patey, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Maybrick. The band and chorus numbered upwards of 150. Mr. Arthur Trickett, F.C.O., conducted.

DENBIGH.—At a Concert on Friday evening, the 22nd ult. the Philharmonic Society performed Beethoven's Engedi and Mendelssohn's Hear my Prayer. The soprano solos were allotted to Miss Jessie Royd, and the tenor music was rendered by Mr. John M. Hayden, of Salisbury Cathedral. Mr. F. C. Watkins, St. Asaph Cathedral, was the Conductor, and Mr. Stephenson, of Wrexham, leader of the orchestra.

DERBY.—Mr. C. H. Coulson, having retired from the office of Honorary Secretary to the Derby Choral Union, a Grand Pianoforte, by Messrs. Collard and Collard, was recently presented to him by the members of the Union and a few other friends, as a testimonial of their appreciation of his valuable services. The presentation was made at the ordinary practice of the Society by the Mayor, and acknowledged by the recipient in few but appropriate words.

DUNEDIN.—At the Second Concert of the Dunedin Glee Club, the programme was well selected and excellently rendered, Hatton's four-part song, "England" (rendered by about thirty-four voices), "The Belfry Tower," "The Pearl Divers," and "The Indian Maid," being amongst the most effective pieces given. There were also several vocal solos; and Miss West, a pupil of Mr. A. J. Towsey, was highly successful in her performance of one of Dussek's Pianoforte Sonatas, another young pianist, Miss Strachan, a pupil of the convent school, being also warmly received in her solo. Mr. Kelsey carefully accompanied at the pianoforte.

Earley, near Reading.—On Monday evening, the 11th ult., a Concert was given in the Parish School Rooms by Mr. H. J. Hendy, Organist and Choirmaster of St. Peter's Church. A well-selected programme was performed. The principal vocalists were Madame Wells, Miss Florence Wydford, and Mr Sellar, who were highly successful in their songs, many of which were encored. The Concert was numerously attended.

Edinburgh.—The annual General Meeting of the University Musical Society was held in the Music Class-room on the 20th ult. Professor Sir Herbert Oakeley occupied the chair, and the meeting was addressed by the President, Sir Alexander Grant, Dr. Peddie, Professor Maclagan, Professor Rutherford, and Dr. Hullah, the last-named gentleman earnestly urging upon the students the necessity of attending the elementary class, even if they had already a knowledge of music. The proceedings were brought to a close by Sir Herbert Oakeley performing on the organ a March and a Movement from one of Handel's Concertos, followed by the National Anthem.

Enniskillen, Ireland.—Harvest Thanksgiving Services were held in the Parish Church on Friday, the 1st ult. The "Venite" was sung to Willing's chant in B flat from Burnley Tune Book, the Psalms were set to Woodward in D, "Te Deum" to major and minor chants by H. Lawes and R. Cooke, "Jubilate" to chant in E flat by Joule, "Magnificat" to double chant in A (Walsh), and "Nunc dimittis" to the one in B flat adapted from Beethoven. The special anthem was "O praise the Lord with thanksgiving" (A. J. Davis), the duet in which was very well rendered by the Misses Weaver and Locknane. The hymns were chosen from the Church Hymnal. During the offertory (which was devoted to the poor), Mr. Arnold, the Organist, played the Pastoral Symphony from Handel's Messiah, "He shall feed his flock," &c.

Fergus.—A Musical Society has just been organised in this village, and met for the first time on Friday evening, the 1st ult., in the Hall over the Argo Block, which has been taken for the purpose. The services of Mr. W. Philp, of Guelph, have been secured for the first term of three months as instructor in vocal and instrumental music. The attendance on the first evening was over sixty members, so that the success of the Society would seem to be assured.

Halifax.—On Friday evening, October 25, W. Jackson's Oratorio, The Deliverance of Israel from Babylon, was performed by the Halifax Choral Society. The chorus, formed by members of the Society, was supported by a very efficient band, and the principal parts were ably rendered by Miss Tomlinson, Mrs. Hamilton, Mr. Verney Binns, and Mr. Rickard. The performance was conducted by Mr. W. H. Whitaker.——A numerous audience assembled in the Mechanics' Hall, on Thursday evening, the 7th ult., to hear an excellent Concert given by Mr. William Frederick Illingworth, a pianist of much power and ability. The artists who assisted were Miss Tomlinson (soprano), Miss Cragg (contralto), Mr. Verney Binns (tenor), and Mr. Rickard (bass), with Mr. Eckersley as accompanist, all of whom were highly efficient, the concert-giver's solos being well played and warmly applauded.

Havant.—On Wednesday evening, the 20th ult., the Havant Choral Society and the Lymbourne Amateur Orchestra, gave their Annual Concert in the Town Hall. The programme contained Mendelssohn's Lauda Sion; "Fac ut portem" (Stabat Mater), Rossini, Miss A. Butterworth; Choral March (from Naaman), Costa; Overture, L'Italiana in Algieri, Rossini; Bridal Chorus (from Lohengrin), Wagner; and several favourite songs. The playing of the orchestra reflected great credit on the conductor and teacher, Herr F. Kreyer, who has managed to bring so large a number of young persons to such a high standard of excellence in so short a time. Herr Kreyer was presented by the Society with a very handsome ivory bâton, mounted with silver gilt. Mr. George Gloyne, leader of the orchestra, in presenting the bâton, expressed the warmest thanks of the whole Society, both vocal and instrumental, for Herr Kreyer's great care and attention.

Hinckley.—On Friday, the 15th ult., Mr. C. J. King, Organist and Choirmaster of the Parish Church, gave his first Concert of the season in St. George's Hall, before a large and appreciative audience. The artists were Madame Thaddeus Wells, Miss Kate Baxter, Mr. T. B. Laxton, Mr. H. Nicholson (solo flute), and Mr. C. J. King (solo pianoforte). Madame Wells sang with her usual success, and Miss Baxter met with warm and well deserved applause. Mr. King played Liszt's "Rigoletto," which was redemanded. The concert was a decided success.

Manchester.—The first of a series of three Public Concerts was given on the 6th ult. by the directors of the Athenæum Musical Society. For a long time Dr. Hiles, the Conductor, has zealously laboured to make his choir worthy of the old musical renown of this institution, and he has good reason to be proud both of the quality of the voices of his chorus and of the intelligence of their singing. The programme included the usual number of part-songs and solos, and Dr. Hiles's new anthem, "I was well pleased," a song of thanksgiving. The anthem is written as a tenor solo and chorus. The solos were sung with great taste and feeling, and the members of the choir were evidently anxious to do justice to the music of their Conductor. In the second part a glee by Dr. Hiles was given, "The calm of the sea and the prosperous voyage," which we believe was one of three by the same composer which gained the first three places in the competition for the prize offered last year by the Gentlemen's Glee Club.——Dr. Horton Allison was the solo pianist, Miss Sutton the vocalist, and Mr. Weston the violoncellist, at the second of the Leigh Grand Concerts, given on Tuesday evening, the 19th ult. Miss Sutton sang with good effect Gounod's "Serenade," with cello obbligato (Mr. Weston), and a vocal waltz, "Sing gaily," which was well received. Mr. Weston was recalled for his rendering of Dunkler's Tarantelle. A choir composed of amateurs, under the able direction of Mr. Henry Brown, sang some choruses, and Dr. Allison played two piano pieces by Liszt and Thalberg, as well as an improvisation on subjects from Gounod's Faust, in response to the encore for which he gave Chopin's Grande Valse in A flat.

Melbourne.—At the Farewell Complimentary Concert given to Herr Johannes Elmblad and Madame Elmblad, prior to their departure for Europe, Madame Elmblad gave a highly successful rendering of Schumann's "Faschingsschwank aus Wien" (Carnival Joke) and Chopin's Polonaise in A major. Herr Elmblad sang "Madamina" from Don Giovanni, Pinsuti's descriptive scena, "The Raft," Schumann's "Ich grolle nicht" ("I'll not repine"), and Chopin's "Bacchanal." "O salutaris," by M. Meilhan, a young Frenchman resident in Sydney, was artistically rendered by Miss Rosina Carandini (soprano), Herr Elmblad (basso), Signor Ortori (violin), Madame Elmblad (piano), and Mr. David Lee (cabinet organ). Miss Carandini sang the scena from Lucrezia Borgia, "Com' è bello," and Signor Ortori contributed violin solos. Mr. David Lee was an efficient Conductor. The Musical Artists' Society of Victoria has recently held its usual monthly meeting. A paper on "Schumann" was read, with musical illustrations. The Quartett in D minor, Op. 41, No. 1, was excellently played; and Mr. George Peake performed two piano solos. The series of Chamber Concerts, given by Miss Griffiths, R.A.M., concluded on September 24. Musically, they have been all that could be desired, and have done a great deal to elevate the public taste.

Montreal.—A Concert of an exceptionally high character was given on the 4th ult. at Synod Hall, under the direction of Mr. F. E. L. Barnes, R.A.M., the Organist of Christ Church Cathedral. The manner in which Sterndale Bennett's pianoforte Sonata, "The Maid of Orleans," was rendered by Mr. Barnes fully revealed his power of interpreting the most intellectual music, and also of grappling with difficulties which, as in most of the compositions of Bennett, are scarcely manifest to the listener. In Silas's Trio in C minor, for pianoforte, violin and violoncello, Mr. Barnes (ably assisted by Mr. Maffre and Mr. Reichling) was also highly successful. The vocalists were Mrs. Barnes and Mrs. Tooke, the first-named lady—who has now fairly established herself as a favourite with the Montreal public—creating quite an effect in Gounod's "O! that we two were maying," which was enthusiastically encored. It is proposed to give three Concerts, on the model of the one under notice; and we sincerely hope that Mr. Barnes's efforts thus to promote the spread of good music in Montreal may be amply rewarded.

Morecambe.—The Winter Garden Concerts are now only given on Saturday evenings, it having been found necessary to omit the Monday's Concert in consequence of the meagre attendance. The programme on the 16th ult. was an excellent one, the artists being Mrs. Neesham, of the Leeds Town Hall Concerts, Mr. Atkinson, and the members of the Garden's Musical Society. Mrs. Neesham created a very favourable impression; and Mr. Atkinson, Miss Stephenson, Miss Holmes, Miss Walker, Mr. Wilson, and Mr. J. Holmes were equally efficient. Mr. W. W. Wilde and Mr. Wilson were the accompanists.

Newport, Isle of Wight.—Mr. R. Roche gave a Concert at the Volunteer Hall, on Thursday evening, the 21st ult., in the presence of a large audience. The principal vocalists were Madame Sicklemore, Mrs. Bradshaw McKay, Mr. Henry Guy, and Mr. Penuel Cross. An excellent programme was well executed. The string band of the 56th Pompadours, under the direction of Mr. J. P. Hansen, gave three performances; and the leader of the instrumentalists (Mr. Hansen) played a violin solo of his own composing. The pianoforte accompaniments to the vocal pieces were ably played by Mr. A. J. Firth, R.A.M. The concert was a great success.

New Seaham.—On Saturday evening, the 16th ult., the members of the Choir of Christ Church, with their friends, met at the Girls' School, to present their Organist, Mr. J. Birkbeck, with a handsome ivory silver-mounted bâton and purse of gold, for his valuable services rendered during the past eleven years. The Rev. W. A. Scott, Vicar, made the presentation, and spoke in high terms of his Organist. Mr. Birkbeck, on rising to receive the testimonial, was loudly applauded, and thanked his friends in a very feeling manner for the elegant present they had made him. The Choir then sang some anthems and glees with much effect. The bâton bore the following inscription:—"Presented, together with a purse of gold, to Mr. J. Birkbeck, Organist, New Seaham, by his choir and friends, as a mark of esteem for services rendered during the past eleven years. A.D. 1878."

Ockley.—Harvest Thanksgiving Services were held on Sunday, October 27, commencing with a Choral Celebration of the Holy Communion at 9 a.m. in St. John's Church; Matins in St. Margaret's, the Parish Church, at 11, the processional being "Onward, Christian soldiers," and recessional, "We plough the fields and scatter." Tallis's Festival responses were used, the Te Deum was Chipp in D, and the anthem, Barnby's "O Lord, how manifold are Thy works," all of which were sung with much spirit by the choir. The musical portions of the services were under the direction of, and accompanied with much taste by, Mr. Charles G. Sadler, of Brighton.

Oxford.—The Concert of the Choral Society was given on the 6th ult. in the Corn Exchange, when Macfarren's Joseph was performed; and it is not too much to say that the many beauties of the work have perhaps never been more adequately exhibited. The "Nine Brethren," in particular, were of rare excellence. The soloists included two of the original Leeds cast, Madame Patey and Mr. Lloyd, their companions being Madame Nouver, Master Dunster, Mr. Maybrick, and Mr. Hilton. The choruses were most effectively sung throughout. The room was crowded, great numbers being unable to procure admission.——The other musical events of the month were the Concerts given by Mr. Hallé and Madame Norman-Neruda on the 19th in the Town Hall, and the Recital of Chamber Music given by the University Musical Club in their club-room on the 20th.

Peterborough.—The new organ at St. Paul's Church was opened on Wednesday, the 6th ult., by Mr. B. Manders, Organist of the Parish Church, and St. Peter's College. After the evening service Mr. Manders played a selection of music, and also gave an Organ Recital on the new instrument on the following Monday. The organ, which is a very sweet-toned one, has two manuals and a pedal organ, and twenty stops. The builders are Messrs. Wordsworth and Markell, Leeds.

Plymouth.—Mendelssohn's Elijah was performed at the First Concert of the season of the Plymouth Vocal Association on October 30, when the new organ was used for accompanying the vocalists. A marked and rapid advance has been achieved by this Society, and Mr. Löhr must have felt well rewarded for his four months of arduous work. The band was led by Mr. Pardew, and the chief stringed instruments did good service, as was particularly noted in the violoncello obbligato to "It is enough." The principal vocalists were Miss Anna Williams, Madame Enriquez, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. Santley. Miss Edwards gave good aid in the ever welcome unaccompanied trio, "Lift thine eyes." "Cast thy burden" owed much to the singing of Mr. Nias, who also efficiently took the bass part in the concluding quartett. In addition to those already named Miss Oyns, Mr. Bellamy, and Mr. W. H. K. Wright took part in quartetts, the admirable voices of the two latter especially being heard to great advantage. Mr. Faull presided at the organ, and Mr. Löhr conducted.

Poole.—On Tuesday, the 19th ult., an Evening Concert was given at the Assembly Rooms, under distinguished patronage, by Miss Ada Blanchard, assisted by Miss Orridge, Miss Ada Patterson, and Mr. Sidney Tower (vocalists), Mdlle. Gabrielle Vaillant, violinist, and Mr. Myles Foster, Conductor, all from the Royal Academy of Music. There was a large and select audience. The Concert commenced with Schubert's Sonata in D (pianoforte and violin) by Miss Blanchard and Mdlle. Vaillant, which was exceedingly well executed. The rendering of Raff's Cavatina in D, and De Beriot's "Rondo Russe," by Mdlle. Vaillant, reflected the greatest credit upon the performer. Miss Ada Blanchard, who made her first appearance in public, had a warm reception. Haydn's Sonata in E flat (first movement), and Mendelssohn's two Musical Sketches, in B flat and G minor, were fairly rendered by her. The piano used was one of Messrs. Hopkinson and Sons.

Radley.—On Friday, the 1st ult., the Choir of St. Peter's College gave its Annual Concert. The first part consisted of Romberg's Lay of the Bell, the choruses of which were well rendered. The second part opened with the March from The Bard, by E. G. Monk, effectively given by two violins, two violoncellos, pianoforte and harmonium. The solo vocalists in this part were C. B. Bone and H. A. Sanford (altos), R. A. Ploetz, Esq., and the Rev. G. Wharton (tenors) and F. B. Taylor (bass), all of whom were well received. The concert reflected the greatest credit upon the Precentor, the Rev. G. Wharton.

Reading.—Mr. Alfred Ferdinand Rippon gave his Annual Evening Concert at the Victoria Hall on Monday evening, October 28, assisted by the following artists:—Miss Frances Brooke (soprano), Mrs. Alfred F. Rippon (contralto), Mr. Walter Pettit (violoncello), Mr. Alfred Ferdinand Rippon (violin), and Mr. Robert H. F. Rippon (pianoforte). The instrumental solos were well played and warmly applauded; and Miss Frances Brooke and Mrs. Alfred F. Rippon by their refined singing fully sustained their well-earned reputation. There was a large attendance.

Rugby.—Miss Emily Lawrence gave an Evening Concert on the 21st ult., assisted by Miss Clara Samuell, R.A.M., Mdlle. Gabrielle Vaillant, Mr. Percy Blandford, Herr Daubert, and Sir Julius Benedict. The Pianoforte Trios, Op. 97 of Beethoven, and Op. 26 of Sterndale Bennett, were extremely well received, as was also Mendelssohn's Allegro Brillante, Op. 92, played by Miss Lawrence and Sir Julius Benedict. Miss Samuell was particularly successful in her songs.

Salisbury.—On Thursday, the 7th ult., Mrs. Frank Alexander gave her third annual Pianoforte Recital at the Assembly Rooms before a large and fashionable audience. The artists engaged were Miss Marian Lynton, R.A.M. (soprano), Mr. John M. Hayden, Salisbury Cathedral (tenor), the juvenile pianist, Miss Clara Asher, and Mrs. Alexander (pianoforte), and Mr. Alfred Foley (violin). The Concert was very successful, many of the pieces being redemanded.

Sherborne.—The Forty-fifth Concert of the Sherborne School Musical Society took place in the School Concert Room on Thursday evening, the 7th ult., before a large audience. The favourite numbers in the programme seemed to be, in the first part, the minuet and trio from one of Haydn's Symphonies, Ainslie's song, and a Greek chorus. Gladstone, for his neat rendering of one of Mendelssohn's songs without words, and Harper, mi., Gee, and Galpin for their creditable performance of part of one of Haydn's Trios, deserve a word of encouragement. In the second part, Mr. Poole's flute solo, magnificently played, created quite a furore, and Mr. Young's reading of scenes from Macbeth, interspersed with Locke's music, was highly effective.

Tamworth.—On Monday evening, the 11th ult., a Concert was given at the Town Hall, which was throughout a success, the audience frequently testifying their approval by enthusiastic applause. Mr. J. S. Creswell, in his instrumental selections, was accorded a hearty reception. Mrs. Sutton sang her pieces with brilliancy and finish, and was awarded an encore for her rendering of "The Lover and the Bird." Miss Pearce was also unanimously recalled after "Oh, bright were my visions." Mr. Baily and Mr. Leader were also successful in that part of the programme allotted to them.

West Bromwich.—The Annual Dedication Services at the Parish Church were held on Sunday and Tuesday, the 3rd and 5th ult., when the music was of an unusually high order. The anthem on Sunday evening was "Hear my prayer" (Mendelssohn), the solos being sung by Masters C. Barton and E. Anderson in a very effective manner. The Canticles were sung to an arrangement of Gregorian tones by Dr. Stainer. A few wind instruments were used to support the choir and congregation in the hymns. At the Choral Celebration of the Holy Communion on Tuesday Brown's "Missa Seraphica" was sung. The music was under the direction of Mr. F. Barton.

Windsor.—The Catholic Church of St. Edward has just sustained a serious loss by the retirement of the well-known amateur, Mr. Charles Venables, of Taplow, from the post of Organist, which office he has most ably filled since the building of this church, between ten and eleven years since. Mr Venables, who is an enthusiast in music, not only subscribed very liberally towards the organ, and presided at it regularly, but also, at his own cost, provided a large and highly-trained choir of ladies and gentlemen, consisting almost entirely of well-known London artists. The Masses of Palestrina, Beethoven, Haydn, Mozart, Weber, Hummel, and others, as also well-selected Offertoires by the best composers, have been rendered in the most perfect manner, the excellent music having been a great attraction to the church. As at present arranged, Madame Lloyd will preside at the organ, at the morning services, and Mr. Mellor, in the evening, with a local choir.

Wolverhampton.—The eleventh season of the Festival Choral Society was opened on the 15th ult. with a miscellaneous English Ballad Concert at the Agricultural Hall, which was most successful. The programme was arranged to meet all tastes. The artists engaged were Madame Patey, Madame Nouver, Mr. Maybrick, and Mr. Abercrombie; Mr. Charles Ould (solo violoncello), and Mr. Thouless (solo pianoforte and accompanist). Mr. Edward Lloyd, the popular tenor, had also been announced to take part in the performance, but, owing to severe indisposition, was not able to appear.

Woodford.—A Concert was given at Woodford Hall on the 20th ult., in aid of Mrs. Gladstone's Home. The performers were Messrs. Parker, Gillett, Waters, and Latter; Miss Read and Mrs. Latter. The room was well filled, and the entertainment (which is the first of a series of six) a great success.

Worcester.—Mr. E. J. Spark gave the first of his Concerts for the season at the Music Hall, on Thursday evening, the 7th ult. The artists were Miss Anna Williams, Madame Enriquez, Mr. William Shakespeare, Mr. Thurley Beale, Mr. Keppel (solo flute), and Mr. Edwin Shute (accompanist). The programme, which was miscellaneous, was exceedingly well rendered, and the Concert a very enjoyable one.——The First Concert for the present season of the Worcester Musical Society was given at the Music Hall on Thursday evening, the 21st ult. The programme was an attractive one, comprising a new Cantata by Dr. Henry Hiles, and an interesting miscellaneous selection of solo, choral, and orchestral music. The Cantata, Fayre Pastoral, is founded upon Spenser's "Fairy Queen," and is a work of high merit. The accompaniments throughout are of great beauty. But it is in the choral writing, and in one or two of the songs, that the great charm of the work lies. The solo parts were well taken by Miss Sutton, Mr. Quarterman, Mr. Thomasson, and Mr. C. Lane. The second part opened with the overture to the Barber of Seville. Much interest was felt in Mr. Caldicott's humorous glee, "Humpty Dumpty," which obtained the special prize at the Manchester competition in the spring of the present year. Mendelssohn's Cornelius March brought an agreeable concert to a close.

Organ Appointments.—Mr. C. G. Bell, Organist and Choirmaster to Oakland's Chapel, Shepherd's Bush.—Mr. A. Physick, to the Parish Church of Perivale, near Ealing.

[Mr. Edmund Wilcockson, Organist to St. Peter's Church, Regent Square, requests us to state that the Organ Appointment—"Mr. A. Mollan, to St. Peter's, Regent Square"—which appeared in the October number of this journal is without foundation, and that the person who supplied this false information to us has tendered an ample apology. Mr. Wilcockson wishes us to add that Mr. Mollan had nothing whatever to do with the matter.]

Choir Appointments.—Mr. H. C. Bailey (Alto) to Hereford Cathedral.—Mr. Albert Gardiner (Alto) to St. Asaph Cathedral.

Organist of New and St. John's Colleges, and Organist and Choragus to the University of Oxford.

EIGHTH EDITION. Demy 8vo, cloth, 5s.

ALSO,

A CHEAPER EDITION

(the Eleventh).

With a Memorandum on the Pointing of the "GLORIA PATRI," by Sir G. J. ELVEY. Fcap. 8vo, cloth limp, 2s. 6d.

THE CANTICLES SEPARATELY

(Sixteenth Edition). Fcap. 8vo, 6d.

The Psalter is used at St. George's Chapel, Windsor, and at many Cathedrals.

"There can be no doubt but that we owe most of what is good in the chanting of to-day to the (seven years) labour and care bestowed on the first edition of this work issued in 1856."—Musical Standard, September 25, 1875.

"Taken as a whole, Dr. Elvey's work has not been surpassed. . . . We believe that educated musicians generally—with a sense of the importance of this part of worship—if they must chant from such a pointed Psalter, would prefer Dr. Elvey's conscientious framework to any other we know."—The Orchestra, January, 1878.

THE PSALTER AND CANTICLES

POINTED AND SET TO ACCOMPANYING

CHANTS, ANCIENT AND MODERN,

By the Rev. SIR H. W. BAKER, Bart., and WILLIAM HENRY MONK,

Professor of Vocal Music in King's College, London.

The Cheap Edition, with Vocal Score (Gregorians in unison), is now ready; size, double post 16mo.

Limp cloth, cut flush, and lettered ... ... 2s. od.
Cloth boards, turned in, and lettered ... ... 2s. 6d.
Cloth boards, turned in, gilt lettered, red edges ... 3s. od.

A large Imperial 8vo Edition, with accompanying harmonies for the Gregorian Tones, is in the Press.

The distinctive object aimed at is to unite under the same pointing two forms of chant hitherto considered incompatible—the Ancient and the Modern, the Gregorian and the Anglican—and to introduce a new form of Chant, which is commended with confidence for the use of Parish Choirs.

The work includes about 50 varieties of the Gregorian Chants, some from sources not easily accessible; and about 390 chants of the Anglican form, of which 100 are more or less well known, the remainder having been composed expressly for this work by musicians of distinction, including most of our Cathedral Organists.

Canticles only, 6d., 9d., and 1s.

Tonic Sol-fa and Plain Song Editions will be published as soon as possible.

ASHDOWN & PARRY'S ALBUMS OF DANCE MUSIC.

The ever-increasing sale of these Albums in the United Kingdom, the Colonies, and America, is the best evidence that the judicious selection of the Dances in them is fully appreciated. Many publications of the kind contain a large proportion of music which has been found to be unsuccessful in the ordinary form; the music in ASHDOWN & PARRY'S Albums, on the contrary, is the best of its kind, and every piece has in its original form attained great popularity; in this respect they are unique, and form a permanent, attractive, and varied selection of excellent Dance Music in a portable and convenient form at an extremely low price.

The apparition.
The Dutchman's broom.
Take me, lass, for life.
The fine old English admiral.
Ring, happy bells.
The forsaken.
The sailor's dream.
To sea.
Rooke in the Bay of La Hogue.
A thousand leagues away.
Strike, and strike hard.
Were I that gull.
Hawke in Quiberon Bay.
Saturday night at sea.
Duncan at Camperdown.
Rum.
Rodney and De Grasse.
From sea.
A wife's song.
The winds, inconstant ever.
Old Benbow.
There's nothing like a smoke.
The seaboy's dream.
A song of the sea.
The wife for a British sailor.
We roam and rule the sea.
The homeward watch.
Off to sea.
A mother's song.
Here we sit by our Christmas fire.
A Christmas song.
Outward bound.
Herrings are in the bay.

THE LEEDS TUNE-BOOK

A MANUAL OF 274 HYMN-TUNES OF ALL METRES FOR ALL DENOMINATIONS,

COMPILED AND ARRANGED IN SHORT SCORE FOR VOICES OR ORGAN, BY

JOSEPH LANCASTER,

ORGANIST, MILL HILL CHAPEL, LEEDS.

Quarto. Large type. Price 4s. 6d. Congregations and Choirs supplied at Reduced Rates.

"The harmonies evince an amount of technical knowledge and careful arrangement which is creditable in the highest degree to the compiler."—Musical Times.

"This collection contains 274 tunes, selected with taste and judgment, including not only the principal ancient and modern tunes in general use, but a number of new and original tunes, some of which are of great merit."—Illustrated London News.

"It is an admirable collection of very choice tunes for congregational worship, and we most heartily commend it for use in the church and in the home, believing it will be found very widely acceptable. The book is clearly printed, and can be had to order of any book or musicseller."—Kent Herald.

"Mr. Lancaster has reproduced many of the standard tunes, both ancient and modern; and he has mingled with them many original compositions. The work, which is not at all sectarian or denominational in character, is thoroughly legitimate in its purpose, and in many respects highly creditable in its execution."—Globe.

"'The Leeds Tune-Book' is a handsomely printed quarto volume, with the tunes in short score, and contains the usual amount of ancient and modern favourites, with about ninety tunes composed expressly for the collection, and printed for the first time. Many of the original tunes are remarkably good. We may particularly instance those by Dr. Naylor, Mr. Hird, and a many of the Editor's contributions."—Choir and Musical Record.

"It is charmingly printed in duodecimo; a handy book, and a good collection. We heartily recommend it."—Yorkshire Post.

"An excellent tune-book, and will be found a most useful supplement to the tune-books already in use."—Leeds Mercury.

"This collection consists of 274 tunes of all metres, all bearing the true stamp of the effective music so generally heard in places of worship in Yorkshire. It is printed in beautifully clear type, is well bound, is moderate in price, and in every respect a very acceptable addition to the present list of such publications."—Yorkshire Orchestra.

"We welcome the appearance of this new tune-book, as a valuable compendium, either for a complete collection or as a supplement to any other tune-book."—Scarborough Gazette.

THE CLASSICAL ORGANIST,

A SELECTION OF

CELEBRATED COMPOSITIONS

FROM THE WORKS OF

HANDEL, MOZART, BEETHOVEN, MENDELSSOHN, MEYERBEER, &c.,

Arranged from the Orchestral Scores for

THE ORGAN,

WITH PEDAL OBBLIGATO,

BY

J. T. STONE.

In Three Volumes Oblong Folio (each containing 193 pages), £1 1s. each; or in 54 Numbers, 1s. 6d. each net.

Messrs. BREWER & CO., in announcing to the professors and accomplished amateurs of the Organ the publication of a new edition of the "CLASSICAL ORGANIST," beg to state that this important work is eminently adapted to supply the requirements of the Modern School of Organ-Playing.

The Editor, having arranged the celebrated compositions contained in the present work from the full scores, has endeavoured to represent, as far as practicable, the orchestral effects capable of being produced upon the grandest and most majestic of all musical instruments.

This work is engraved in the first style, on large plates, oblong folio size, and printed on a thick superfine paper, which has been made expressly for the purpose. The publishers confidently state that they have spared no expense in rendering the present work for the Organ truly worthy of the "King of Instruments."

 The Copyright of the "CLASSICAL ORGANIST" is the sole and exclusive property of Messrs. Brewer and Co., 14 and 15, Poultry, Cheapside, and 23, Bishopsgate Street Within.

A Thematic List of Contents of Vols. I., II., and III. will be forwarded on application to the Publishers, or to

The Organist's Quarterly Journal

OF ORIGINAL COMPOSITIONS.

(PUBLISHED ON THE 1ST OF JANUARY, APRIL, JULY, AND OCTOBER.)

EDITED BY

WILLIAM SPARK, MUS. DOC.

The commencement of the Sixth Volume of this useful and valuable periodical presents a favourable opportunity for New Subscribers to send their names to the Editor or the Publishers. Twenty pages of beautifully engraved New Organ Compositions are supplied to subscribers, every quarter, for 2s. 6d.

Volumes I., II., III., IV., and V., each consisting of ONE HUNDRED and SIXTY PAGES of ORIGINAL COMPOSITIONS for the ORGAN by the best living Organists and Composers (Foreign and English). Price, handsomely bound in cloth, gilt edges, 21s. each. Subscribers for not less than one year can commence at any period, and receive back numbers at the Subscription price. Annual Subscription, 10s.; Non-Subscribers, 5s. net each Part.

"This number completes the tenth year of Dr. Spark's journal. Begun at a time when the dearth of original organ music—of fresh composition specially suited to the genius of the organ as a solo instrument—was severely felt, this work was purposed to supply the want. The fidelity with which this purpose has been carried out by Dr. Spark in the selection of material suited to all tastes and every degree of executive ability, and by the Messrs. Novello, in their admirable style of publication, is well known to every organist long ere this, while the fact of its continued existence, with character and vigour unimpaired, sufficiently proves that the competition which its earlier success naturally elicited has not lessened its relative value or restricted its popularity. In a word, all the promises with which the first number was laden have been more than fulfilled, so that there now exists a large work from which no organist can be at a loss to select what is suitable for church or concert purposes, or for his own private practice, while there is much in it that is good for teaching."—Dundee Advertiser.

NOVELLO, EWER & CO.'S
MUSIC PRIMERS
EDITED BY
DR. STAINER.

In issuing this series of Music Primers the Editor sees with pleasure the realisation of a desire he has long felt, to place in the hands of teachers and students of music a set of educational works of a high standard at a price so low as to render them attainable by all.

The growing interest in music generally, and rapid spread of its study, so very evident in this country, render it of the utmost importance that the student's first steps in every branch should be directed with skill and based on sound principles. The Editor has kept this object steadily in view, and he believes that each one of these Primers will prove to be as carefully constructed in detail as it is comprehensive in design.

Such a result would have been impossible but for the hearty support and sympathy of those authors, men of known ability in their special branches of art, who have embodied the results of their long and valuable experience in their respective contributions.

While gratefully acknowledging the kindness of these gentlemen, the Editor cannot but express a hope that the Primers may prove as useful to the public, and as beneficial to art, as both authors and publishers have endeavoured to make them.

NEW WORK FOR SINGING CLASSES.

CHAPPELL'S PENNY OPERATIC PART-SONGS.

For Soprano, Alto, Tenor, and Bass.

The present collection of Part-Songs is entirely new, being selected and adapted from the most striking and popular Choruses in the Favourite Foreign Operas. The Arrangement is purely Vocal, such Choruses only being chosen as can be sung without the aid of an Instrumental Accompaniment. The Words have been expressly written for the work, and the harmonies arranged in four parts, as likely to be most useful in small classes.

1.	Hymn of the Fisherman's Children	Adapted to a Melody from Herold's "ZAMPA."
2.	Fays and Elves (In mia fe)	From Flotow's "MARTA."
3.	Spring's Bright Glances (In Elvezia non v' ha)	From Bellini's "LA SONNAMBULA."
4.	From Yonder Vale and Hill (D' immenso giubilo)	From Donizetti's "LUCIA DI LAMMERMOOR."
5.	Here we rest (Qui la selva)	From Bellini's "LA SONNAMBULA."
6.	Onward to Battle (Squilli echeggi)	From Verdi's "IL TROVATORE."
7.	Rataplan (Rataplan)	From Donizetti's "LA FIGLIA DEL REGGIMENTO."
8.	The Gipsy's Star (Vedi! le fosche)	From Verdi's "IL TROVATORE."
9.	War Song of the Druids (Dell' aura tua profetica)	From Bellini's "NORMA."
10.	In Mercy, hear us! (Cielo clemente)	From Donizetti's "LA FIGLIA DEL REGGIMENTO."
11.	Come to the Fair! (Accorete, giovinette)	From Flotow's "MARTA."
12.	Friendship (Per te d' immenso giubilo)	From Donizetti's "LUCIA DI LAMMERMOOR."
13.	Away, the Morning freshly breaking (The Chorus of Fishermen)	From Auber's "MASANIELLO."
14.	Pretty Village Maiden (Peasants' Serenade Chorus)	From Gounod's "FAUST."
15.	The soft Winds around us (The Gipsy Chorus)	From Weber's "PRECIOSA."

17.	See the Moonlight Beam (Non fav Motto)	" " "
18.	On yonder Rocks reclining	From Auber's "FRA DIAVOLO."
19.	Happy and light	From Balfe's "BOHEMIAN GIRL."
20.	Come, come away (Ah! que de moins)	From Donizetti's "LA FAVORITA."
21.	Hymen's torch (Il destin)	From Meyerbeer's "LES HUGUENOTS."
22.	Come on, Comrade (The Celebrated Chorus of Old Men)	From Gounod's "FAUST."
23.	'Gainst the Powers of Evil (The Chorale of the Cross)	" " "
24.	O Balmy Night (Com' è gentil)	From Donizetti's "DON PASQUALE."
25.	Haste o'er the hills (Introductory Chorus)	From Rossini's "GUGLIELMO TELL."
26.	Come, sing the Song (Opening Chorus)	From Meyerbeer's "ROBERT LE DIABLE."
27.	With fair Ceres (The March Chorus)	From Bellini's "NORMA."
28.	The Tuneful Song of Robin's Horn (Tyrolese Chorus)	From Rossini's "GUGLIELMO TELL."
29.	The Chorus of Huntsmen	From Weber's "DER FREISCHUETZ."
30.	Hark! the distant hills (Hunting Chorus)	From Flotow's "MARTA."
31.	Hence! away with care	From Meyerbeer's "GLI UGONOTTI."
32.	Hail to the Bride	From Wagner's "LOHENGRIN."
33.	Hark! music stealing! (subject from Overture)	From Rossini's "SEMIRAMIDE."
34.	A bridal wreath we twined (Chorus of Bridesmaids)	From Weber's "DER FREISCHUETZ."
35.	Behold, how brightly breaks the Morning! (The Barcarole)	From Auber's "MASANIELLO."
